

✓ 63817

THE Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

63817

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXLIV

JANUARY 2, 1937, to JUNE 26, 1937

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLIV

JANUARY 2, 1937, to JUNE 26, 1937

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-28 January 2	365-392 April 3
29-56 January 9	393-420 April 10
57-84 January 16	421-448 April 17
85-112 January 23	449-492 April 24
113-140 January 30	493-520 May 1
141-168 February 6	521-548 May 8
169-196 February 13	549-576 May 15
197-224 February 20	577-604 May 22
225-252 February 27	605-632 May 29
253-280 March 6	633-660 June 5
281-308 March 13	661-688 June 12
309-336 March 20	689-716 June 19
337-364 March 27	717-744 June 26

A

A. R.
Spirit of Spain; C.....	391
Abbott, Edith
Mount Holyoke college presidency; C....	168
Abraham Lincoln brigade. See Spain
Absentee owners. L. Pruette; C..195; see also	123
Abyssinia. M. Van Doren; MP.....	26
Academic freedom
De Voto, Bernard, and Kitty Smith. F.
Dell; S.....	98
Dismissals of instructors at Harvard and elsewhere; EP.....	522
Harvard and the social sciences. R. K.
Lamb; S.....561; see also C.....	686
Harvard, economics teaching; E.....	425
Harvard; dismissal of economics instructors; EP.....	451
Harvard to consider cases of dismissed
instructors; EP.....	634
Teachers in Stambaugh, Michigan, gain rights. L. Swanson; C.....	491
Accidents, aeronautic. See Aeronautics
Acting. See Theater, the Adamic, Louis
Views on sitdown strikes and I. W. W. criticized. J. Anderson; C.....	55
Aeronautics
Accidents. R. W. Horton; S.....	94
Accidents, fatal, and incompetence of Bureau of air commerce; EP...30; see also C.....140; C.....	167
Bureau of air commerce, shake-up; EP...	255
Africa, Nazi scouts in; E.....	581
After the thin man. M. Van Doren; MP....	80
Aged 26. J. W. Krutch; D.....	25
Agreements, trade. See Tariff, United States
Agriculture
California workers, organization attempted;
EP.....	311
Cotton; landlord and tenant. W. R. Ambers-on; S.....	264
Farm tenancy: A program. L. Westbrook;
S.....39; see also EP.....	31
Farm tenancy, The Nation's program for;
E.....	257
Nebraska; state fights for survival. M. S.
Stewart; S.....	375
Share-croppers; report of farm tenancy committee; EP.....	198
Southern; forty acres and a mule. W. R.
Amerson; S.....	264
Air commerce bureau; shake-up; EP.....	255
Airplanes. See Aeronautics
Alas, Doctor L., condemned to death. F. de los
Rios; C.....	308
Albee, George
American writers' union; C.....	392
Alberta; social credit, troubles. D. Leslie; S...	704
Alice, psychoanalyzing. J. W. Krutch; S...	129
Alienation of affection suits outlawed. W.
Seagle; S.....	434

Aliens, in defense of; EP.....	170
Aliquippa celebrates. R. M. Stein; S.....	466
Allen, James S.
Philippines, ownership; S.....	463
Quezon—Philippine dictator; S..320; see also EP.....	311
Allen, Jay; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936
7
Allen, Robert S.
Hughes checkmates the president; S.....	610
Allen, William D.
Third degree; C.....	742
Almeria. See Spain
Amazing Doctor Clitterhouse, the. J. W.
Krutch; D.....	304
Amerson, William R.
Forty acres and a mule; S.....	264
America, age of man in. G. Mason; S.....	100
American bar association. See Supreme court
American committee for Spanish relief. See
Spain
American council of learned societies, the; on
The Nation's honor roll for 1936.....	7
American federation of labor; Green, W., and
J. L. Lewis. H. Brown; S.....	46
Losing in fight with C. I. O.; EP.....	310
American labor party, bill against, in New York legislature; EP.....	494
American medical association. See Medicine
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American newspaper publishers' association.
See Newspapers
American writers' congress. D. Macdonald;
C.....714; H. Hart; C.....	741
American writers' union. G. Albee; C.....	392
Anarchists. See Spain
And now good-bye. J. W. Krutch; D.....	163
Anderson, John
"Sitdown" and the I. W. W.; C.....	55
Anderson, Maxwell; play, High tor , receives drama critics' award; EP.....	366
Anderson, Indiana. See Strikes
Anti-semitism. See Jews
"Antifa." See Palestine
Arabs. See Palestine
Arbaiza, G.
Latin America; fascism in; S.....643; see also C.....	742
Armaments
Race. O. G. Villard; S.....	677
Race, European and American; EP.....	226
Art; laurels for the living. H. Brown; S....	128
Arvin, Newton, and others
Writers, American, national congress suggested; C.....	547
Ashton, E. B.
Dieckhoff, Ambassador H. H.; S.....	642
Assembly, New York state, and action against child-labor amendment. H. Brown; S....	379
Associated press. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Austria; il duce pulls the strings; E.....	495
Nazi propaganda; EP.....	282
Authors
American, national congress suggested. N.
Arvin; C.....	547
American writers' congress. D. Macdonald;
C.....714; H. Hart; C.....	741
American writers' union. G. Albee; C.....	392
Half-truth of the whole truth. J. W.
Krutch; S.....	21
Automobile race, Indianapolis. J. Collier; S...	674
Automobiles
Strikes:
Canadian; EP.....	449
Chrysler and Hudson plants, sitdown in;
EP.....	281
Chrysler sitdown; EP.....	310
Conferences sought; EP.....	85
Detroit digs in. E. Levinson; S.....	64
General motors; EP.....33; EP.....	141
Flint alliance; EP.....	85
Flint, visit by a General motors stockholder. R. M. Lovett; S..123; see
also C.....	195
Flint faces civil war. C. R. Walker; S...	175
General motors anti-strike preparations;
S.....	91
General motors stands pat; EP.....	57
Profile of S. Romer; S..96; corrections.....168,	224
Pullman car opinion; EP.....	171
Reporting by New York Times ; E.....	426
Secretary Perkins's declaration; P. W.
Ward; S.....	147
Victory for Committee for industrial organization and United automobile
workers of America; E.....	199

General motors of Canada, limited; EP... 422
Government attitude. P. W. Ward; S.... 35
Hepburn, M., with Ford; EP..... 422
Hepburn, M., stand against C. I. O.; EP 440
Oshawa, battle of. R. Irwin; S..... 503
Trouble in mass-production; EP..... 3
Used, buying. Corbillo; C..... 139
Aviation. See Aeronautics
Aylesworth, Merlin H.; R. Brindze; S..... 208
B.
B., B.
Cross-town; D..... 362
Enemy of the people, an; D..... 248
Frederika; D..... 221
Sun and I, the; D..... 304
Tragical history of Doctor Faustus, the; D 109
B., R.
Spanish revolt—a seaman does his bit; C.. 138
Baldridge, Cyrus Leroy; on The Nation's roll
for 1936..... 7
Baldwin, Roger
On The Nation's editorial on the soviet trials C.....196; see also E..... 143
Baldwin, Stanley. See Great Britain
Banking; federal reserve board raises reserve requirements; EP..... 142
Barkley, Frederick R.
Bloody Harlan; S..... 532
Bartel, Zan
On Rural electrification administration;
C.....491; see also 343
Basques. See Spain
Batista, Fulgencio. See Cuba
Battleships. See Navies
Beer, Samuel
Nation, The , "enemy of the people"; C.. 742
Belgium; De Grelle's Rexists defeated; EP.. 421
Beloved enemy. M. Van Doren; MP..... 80
Berg bills vetoed by Governor Lehman; EP.. 523
Bernard, John Toussaint. W. L. G.; C..... 167
Vote against barring arms to Spain; EP.. 86
Bernstein, Philip S.
Promise of zionism; S..... 12
Betting, revenue from. H. Brown; S..... 535
Betzing, Henry F.
Praises Malraux article on Spain; C..447;
see also..... 315
Bilbao. See Spain
Birth control
Junior league, and the question; EP.... 551
Puerto Rican bill for information passed;
EP..... 522
Today; E..... 34
Wins. H. M. Stone; S..... 70
Bittner, Van A.; on The Nation's honor roll
for 1936..... 7
Black legion. M. Van Doren; MP..... 137
Blum, Léon. See France
Boettiger, John; his master's voice. E. McGrath and J. P. Dallas; S..... 150
Bombing case. See Jennings, Emerson
Bond, Frederic Drew
Right to a job; C..... 604
Bonds, United States. See Finance, public
Books
For workers, asked. R. M. Stein; C..... 548
Reviewing; an editor's problem; EP.... 395
Reviews. J. W. Krutch; S..... 438
"Ultimate power, the" by M. L. Ernst, praised by rival publishers; E..... 201
See also Censorship, literary For reviews of books, see Book section of index
Borah, William E.; oration "in defense of supreme court; EP..... 141
Boukstein, Maurice
Truth about Palestine, the; C..... 307
Bowers, Ambassador Claude G., whereabouts;
EP..... 365
Brandeis, Louis D.; on The Nation's honor roll
for 1936..... 7
Brazil; Caffrey as ambassador, an alarming prospect; EP..... 393
Prestes and Ewart convicted by arbitrary government; EP..... 550
Breach of promise suits outlawed. W. Seagle;
S..... 434
Bridges, Harvey; on The Nation's honor roll
for 1936..... 7
Brindze, Ruth
Aylesworth, M. H.; S..... 208
Broadcasting monopoly; S..... 430
Brisbane, Arthur. O. G. Villard; S..... 45
Death; EP..... 3
British empire, conference in London; E..... 608
Broadcasting. See Radio

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

- Brookings institute, book on economic recovery in the United States; E. 90
- Brooks, Van Wyck; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- Brotherhood of carpenters and joiners, convention; E. Levinson; S. 11
- Brown, Heywood
American newspaper publishers association fights supreme court decision; S. 509
Assembly, New York state, and action against child-labor amendment; S. 379
Betting, revenue from; S. 535
Child labor; uncensored column; S. 325
Daily worker, the; S. 678
Davis, J. W., argument in Associated Press-Watson case; S. 241
Dog racing, and labor agitators; S. 20
Ford plant, C. I. O. "raid" on; S. 649
Gambling, Florida; S. 73
Green, W., and J. L. Lewis; S. 46
Grimley, Reverend Mr., jests about Spanish bombings; S. 620
Hollywood strike; S. 565
Is there a Nation? S. 437; EP. 421
Laurels for the living; S. 128
Lewis, J. L.; S. 298
Louis, J., and J. L. Lewis; S. 156
Mellon gift of art to the government; S. 128
News, as printed in the New York Times and New York Herald Tribune; S. 186
Pilate's autobiography, extract from; S. 593
Speech to Lawyers' guild, Washington, on supreme court, and liberals; S. 269
Supreme court proposal; S. 353
Supreme court proposal; liberals need awakening; S. 730
Watson, M., and M. Ernst; S. 468
Brown-shirt armies; E. 312
Brownlow report on government reorganization; E. 116
Budget, United States. See Finance, public
Bureau of air commerce. See Aeronautics
Bureau of business research, university of Pittsburgh, and "The economics of the iron and steel industry"; C. 630; see also 538
Bureaucracy. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
Burlesque; freedom and Mr. Minsky. J. W. Krutch; D. 594
Bus drivers, London, strike. H. J. Laski; S. 586
Business. See Economic conditions
But for the grace of God. J. W. Krutch; D. 108
Byington, Steven T.
Colonies; people the important thing; C. 308
- C
- CIO. See Committee for industrial organization
Cabinet of Doctor Caligari, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 137
Caffrey, Jefferson, as ambassador to Brazil; alarming prospect; EP. 393
California
Agricultural workers, organization attempted; EP. 311
Indian fiesta. M. Rukcyser; S. 616
Medical censorship in. L. Symes; S. 349
Camille. M. Van Doren; MP. 194
Candida. J. W. Krutch; D. 361
Captains courageous. M. Van Doren; MP. 685
Cardenas, Lazaro. See Mexico
Cardiff, Ira D.
Washington dehydrated food company; C. 660
Cardozo, Benjamin N.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
Carpenters' and joiners' brotherhood, convention. E. Levinson; S. 11
Carpet workers' strike. D. Macdonald and S. Rodman; C. 604
Cars. See Automobiles
Catalonia. See Spain
Caterpillar traction company; treatment of its silicotics. M. S. Mayer; S. 432
Catholic church. See Germany; Mexico; Roman catholic church
Celler, Emanuel
Chain stores and independents; C. 27
Censorship, literary
"World I never made, a," by J. T. Farrell, action against; EP. 86
"World I never made, a," by J. T. Farrell, held not obscene; EP. 198
Censorship, moving picture
Letter from Governor Earle to The Nation; EP. 365
National league of decency, work of; Hollywood index. M. B. Zerwick; S. 18
"Spain in flames" censored in Pennsylvania; E. 340
"Spain in flames," censorship of; defense by Governor Earle; E. 396
Censorship, newspaper. See Newspapers
Censorship, stage; freedom and Mr. Minsky. J. W. Krutch; D. 594
Central states electric corporation, control by H. Williams; EP. 253
Chain-store-tax decision; EP. 577
Chain stores and independents. E. Celler; C. 27
Chamber of commerce, meeting; EP. 521
Chamberlain, Neville. See Great Britain
Chang Hsueh-liang. See China
Chiang Kai-shek. See China
Chicago
Broke. M. S. Meyer; S. 177; see also C. 547
Chicago international schools catholic association, work of. History teacher, a; C. 660
Newspapers; censorship, Chicago style. F. L.; C. 55
Steel strike. See Steel and iron—Strikes
Child labor. See Labor
China
Chiang Kai-shek, capture by Chang Hsueh-liang. A. Smedley; S. 180; see also EP. 170
Chiang Kai-shek's release after kidnaping by Chang Hsueh-liang; anti-Japanese deal; EP. 30
Chiang Kai-shek, terms of release by Chang Hsueh-liang; EP. 2
Shensi, events in. A. Smedley; S. 180; see also EP. 170
Soong, T. V., leadership; EP. 2
Chinese-Japanese relations
Economic "cooperation" announced by Japan; E. 313
Pai Chung-hsi appointment as war minister sign of victory of anti-Japanese groups; EP. 451
Popular front against Japan; EP. 226
Victory of Japanese military in dissolution of diet affects situation; EP. 395
Chrysler corporation. See Automobiles
Chupka, John
Appeal for strikers and families; C. 168
Churchill, Henry S., and J. P. Marvel
Jefferson memorial, protest against; C. 448
Citizens' military training camps, recruiting for. B. Fulks; C. 575
Civil rights; La Follette investigation hampered; E. 256
Supreme court and. I. Feinstein; S. 151
Civilian conservation corps; Roosevelt asks permanency; EP. 551
Cleveland, Grover, centenary of birth; EP. 311
Clichy, France, riot; E. 341
Coal miners, American; bloody Harlan. F. R. Barkley; S. 532
Coleman, McAlister
Hoffman of New Jersey; S. 559, 588
Paine, Tom; C. 252; see also 157
Collier, Joe
Indiana idyl (Indianapolis automobile race); S. 674
Colman, Louis
Repealing repression; C. 576; see also EP. 494
Colonies; people the important thing. S. T. Byington; C. 308
Redistribution, and German treatment of natives. O. G. Villard; S. 209; see also C. 547
Columbia university; declines invitation to Göttingen bicentenary; EP. 551
Columnists. See Newspapers
Committee for industrial organization
Aliquippa steel workers vote for affiliation; EP. 606
American federation of labor losing in contest; EP. 310
American newspaper guild votes for affiliation; EP. 690
Far Western front. R. L. Neuberger; S. 725
Grows despite American federation of labor opposition; E. 579
Hoffman, Governor, opposition; E. 229
Lewis, J. L., and company. H. Brown; S. 298
Marches on. B. Stolberg; S. 203
"Raid" on Ford plant. H. Brown; S. 649
Steel masters talk with committee; EP. 253
Steel strikes; committee calls supporting strikes; EP. 690
United States steel capitulates; E. 286
See also Automobiles—Strikes
Conant, James B. See Harvard university
Congress
Bills referring to supreme court. P. W. Ward; S. 63
Looks toward 1938. R. W. Horton; S. 638
Nation, The, fourteen points for congress; E. 31
Progressive leaders needed; EP. 393
Progressives slighted in committee appointments; EP. 87
Conscription bill (Hill-Sheppard bill). S. Raushenbush; S. 236
Constitution, United States; reform, clamor over. P. W. Ward; S. 63
Consumer, double-crossed by congress; P. W. Ward; S. 231; see also C. 335, C. 519
Consumers' cooperative movement. C. E. Warne; S. 645, 675
Contempt of court. See Newspapers
Convict labor. See labor
Cooperative medicine. See Medicine
Cooperatives; consumers' movement. C. E. Warne; S. 645, 675
European, report on; EP. 367
Copeland bill. See Food and drug bill
Corbilo
Buying a used car; C. 139
Coronation. See Great Britain
Corporations' plot against Wagner act. P. W. Ward; S. 231; see also C. 335
Corsica; Italian agitation in; EP. 226
Corwin, Edward S.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
Cotton. See Agriculture
Cotton textiles; agreement with Japan; EP. 199
Courts. See Supreme court, United States
Crawford, Kenneth G.
Hoover, J. Edgar; S. 232, 262
Crime; crime stories and crime "waves"; EP. 365
Public hysteria following kidnaping and murder cases; EP. 87
Criminal conversation suits outlawed. W. Seagle; S. 434
Criminal-syndicalism law. See Radicals
Cripps, Stafford, socialist leader. H. J. Laski; S. 92
Criticism by Nazi standards; EP. 339
Critics, theater. See Theater, the Cross, Governor Wilbur L.; against sitdown strikes; EP. 255
Crowell, Norborne Harris
War and democracy; C. 420; see also 148
Cuba; Baptista, spokesman for military junta; EP. 2
Curley bill. See Newspapers
Curran, Joseph; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
Currency
Dollar, revaluation of, rumor; EP. 422
Gold:
Accumulation in United States, and increase in production; E. 580
Dethroned in United States; E. 5
Government purchases. R. W. Horton; S. 638
Inflation begins in the United States; E. 342
Inflation, Eccles' statement on; EP. 338
Czar to Lenin. M. Van Doren; MP. 362
Czecho-slovakia, struggle for. R. Dell; S. 611
- D
- Daily worker, the*. H. Brown; S. 678
Dallas, J. P., and E. McGrath
Boettiger—his master's voice; S. 150
Dance, new forms of. P. Love; S. 679
Darby, Hugh H.
Heidelberg university today; C. 252
Daughters of the American revolution; speech to, by C. P. Taft; EP. 495
Davis, Ewin L.
Nashville Tennessean, ownership of; C. with reply with P. W. Ward. 519; see also 231
Davis, John W. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Davis, Norman, open letter to. O. G. Villard; S. 677
Dean, Vera Micheles
Challenge to pacifists, a; S. 148; see also C. 420, 508
Degrelle, Leon. See Belgium
De Jonge, Dirk; conviction overruled by United States supreme court; EP. 30
Decision. I. Feinstein; S. 151
Dell, Floyd
Bernard De Voto and Kitty Smith; S. 98
Dell, Robert
Paying ransom to Hitler; S. 234
Struggle for Czecho-slovakia; S. 611
Volcano under England; S. 373
Democracy, challenge to. V. M. Dean; S. 148; see also C. 420, 508
Denney, Reuel
Love poem; P. 271
Deportation; V. Ferrero, case of; writ denied; EP. 170
Depression. See Economic conditions
Detroit. See Automobiles—Strikes
Deutschland, battleship. See Spain
Devaney, John P.
National lawyers' guild; C. 492
De Voto, Bernard, and Kitty Smith. F. Dell; S. 98
Dewey investigation. See Racketeering
Dictatorships, challenge of. V. M. Dean; S. 148; see also C. 420, 508
Dieckhoff, Ambassador H. H.; E. B. Ashton; S. 642
Divorce, British bill debated; EP. 115
Dixon, Maynard
Time, Life, and Fortune; C. 630; see also 500, 527, 583, 742
Doctors. See Medicine
Dog racing, and labor agitators. H. Brown; S. 20
Dollar. See Currency
Dominican republic. See Santo Domingo
Dos Passos, John; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7

- Doughty, LeGarde S.
Man and mule; P. 510
- Drama. See Krutch, J. W.; Theater, the
- Dress industry; flight from New York city checked by court decision; EP. 30
- Drought; great plains committee, report of; EP. 198
- Drug and food bill. See Food and drug bill
- du Pont, Pierre S.; effort to collect income tax from; EP. 579
- Duranty, Walter
Hitler's house of cards; S. 9
- Durruti, Buenaventura, not same as Marcelo. J. Freeman; C. 139
- Dykstra, Clarence; elected president of university of Wisconsin; EP. 309
- E
- Earle, Governor, letter to The Nation on film censorship; EP. 365
- On suppression of film, "Spain in flames"; E. 396
- Eastman, Joseph B.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Eccles, Marriner, statement on inflation; EP. 338
- Economic conditions; depression, next, planning. P. W. Ward; S. 258; see also E. 255
- Recovery in the United States, by Brookings institute; E. 90
- Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
- Edman, Irwin; comment on poem on use of words. H. Salz; C. 56
- Edmunds, Joseph
Van Sweringen finances; S. 182
- Ekern, H. O.
Film, "Spain in Flames"; C. 660; see also E. 340, E. 396
- Electric boat company; strike; EP. 255
- Electric bond and share case; Judge Mack's decision on share registration; EP. 142
- Elephant boy. M. Van Doren; MP. 489
- Enemy of the people, an. B. B.; D. 248
- Engelbrecht, H. C.
Hitler's spies in Spain; S. 639; see also EP. 634
- England. See Great Britain
- Era of good feeling; E. 201
- Ernst, Morris L.; and Morris Watson. H. Broun; S. 468
- Book, "The ultimate power," praised by rival publishers; E. 201
- Eschleman, Cyrus H.
Nation, The, and the Wagner act; C. with editorial comment. 604; see also C. 688
- Espionage, incorporated. D. Macdonald; S. 238
- Eternal mask, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 80
- Eternal road, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 108
- Ethiopia; massacre of natives by Italians after attack on Graziani; EP. 282
- Europe
- Cooperation, offer by Blum and Eden; EP. 115
- Crisis over Spain; EP. 29
- Democracy on the offensive; E. 608
- Economic war; E. 283
- Militarism. O. G. Villard; S. 240
- Nazi propaganda; EP. 282
- Paying ransom to Hitler; R. Dell; S. 234
- Peace or war; Spain the key; E. 172
- European trials. G. Salvemini; C. 391; see also E. 143
- F
- Faculty wife, a
Franks, G., in Madison; C. 195
- Fairchild, Henry Pratt, reply to. O. G. Villard; S. 185
- Fanatics—and how to know them. J. W. Krutch; S. 242
- Farm tenancy. See Agriculture
- Farmer-labor party of Minnesota; C. R. Walker; S. 292, 318
- Farmers and farms. See Agriculture
- Farrell, James T.; "A world I never made," action against; EP. 86
- Held not obscene; EP. 198
- Fascism
Activity in Baltimore; EP. 421
- Course of. H. C. Wolfe; S. 16
- Democracy, European, on the offensive; E. 608
- Latin America; fascism in. G. Arbaiza; S. 643; see also C. 742
- Methods in America. L. Lore; S. 636; see also EP. 634
- Methods in Spain. H. C. Engelbrecht; S. 639; see also EP. 634
- Rumanian. H. C. Wolfe; S. 507
- Supreme court enlargement issue, and fascism; E. 200
- United States; blueprints for, in Sheppard-Hill and Nye-Maverick bills; E. 496
- See also Great Britain
- Federal communications commission, scandal in the air. P. W. Ward; S. 455
- Federal reserve board raises reserve requirements; EP. 142
- Federal trade commission protection for frauds. P. W. Ward; S. 554
- Feiler, Arthur
Soviet constitution; C. 55
- Feingold, Martha K.
Racial discrimination on the Kungsholm; C. 491
- Feinstein, Isidor
Supreme court and civil liberties, the; S. 151
- Fernsworth, Lawrence; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Ferrero, Vincent; writ against deportation denied; EP. 170
- Films. See moving pictures
- Finance, public
Bonds, United States, slump in; E. 396
- Budget deficit, United States; E. 452
- Budget message, Roosevelt's. P. W. Ward; S. 498
- Chain-store-tax decision by supreme court; EP. 577
- Income tax; effort to collect from P. S. du Pont and J. J. Raskob; EP. 579
- Income tax; upper bracketeers; E. 721
- Income taxes, American and British; EP. 493
- Tax collection, Morgan view on; EP. 664
- Tax-dodgers on parade. E. K. Lindley; S. 667
- Taxation—who should pay? E. 552
- Fischer, Louis
Can Madrid hold out? S. 62
- Neutrality, American; S. 347; see also C. 420
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Reply to letter by B. D. Wolfe, on Catalonia. 658; see also E. 552
- Spain's "red" foreign legion; S. 36
- Spanish rebels and the university city; C. 140
- Trotsky, L., failure; S. 404
- Fischer, Yuri
May day in Moscow; C. 618
- Fleming, Roscoe
Senator Norris's legislature; S. 43
- Flint, Michigan. See Automobiles—Strikes
- Floods; control. J. Rorty; S. 205
- Control projects needed; E. 117
- Florida gambling. H. Broun; S. 73
- Food and drug bill
Battle over; EP. 310
- Coneland bill, reported out of committee; faults. P. W. Ward; S. 231; see also C. 519
- In danger. H. Lewis; S. 461
- Washington dehydrated food company, "vindication." I. D. Cardiff; C. 660
- Food ship. See Nation, The
- Ford, Henry, truth about. O. G. Villard; S. 467
- With Premier Hepburn; EP. 422
- Ford motor company; C. I. O. "raid" on plant. H. Broun; S. 649
- Strike; fight as described by Time; EP. 662
- Forth carpet company; strike. D. Macdonald and S. Rodman; C. 604
- Fortune, Time, Life*. D. Macdonald; S. 500
- 527, 583; see also C. 630, C. 742
- France
- Blum and the communists. M. E. Ravage; S. 41
- Blum, fall of; E. 719
- Blum offers economic cooperation in Europe; EP. 115
- Blum policies in internal and international affairs; EP. 450
- Clichy riot; E. 341
- Crisis, behind the. A. Werth; S. 723
- Rightist press has troubles; EP. 579
- Franco, General. See Spain
- Frank, Gerald
Taxi strike. Toledo; S. 410
- Frank, Glenn. See Wisconsin, university of
- Frankfurter, Felix, candidate of The Nation for supreme court; E. 173; see also C. 335
- Frederika, B. B.; D. 221
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Freedom of speech; Irish. J. O'H. Harte; C. 112; see also C. 392
- Freedom of the stage. See Theater, the
- Freeman, Joseph
Another Durruti; C. 139
- Frey, John P. By P. W. Ward; S. 176
- See also Steel and iron
- Friedenwald, Jonas S.
Palestine, resources; C. 82
- Fulks, Bryan
Citizens' military training camps, recruiting for; C. 575
- G
- G., M.
Promise; D. 79
- G., W. L.
Bernard, John Toussaint; C. 167
- Gambling; Florida. H. Broun; S. 73
- Revenue from. H. Broun; S. 535
- Gammack, T. H.
Wall street now anti-fascist; C. 742; see also 583
- Garcia Casanova, J. M.
Puerto Rico; Ponce massacre; C. 630; see also EP. 337; C. 447
- Garment industry; flight from New York city checked by court decision; EP. 30
- Garner, Vice president; turns on Roosevelt. T. L. Stokes; S. 722
- Garrison, Lloyd, candidate of The Nation for supreme court; E. 173; see also C. 335
- Gaston, Edward Page, and his Patriot guard of America. M. C. Lower; C. 575
- Gelber, Marvin B.
Isolation, by-products of; C. 420; see also 347
- General motors corporation; profile of. S. Romer; S. 96; correction. 168
- See also Automobiles—Strikes
- Germany
- And ethics. O. G. Villard; S. 127
- Broadcasts from Berlin; J. Tiktin; C. 547
- Catholic church, conflict with Nazis; EP. 338; EP. 606; EP. 663
- Colonies, and treatment of natives. O. G. Villard; S. 209; see also C. 547
- Colonies, demand for. S. T. Byington; C. 308
- Criticism, by Nazi standards; EP. 339
- Diplomacy; Dieckhoff, new ambassador to the United States. E. B. Ashton; S. 642
- Economic impasse. A. Vidakovic; S. 125, 153
- Economic weakness; EP. 283
- Education; Heidelberg university today. H. H. Darby; C. 252
- Food situation; coercion of farmers; EP. 366
- Grain, purchases of; EP. 170
- Hitler, LaGuardia attack on; EP. 282
- Hitler regime accused. T. Mann; S. 259
- Hitler's foreign policy; a tangled web; E. 4
- Hitler's fourth anniversary; EP. 114
- Hitler's fourth anniversary message; EP. 141
- Hitler's house of cards; W. Duranty; S. 9
- Hitler's speech of January 30. R. Dell; S. 234
- Jews. See Jews
- Killinger, M. von, new consul general in San Francisco; record; EP. 718
- Loan to, talk of; EP. 198
- Propaganda, Nazi, in other countries; EP. 282
- Religion; Nazi war against churches; EP. 634
- Women workers. J. Grunfeld; S. 29
- Girdler, Tom. See Republic steel corporation
- Godowski, Leopold; views on fatalism and safety in the air. A. Cornfeather; C. 167; see also EP. 34; C. 140
- Gold. See Currency
- Golden, Clinton S.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Good earth, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 194
- Good feeling, era of; E. 201
- Göttingen university; bicentennial; EP. 450
- Columbia and Harvard decline invitations; EP. 551
- Invitations declined; EP. 523
- Government ownership. See Public ownership
- Government, United States. See United States
- Gracia, Jose Fernandez
Rebel turned loyalist; C. 688
- Graham, Whidden
Curley bill on contempt of court proceedings against newspapers; C. 224
- Graziani, Marshal. See Ethiopia
- Great Britain
- Baldwin, key figure of the coronation; EP. 549
- Baldwin resigns; EP. 634
- Baldwin steps down. H. J. Laski; S. 700
- Chamberlain becomes premier; EP. 634
- Chamberlain takes charge; EP. 662
- Coronation; EP. 549
- Coronation, "bunkum and bunting." O. G. Villard; S. 592
- Cripps, S., Socialist leader. H. J. Laski; S. 92
- Divorce bill debated; EP. 115
- Eden offers economic co-operation in Europe; EP. 115
- Fascists checked by bill against political uniforms and private armies; EP. 31
- Foreign enlistment act of 1870, revival; EP. 57
- Income tax, and American; EP. 493
- Kings and bus drivers. H. J. Laski; S. 586
- Labor party, and S. Cripps. H. J. Laski; S. 92
- National defense contribution; EP. 719
- Prestige, lost in Manchuria, Ethiopia and Spain; EP. 226
- Volcano under England. R. Dell; S. 373
- See also British empire; Spain
- Great guy. M. Van Doren; MP. 80
- Great plains committee, report of; EP. 198
- Green, William. See American federation of labor
- Greenhood, David
Animal mystery on display; P. 327
- Griffin, C. O.
Reward of confidence in The Nation's election news; C. 28
- Grimley, Reverend Mr., jests about Spanish bombings; H. Broun; S. 620
- Grunfeld, Judith
Women workers in Nazi Germany; S. 295
- Guernica. See Spain
- Gunther, John; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7

H

- Haggin, B. H.
Answers criticism by S. E. Lesser; C. 364; see also C. 336
Music, recorded; M. 54, 110, 164, 223, 277, 334, 389, 446, 518, 574, 629, 713
- Hagood, General; on national defense. O. G. Villard; S. 155
- Hail-fellows and hermits; EP. 227
- Haiti, 1937. O. G. Villard; S. 267, 297
- Hallgren, Mauritz A.
Behind the Pan-American front; C. 111; see also C. 138
- Hamilton, Walton H., candidate of The Nation for supreme court; E. 173; see also C. 335
- Hanighen, Frank C.
War for raw materials in Spain; S. 456
- Hapgood, Norman; death; EP. 523
- Harassed contractor, a
Red tape in New York city department; C. 28
- Harlan, bloody. F. R. Barkley; S. 532
- Harlow, Jean, death; EP. 662
- Hart, Henry
American writers' congress; C. 741
- Harte, John O'Hara
Free speech in Ireland; C. 112; see also C. 392
- Harvard university; and the social sciences. R. K. Lamb; S. 561; see also C. 686
- Declines invitation to Göttingen bicentenary; EP. 551
- Dismissal of economics instructors, agitation over; EP. 451
- Economics teaching; E. 425
- Law school, new dean, J. M. Landis; EP. 86
- President Conant agrees to consider cases of dismissed instructors; EP. 634
- Harvey, George U., red-baiter; E. 454
- Having wonderful time. J. W. Krutch; D. 276
- Hays, Arthur Garfield
Ponce massacre; S. 647; see also EP. 633
- Seeks to test law on picketing; EP. 226
- Hayti. See Haiti
- Hearst, William Randolph
Asks for help. O. G. Villard; S. 706; see also 703
- Boettiger—his master's voice. E. McGrath and J. P. Dallas; S. 150
- Empire in danger from Securities and exchange commission; S. 703; see also 706
- Newspaper methods; EP. 283
- Heart balm and seduction. W. Seagle; S. 434
- Heidelberg university today. H. H. Darby; C. 252
- Hepburn, Premier. See Automobiles—Strikes
- Herald, Washington. See Washington Herald Tribune, New York. See New York Herald Tribune
- Hermits and hail-fellows; EP. 227
- Herndon, Angelo, freed; EP. 494; see also C. 576
- Herrick, Elinore M.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Hershey company; sitdown strikers assailed by farmers; EP. 422
- High tor. J. W. Krutch; D. 136
- Receives drama critics' award; EP. 366
- Hill-Sheppard bill. See Conscription bill
- Hindenburg, airship, loss of; EP. 550
- History is made at night. M. Van Doren; MP. 419
- History teacher, a
Chicago international schools catholic association, work of; C. 660
- Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
- Hoellering, Franz
Moscow trials; C. 224; see also E. 143
- Hoffman, Harold G.; C. McAlister; S. 559, 588
- Education of; E. 229
- Holding companies; Central states electric corporation, control by H. Williams; EP. 253
- Judge Mack's decision in Electric bond and share case, on registration; EP. 142
- Hollywood. See Censorship, moving pictures; Moving pictures
- Holmes, John Haynes
Palestine, problem of; C. 82
- Honor roll for 1936, The Nation's. 7
- Hooton, Doctor; apology for man; EP. 227
- Hoover, J. Edgar. K. G. Crawford; S. 232, 262
- Horton, Robert W.
Death in the air; S. 94
- Gold, government purchases; S. 638
- Housing
Immediate program for. A. Mayer; S. 505
- Legislation, federal, proposed; Wagner-Steagall bill; EP. 661
- Public, how not to plan. L. Post; S. 344
- Howard, Charles P.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Huebsch, B. W.
O'Faolain, Sean; C. 392; see also C. 112
- Hughes, Charles Evans. See Supreme court
- Hundred white horses, a. A. Smedley; S. 377
- Hungary; Nazi propaganda; EP. 282
- Hutcheson, William, convention. E. Levinson; S. 11

I

- I. W. W. See Strikes
- Ickes, Harold L., apology to. M. S. Mayer; C. 547; see also 177

- Iglesias, Santiago
Puerto Rico and the new deal; C. 447; see also EP. 337; C. 630
- Income tax. See Finance, public
- India; National congress leaders oppose formation of new governments; EP. 366
- Indianapolis automobile race. J. Collier; S. 674
- Indians, American, fiesta in California. M. Rukeyser; S. 616
- Repeal of reorganization act proposed in Wheeler bill; EP. 338
- Industrial workers of the world. See Strikes
- Industry. See New York city
- Inflation. See Currency
- International brigade. See Spain
- Ireland; free speech in; arrest of S. O'Faolain. J. O'H. Harte; C. 112; see also C. 392
- Irish free state, new constitution published; EP. 522
- Irish republican, an
Irishmen in Spain; C. 420; see also EP. 57
- Irishmen in Spain. See Spain
- Iron and steel. See Steel and iron
- Irwin, Roger
Battle of Oshawa; S. 503
- Iscaiot before Pilate. H. Broun; S. 593
- Isolation, by-products of. M. B. Gelber; C. 420; see also 347
- Italians in Spain. See Spain
- Italy
Hollywood in the building; EP. 59
- Jews warned by fascists; EP. 634
- Mussolini assassinates Rosellis; EP. 691
- Mussolini weighs chances in Spain; E. 369
- Press censorship on news from Spain; EP. 691
- Rhetoric—or life. I. Silone; S. 459
- See also Spain

J

- Jackson, Robert H.
Candidate of The Nation for supreme court; E. 173; see also C. 335
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Statement on supreme court proposal; EP. 309
- Jackson, Sidney
Moscow trials; C. 224; see also E. 143
- Jaffe, Jacob H.
Time, articles on; C. 630; see also 500, 527, 583, 630, 742
- Janeway, Eliot
Japan's dilemma; S. 726
- Price boom; S. 406; see also EP. 395
- Janosik, M. Van Doren; MP. 80
- Japan
Civilian parties' victory foreseen; EP. 451
- Dilemma, economic; E. Janeway; S. 726
- Economic and other difficulties; E. 313
- Konoe, F., becomes premier; EP. 663
- Military win new political victory; EP. 395
- Political crisis impends; EP. 522
- Politics; army still in control; EP. 143
- Politics; between military and civilian elements; E. 117
- See also Chinese-Japanese relations
- Java, tire factory in. B. Raymond; C. 27
- Jefferson memorial, protest against. J. P. Marvel and H. S. Churchill; C. 448
- Jennings, Emerson; frame-up; EP. 423
- Retrial for Wilkes-Barre bombing seems certain; EP. 114
- Jews
Anti-semitism; priests admonish parishioners not to work for Jews. Reader, a; C. 660
- German; Hitler mobilizes "Mother Goose." R. Thurston; S. 317
- Italian, warned by fascists; EP. 634
- Polish, plight desperate; EP. 578
- Racial discrimination on steamship Kungsholm. M. K. Feingold; C. 491
- Zionism, promise of. P. S. Bernstein; S. 12
- See also Palestine
- Johnson, Allen; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Johnson, General Hugh S.; and labor. P. W. Ward; S. 314; see also C. 447
- Johnstown strike. See Steel and iron
- Jones, Howard Mumford
Harvard's civil war; C. 686; see also 561
- Judas Iscaiot before Pilate. H. Broun; S. 593
- Judges. See Supreme court, United States
- Judiciary, government by, opinion of T. Paine. R. C. Roper; C. 335
- Juliana, Princess, marriage; Hitler antagonism; EP. 58
- Junior league, and birth control; EP. 551

K

- Keynes, John Maynard; articles in London Times on social reconstruction; E. 145
- Killinger, Manfred von, new German consul general in San Francisco; record; EP. 718
- Kimiko, M. Van Doren; MP. 419
- King Richard II. J. W. Krutch; D. 221

- Kings and bus drivers. H. J. Laski; S. 586
- Krause, E. J.
Zionism a failure; C. 84
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
Aged 26; D. 25
- Amazing Doctor Clitterhouse, the; D. 304
- And now good-bye; D. 193
- Authors; the half-truth of the whole truth; S. 21
- Book reviews, on; S. 438
- But for the grace of God; D. 108
- Candida; D. 361
- Eternal road, the; D. 108
- Fanatics—and how to know them; S. 242
- Freedom and Mr. Minsky; S. 594
- Having wonderful time; D. 276
- High tor; D. 136
- King Richard II.; D. 221
- Masque of kings, the; D. 221
- McCarthy, Mary, and the critics; S. 573; see also 536, 566
- Othello; D. 79
- Penny wise; D. 517
- Pepper mill; D. 79
- Psychoanalyzing Alice; S. 129
- Room service; D. 628
- Saint Thomas and the movies; S. 326
- Show is on, the; D. 79
- Storm over Patsy; D. 333
- Sun kissed; D. 361
- Tobias and the angel; D. 543
- Wingless victory, the; D. 53
- Yes, my darling daughter; D. 248
- Kungsholm, steamship, racial discrimination on. M. K. Feingold; C. 491

L

- L., F.
Chicago newspapers; C. 55
- Labor
Child; amendment; Catholic church opposition; EP. 254
- Amendment, drive for; EP. 58
- Assembly, New York, against amendment. H. Broun; S. 379
- Uncensored column. H. Broun; S. 325
- Convict; supreme court upholds state laws against prison-made goods; EP. 30
- Espionage, incorporated. D. Macdonald; S. 238
- Johnson, General, Hugh S., and labor. P. W. Ward; S. 314; see also C. 447
- Laws against, in Washington and the states. P. W. Ward; S. 370
- Laws, proposed by Roosevelt; EP. 605
- Mexican. See Mexico
- Program for; E. 146
- Right to a job. F. D. Bond; C. 604
- Spies, Pinkerton; EP. 198
- Southern, help asked. I. Thomas; C. 448
- Standards, raising; new wages-and-hours bill; E. 635
- Wages-and-hours bill, new. R. W. Horton; S. 638
- Wagner act; attitude of The Nation blamed and praised; C. 604, 688
- Wagner act, corporations' plot against. P. W. Ward; S. 231; see also C. 335
- Wagner act; decision; E. 423
- Wagner act; workings; E. 692
- Walsh-Healey act; Senator Walsh shows violations; EP. 255
- Weeklies, English and American; EP. 115
- See also Steel and iron; Strikes
- Labor party, British. See Great Britain
- Labor unions
Carpenters' and joiners' convention. E. Levinson; S. 11
- Control by rank and file urged; EP. 143
- Incorporation. P. W. Ward; S. 398
- On the march in Canada and the United States; EP. 494
- Picketing; A. G. Hays seeks to test legality; EP. 226
- Program for; E. 146
- La Follette, Robert M.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- La Follette, Suzanne
On The Nation's editorial on the soviet trials; C. 196; see also E. 143
- LaGuardia, Mayor F. H.; against bill to end third degree; EP. 451
- Attack on Hitler; EP. 282
- Lamb, Robert Keen
Harvard and the social sciences; S. 561; see also C. 686
- Landis, James M., new dean of Harvard law school; EP. 86
- Lang, Fritz; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- Laski, Harold J.
Baldwin steps down; S. 700
- Cripps, S., socialist leader; S. 92
- Kings and bus drivers; S. 586
- Last night, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 602
- Last of Mrs. Cheyney, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 305
- Latin America; fascism in. G. Arbaiza; S. 643; see also C. 742

- Laws, labor. See Labor
 Lawyers. See National lawyers' guild
 League against war and fascism, meeting invaded by fascists; EP..... 421
 League of decency, national. See Censorship, moving pictures
 Le Gaulois, Jean
 Who rules the pope?; C..364; see also.. 120
 Legislation, labor. See Labor
 Legislature, unicameral. See Nebraska
 Leipzig (cruiser). See Spain
 Lerner, Max
 Lippmann, W., and the supreme court; S.. 230
 Remarks on supreme court issue distorted by Washington Herald; EP..... 283
 Leslie, Donald
 Social credit; Troubles in Alberta; S.... 704
 Lesser, Samuel E.
 On Haggin articles on reproduced music; C..336; reply by Haggin..... 364
 Levin, Meyer
 Republic steel strike; slaughter in Chicago; S..... 670
 Levinson, Edward
 Bill Hutchison's convention; S..... 11
 Detroit digs in; S..... 64
 Lewis, Henry
 Food and drug bill; S..... 461
 Lewis, John Llewellyn, and Joe Louis. H. Broun; S..... 156
 Demand on Roosevelt for support; P. W. Ward; S..... 119
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1936.... 7
 Rebuke by Roosevelt; EP..... 113
 See also American federation of labor; Committee for industrial organization
 Liberals. H. Broun; S..... 269
 Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
 Life. See Fortune (for Macdonald articles, etc.)
 Lillenthal, David E.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 See also Tennessee valley authority
 Lindley, Ernest K.
 Tax-dodgers on parade; S..... 667
 Lippmann, Walter, and proposed reorganization of the supreme court. M. Lerner; S..... 230
 Prize piece. O. G. Villard; S..... 72
 Lipsky, Eleazar
 Dilemma in Palestine; C..... 82
 Llewellyn, Karl N.; appointed to New York city industrial advisory board; EP..... 423
 Supreme court, united front on; S..... 288
 London bus drivers' strike. H. J. Laski; S..... 586
 London Times; Keynes articles on social reconstruction; E..... 145
 Lore, Ludwig
 Nazis in America; S..636; see also EP... 634
 Los Rios, Fernando de
 Alas, L.; condemnation to death; C..... 308
 Lost horizon. M. Van Doren; MP..... 305
 Louis, Joe, and J. L. Lewis. H. Broun; S..... 156
 Louisiana chain-store tax decision; EP..... 577
 Love, Paul
 Dance, new forms of; S..... 679
 Love from a stranger. M. Van Doren; MP.... 545
 Love from all; E..... 201
 Love of Jeanne Ney, the. M. Van Doren; MP.. 251
 Lovett, Robert Morris
 Visit to Flint, Michigan, as a General Motors stockholder; S..123; see also C. 195
 Lower, Maude C.
 Patriot guard of America; C..... 575
 Luce, Henry, and Time. See Fortune
 Luce magazines. See Fortune
 Lynchings; house passes anti-lynching bill; EP. 450
- M
- M., M.
 Violence in Indiana; C..... 279
 Macdonald, Dwight
 American writers' congress; C..714; see also C..... 741
 Espionage, incorporated; S..... 238
Time, Fortune, Life; S..500, 527, 583; see also C..630; C..... 742
 Macdonald, Dwight, and S. Rodman
 Carpet workers' strike; C..... 604
 Mack, Judge Julian W.; decision in Electric bond and share case; EP..... 142
 Madden, J. Warren, candidate of The Nation for supreme court; E..173; see also C. 335
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1936.... 7
 Madrid. See Spain
 Maguire, J.
 Broadcasts from Madrid; C..... 448
 "Mail, irregular." See Republic steel corporation
 Malone, Dumas; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Malraux, André; controversy with Trotsky; EP..... 339, 351
 Fighting in Spain; S..315; see also C.. 447
 Speech at The Nation's dinner; EP..... 254
 Man, apology for; EP..... 227
 Man in America, age of. G. Mason; S..... 100
 Man, still very much alive..... 28
 Man who could work miracles, the; M. Van Doren; MP..... 305
 Mann, Thomas
 I accuse the Hitler regime; S..... 259
 I stand with the Spanish people; S..429; EP..... 422
 "Mar Cantabrico," steamship, sinking; EP..... 281; E.. 310
 Marching song. J. W. Krutch; D..... 248
 Marked woman. M. Van Doren; MP..... 545
 Marvel, Josiah P., and H. S. Churchill
 Jefferson memorial, protest against; C.... 448
 Mason, Gregory
 Age of American man; S..... 100
 Masque of kings, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 221
 Maury, H. L.
 Wheeler, Senator, ambition to become president; C.....363; see also EP, 225
 Maverick, Maury, and J. Voorhis
 Unemployment and public works; S..... 557
 May day in America and in Europe; EP..... 521
 May day in Moscow. Y. Fischer; C..... 618
 Mayer, Albert
 Housing, immediate program for; S.... 505
 Mayer, Milton S.
 Apology to Mr. Ickes; C....547; see also 177
 Chicago is broke; S..177; see also C.. 547
 Guild invades Chicago; S..68; see also 167
 C..... 432
 Slow death in Illinois; S..... 432
 McCarl, J. L., Comptroller general, defends his administration; EP..... 87
 McCarthy, Mary
 Actors and critics; S..536, 566; see also 573
 McGrath, Ellen, and J. P. Dallas
 Boettiger—his master's voice; S..... 150
 McLean, George
 Acknowledges award of place on The Nation's honor roll for 1936; C..... 139
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1936.... 7
 McNutt, Paul V., appointment to Philippines; EP..... 226
 McReynolds, Sam; explains neutrality resolutions; EP..... 254
 McReynolds bill. See Neutrality
 Medicine
 Cooperative, tried in Oklahoma. L. Rorty; S..614; see also C..... 688
 Medical censorship in California. L. Symes; S..... 349
 Socialized; clinic for venereal diseases seen as step toward; EP..... 282
 Socialized, considered by American medical association; EP..... 661
 Socialized; doctor's dilemma; E..... 693
 Mellon, Andrew W.; gift of art to the government. H. Broun; S..... 128
 Mencken, H. L.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Mexico; labor, growing pains. L. O. Prendergast; S..... 671
 Vera Cruz, state of; church reopened by President Cardenas; EP..... 198
 Militarism. O. G. Villard; S..... 240
 Miller, John
 Aeronautic accidents; C..140; see also EP..30; C..... 167
 Millionaire, half-brained; EP..... 691
 Minnesota; farmer-labor party. C. R. Walker; S..... 292, 318
 Minsky and freedom. J. W. Krutch; D.... 594
 See also Theater, the
 Mitch, William; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Modern-mindedness. B. Russell; S..... 47
 Mola, General. See Spain
 Monopolies. See Trusts
 Monroe, James, and Roosevelt. S. Naft; C 138; see also..... 111
 Montgomery Advertiser. See Negroes
 Mooney, Tom, loses first round; EP..... 142
 More, Paul Elmer; death; E..... 312
 Morgan, Arthur E. See Tennessee valley authority
 Morgan, J. P., on tax collection; EP..... 664
 Morocco. See Spain
 Moscow trials. See Union of soviet socialist republics
 Motor cars. See Automobiles
 Mount Holyoke college presidency. E. Abbott; C..... 168
 Moving pictures
 Censorship. See Censorship, moving pictures
 Hollywood goes union. M. Ryskind; S.. 563
 Hollywood strike. H. Broun; S..... 565
 Italian Hollywood in the building; EP.. 59
 Reviews. See Van Doren, M
 Saint Thomas and the movies. J. W. Krutch; S..... 326
 Three-dimensional pictures in color, new; EP..... 88
 Mundein, Cardinal, denunciation of Nazis; EP..... 606
 Municipal ownership. See Public ownership
- Murray, Philip; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Music; records, recent. See Haggin, B. H.
 Letter of criticism of articles. S. E. Lesser; C..336; reply by Haggin..... 364 Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
- N
- Naft, Stephen
 Monroe and Roosevelt; C..138; see also 111
 Nashville Tennessean, ownership of:
 E. L. Davis; C. with reply by P. W. Ward..519; See also..... 231
 Nation, The
 Closed shop..604; see also C..... 688
 Election news, reward of confidence in. C. O. Griffin; C..... 28
 "Enemy of the people." S. Beer; C.... 742
 Fair play still its policy; reply to H. Broun; EP..421; see also..... 437
 Farm tenancy program; E..... 257
 Food ship for Spain; E..... 227
 Appeal for; EP..... 282
 Contributions at dinner; EP..... 254
 Food forwarded; E..... 497
 Thanked for aid, by F. de los Rios; C..... 630
 Fourteen points for congress; E..... 31
 Future of; E..... 695
 Honor roll for 1936..7; see also C.... 138
 Peace plan..... 228
 Reform program. P. J. Stearns; C..335; see also E..... 173
 Sale to F. Kirchwey; E..... 666
 Supreme court proposal, attitude toward. O. G. Villard; S..... 352
 Supreme court, views on Roosevelt plans, and suggested appointees; E.169; EP. 173
 Wagner act; The Nation praised. J. F. L. Simpson; C..688; see also C..... 604
 Wertheim letter on attitude of The Nation toward the supreme court; 399; EP..... 394
 National association of manufacturers; disclaims connection with special conference committee. N. Sargent; C..335; with reply by P. W. Ward; see also.. 231
 National defense contribution. See Great Britain
 National lawyers' guild. J. P. Devaney; C... 492
 National league of decency. See Censorship, moving pictures
 Navies; battleships bombed from the air; EP. 663
 Navy, United States. See United States
 "Nazi," president of the sanhedrin; EP.... 142
 Nazis
 In America; E..312; EP..... 394
 Methods in America. L. Lore; S..636; see also EP..... 634
 Methods in Spain. H. C. Engelbrecht; S..639; see also EP..... 634
 No swastikas at New York's world fair. O. G. Villard; S..... 648
 Scouts in Southwest Africa; E..... 581
 See also Germany
 Nebraska; fights for survival. M. S. Stewart; S..... 375
 Norris's legislature, unicameral, meeting. R. Fleming; S..... 43
 Negroes; Scottsboro case; Alabama governor to be petitioned; H. Patterson's conviction upheld by Alabama supreme court; EP..... 690
 Montgomery Advertiser reviews case; EP 690
 Neuberger, Richard L.
 C. I. O.; far western front; S..... 725
 Neurath, Constantin von; visit to London postponed; EP..... 717
 Neutrality
 Another word on. O. G. Villard; S..508; see also..... 148
 Bill not a guaranty of peace to the United States; EP..... 495
 Bill signed by president; E..... 524
 Bills introduced; EP..... 170
 British foreign enlistment act of 1870, revival; EP..... 57
 Keeping America out of war. L. Fischer; S..347; see also C..... 420
 Law found not applicable to civil conflicts; E..... 33
 Legislation needed. O. G. Villard; S..19; see also C..... 167
 Lippmann, Walter, prize piece. O. G. Villard; S..... 72
 Makes wars; E..... 200
 McReynolds explains resolution; EP... 254
 Peace plan, The Nation's..... 228
 Pittman and McReynolds bills; EP..... 337
 Resolution barring arms to Spain passed by congress; EP..... 86
 Rigid laws, danger in; EP..... 1
 Volunteering for service in Spain meets obstacles; EP..... 113
 New Jersey; Governor Hoffman's education; E..... 229
 New London, Texas, school disaster; EP.... 337

- New way's of killing. H. C. Engelbrecht; S. 290
 New workers' school, and Rivera's frescoes. B. D. Wolfe; C. 140
 New York city
 Flight of industry checked by court decision; EP. 30
 Red tape in city department. A harassed contractor; C. 28
 World's fair; no swastikas at. O. G. Villard; S. 648
 New York Herald Tribune; news as printed in. H. Broun; S. 186
 New York state
 Assembly, and action against child-labor amendment. H. Broun; S. 379
 Berg election bills vetoed; EP. 523
 Legislation; EP. 494
 Legislature ends work; EP. 550
 New York Times; news of Spanish war, and other reports, biased; EP. 394
 Strike reporting; E. 426
 New York World-Telegram; negotiations with Newspaper guild break down; EP. 338
 New Yorker, The; goes economic; EP. 311
 Newspaper guild. See Newspapers Newspapers
 American newspaper guild:
 Davis, John W., argument in M. Watson case. H. Broun; S. 241
 Guild invades Chicago. M. S. Mayer; S. 68; see also C. 167
 Negotiations with New York World-Telegram break down; EP. 338
 Seattle Post-Intelligencer—Boettiger—his master's voice. E. McGrath and J. P. Dallas; S. 150
 Votes for affiliation with Committee for industrial organization; EP. 690
 Watson, Morris, and Morris Ernst; H. Broun; S. 468
 American newspaper publishers' association fights supreme court decision. H. Broun; S. 509
 Censorship, Chicago style; F. L.; C. 55
 Chicago. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
 Chicago Jewish daily press, organized 100 per cent. M. Silbert; C. 167; see also Columnists' attitude toward Roosevelt proposal for supreme court; EP. 254
 Crime stories and crime "waves," EP. 365
 Curley bill on contempt of court proceedings. W. Graham; C. 224
 Hearst methods; EP. 283
 News, as printed in the New York Times and New York Herald Tribune. H. Broun; S. 186
 Press handouts in Washington; move to centralize; EP. 31
 Niebuhr, Reinhold
 Pius the eleventh and his successor; S. 130; see also C. 364
 Night must fall. M. Van Doren; MP. 602
 Norris, Senator George W. See Nebraska
 Nye, Gerald P., on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
 Nye-Maverick bill. See Fascism
- O
 Oaths, teachers'; Massachusetts law stands; EP. 395
 O'Faolain, Sean, arrest and detention. J. O'H. Harte; C. 112; see also C. 392
 Oklahoma tries cooperative medicine. J. Rorty; S. 614; see also C. 688
 Oliphant, Herman, candidate of The Nation for supreme court; E. 173; see also C. 335
 Oppressed, superior virtue of. B. Russell; S. 731
 Oregon criminal-syndicalism law, conviction under, overruled by United States supreme court; EP. 30
 Oshawa, Ontario. See Automobiles—Strikes
 Othello. J. W. Krutch; D. 79
 Ownership, public. See Public ownership
- P
 P., R.
 With the international brigade; S. 531
 Pacifism
 Dilemma. N. Thomas; S. 66
 Pacifists, challenge to. V. M. Dean; S. 148; see also C. 420, 508
 Student strike against war; EP. 422
 Pai Chung-hsi. See Chinese-Japanese relations
 Paine, Tom. M. Coleman; C. 252; see also 157
 Bridgebuilder; E. 118
 Opinion on government by judiciary; C. 335
 Palestine
 "Antifa," movement for Jewish-Arab amity. C. B. Sherman; C. 196
 Facts, stubborn; E. 6
 Letters on; C. 82
 Truth about. M. Boukstein; C. 307
 Zionism a failure. E. J. Krause; C. 84
 Palmer, Mrs. A. Mitchell, censors film, "Spain in flames"; E. 340
 Pan-American conference; behind the front. M. A. Hallgren; C. 111; see also C. 138
 Patriot guard of America. M. C. Lower; C. 575
 Peace; conference, Roosevelt belief in; EP. 394
 Plan, The Nation's 228
 See also Pacifism; War
 Pelham, Lenore
 Walrus wept; C. 252
 Penny wise. J. W. Krutch; D. 517
 People's Press, success; EP. 115
 Pepper mill. J. W. Krutch; D. 79
 Perkins, Secretary; declaration on General motors company strike; E. 147
 Philadelphia Record; boycott by Roman Catholics because of attitude toward Spain; J. M. Thompson; C. 686
 Philippine islands
 Exploitation by Quezon. S. Allen; S. 320; see also EP. 311
 Triumvirate for the islands; EP. 226
 Who owns? J. S. Allen; S. 463
 Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
 Physicians. See Medicine
 Picketing. See Labor unions
 Pierce, Ross
 Happenings after death; P. 471
 Pilate's autobiography, extract from. H. Broun; S. 593
 Pinkerton spies; EP. 198
 Pittman bill. See Neutrality
 Pittsburgh, university of, bureau of business research and "The economics of the iron and steel industry"; C. 630; see also 538
 Pius the eleventh; illness; EP. 2
 See also Roman catholic church
 Place, B. C.; not of General Motors. 224; see also 96
 Plainsman, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 137
 Plays. See Krutch, J. W.; B. B.
 Plough and the stars, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 194
 Poems
 Animal mystery on display. D. Green-hood 327
 Girl at the play. M. Rukeyser 300
 Happenings after death. R. Pierce. 471
 Love poem. R. Denney. 271
 Man and mule. L. S. Doughty. 510
 Pattern for death. J. Still. 22
 West by the rain. D. Schubert. 243
 Word for winter, a. D. S. Savage. 102
 Poland. See Jews
 Police; third degree. W. D. Allen; C. 742
 Third degree, Mayor LaGuardia against bill to end it; EP. 451
 Ponce. See Puerto Rico
 Pope. See Pius the eleventh; Roman catholic church
 Post, Langdon
 Housing, public; how not to plan; S. 344
 Post-Intelligencer, Seattle. See Seattle Post-Intelligencer
 "Power"; play; E. 256
 Power and power industry; companies fight public ownership. C. D. Thompson; C. 575 Prendergast, L. O.
 Mexican labor, growing pains; S. 671
 Presidential election of 1936; election news of The Nation and P. W. Ward; reward of confidence in. C. O. Griffin; C. 28
 Press. See Newspapers
 Prices; boom. E. Janeway; S. 406; see also EP. 395
 Roosevelt and prices. P. W. Ward; S. 428
 Prince and the pauper, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 602
 Prison-made goods. See Labor—Convict
 Prisoners. M. Van Doren; MP. 305
 Professors, purchase of. R. Brindze; S. 208
 Promise. M. G.; D. 79
 Pruette, Lorine
 Absentee owners; C. 195; see also 123
 Psychoanalyzing Alice. J. W. Krutch; S. 129
 Public finance. See Finance, public
 Public ownership; fought by power companies. C. D. Thompson; C. 575
 Public utilities; control by. H. Williams; EP. 253
 Washington state tax outlawed by United States supreme court; EP. 141
 Public works, and unemployment. J. Voorhis and M. Maverick; S. 557
 Puerto Rico
 And the New deal. S. Iglesias; C. 447; see also EP. 337; C. 630
 Birth-control information passed; EP. 522
 Demonstration against government at Ponce; EP. 337; see also C. 447; C. 630
 Liberty and death in. O. G. Villard; S. 371
 Ponce massacre. A. G. Hays; S. 647; see also EP. 633
 Reconstruction. O. G. Villard; S. 408
 Winship must go; E. 694
- Q
 Quebec, fascist government; EP. 367
 Quezon, Manuel. See Philippine islands
- R
 Race-track betting, revenue from. H. Broun; S. 535
 Racial discrimination on steamship Kungsholm. M. K. Feingold; C. 491
 Racketeering; Dewey investigation in New York; EP. 143
 Radicals; Oregon criminal-syndicalism law overruled by United States supreme court; EP. 30
 Red-baiting, by Al Smith and G. U. Harvey; E. 454
 Radio
 Broadcasts from Berlin. J. Tiktin; C. 547
 Broadcasts from Madrid. J. Maguire; C. 448
 Broadcasting monopoly; S. 430
 Railroads; pension plan, compromise; EP. 339
 Van Sweringen finances. J. Edmunds; S. 182
 Raskob, John J.; effort to collect income tax from; EP. 579
 Raushenbush, Stephen
 Conscription bill; S. 236
 Ravage, M. E.
 Blum and the communists; S. 41
 Raymond, Bernard
 Tire factory in Java; C. 27
 Razumov. M. Van Doren; MP. 362
 Reader, A.
 Catholic Americana; C. 660
 Records, music. See Haggin, B. H.
 Recovery, economic. See Business
 Red-baiting, by Al Smith and George U. Harvey; E. 454
 Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
 Repression, repealing. L. Colman; C. 576; see also EP. 494
 Republic steel corporation. See Steel and iron—Strikes
 Restaurant racketeering; New York investigation; EP. 143
 Reviews, book. See Books; also Book section of index
 Revolutionists. M. Van Doren; MP. 80
 Rexists. See Belgium
 Rhetoric—or life. I. Silone; S. 459
 Right to a job. F. D. Bond; C. 604
 Rights, civil. See Civil rights
 Rios, Fernando de los
 Thanks The Nation for aid to Spain; C. 630
 Rivera, Diego, frescoes. B. D. Wolfe; C. 140
 Roberts, Kingsley
 Cooperative medicine; C. 688; see also 614
 Robinson, Senator Joseph T.; not fit for supreme court bench; E. 609
 On relief; E. 720
 Rockefeller, John D., death; E. 609
 Rodman, Selden, and D. Macdonald
 Carpet workers' strike; C. 604
 Roman catholic church
 Boycott of Philadelphia Record because of attitude toward Spain. J. M. Thompson; C. 686
 Chicago international schools catholic association, work of. History teacher, a; C. 660
 Child labor amendment, opposition to; EP. 254
 Germany. See Germany
 Mexico. See Mexico
 Pius the eleventh and his successor; R. Niebuhr; S. 120; see also C. 364 Priests admonish parishioners not to work for Jews. Reader, a; C. 660
 Romer, Samuel
 Profile of General motors; S. 96; correction 168
 Romm, Vladimir. P. W. Ward; S. 147
 Room service. J. W. Krutch; D. 628
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
 Administration:
 And the trusts. P. W. Ward; S. 526
 Bureaucracy; P. W. Ward; S. 8
 Drift, not mastery; E. 3
 Economy, ill-timed; EP. 493
 Garner turns on Roosevelt. T. L. Stokes; S. 722
 Labor laws, proposed; EP. 605
 Labor policy; letter president ought to write. O. G. Villard; S. 729
 Legislative program. P. W. Ward; S. 258; see also E. 255
 Measures stalled; EP. 577
 Relief and budget message. P. W. Ward; S. 498
 Washington battlefield; E. 665
 Washington, situation in. O. G. Villard; S. 534
 And Monroe. S. Naft; C. 138; see also 111
 And prices. P. W. Ward; S. 427
 Inaugural address; EP. 114
 Inauguration; EP. 85
 Lewis, J. L., rebuke to; EP. 113
 Message to congress; E. 59
 Message to congress. P. W. Ward; S. 63
 Peace conference, president's belief in; EP. 394
 Radio speech on supreme court proposal; E. 284; EP. 309
 Supreme court proposal, fight on. P. W. Ward; S. 202

- Supreme court reconstruction plans; EP. 169; E. 173
- Unemployment relief, curtailment recommended by president; EP. 58
- Roper, R. C.
- Paine, T., opinion on government by judiciary; C. 335
- Rorty, James
- Flood control; S. 205
- Moscow trials; C. 252; see also E. 143
- Oklahoma tries cooperative medicine; S. 614; see also C. 688
- Rosellis assassinated by Mussolini; EP. 691
- Royden, A. Maude
- Colonies, views on; C. 547; see also 209
- Rubber; tire factory in Java. B. Raymund; C. 27
- Rukeyser, Muriel
- Girl at the play; P. 300
- Indian fiesta in California; S. 616
- Rumania; fascism. H. C. Wolfe; S. 507
- Nazi propaganda; EP. 282
- Runciman, Walter, visit to Roosevelt; EP. 115
- Rural electrification administration failure; shake-up impends. P. W. Ward; S. 343; see also C. 491
- Russell, Bertrand
- On being modern-minded; S. 47
- Oppressed, superior virtue of; S. 731
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Ryskind, Morrie
- It happened one night (Hollywood goes union); S. 563
- S
- Sailors. See Shipping
- Saint Thomas and the movies. J. W. Krutch; S. 326
- Salvemini, Gaetano
- European trials; C. 391; see also E. 143
- Salz, Helen
- Comment on Edman poem on use of certain words; C. 56
- Sandburg, Carl; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- Santo Domingo, 1937. O. G. Villard; S. 323
- Sargent, Noel
- National association of manufacturers and special conference committee; C. 335; see also 231
- Savage, D. S.
- Word for winter, a; P. 102
- School disaster, Texas; EP. 337
- Schools. See Teachers
- Schubert, David
- West by the rain; P. 243
- Scottsboro case. See Negroes
- Scudder, D.
- "Snuggery," word; C. 167
- Seagle, William
- Heart balm and seduction; S. 434
- Seamen. See Shipping
- Seattle elections; labor wins; EP. 311
- Seattle Post-Intelligencer; Boettiger—his master's voice. E. McGrath and J. P. Dallas; S. 150
- Seduction suits outlawed. W. Seagle; S. 434
- Seldes, George
- Franco's death list; S. 555
- Sex, legislation in, recent. W. Seagle; S. 434
- Seymour, Charles, selection for president of Yale university; EP. 199
- Shall we dance? M. Van Doren; MP. 685
- Share-croppers. See Agriculture
- Shensi. See China
- Sheppard-Hill bill. See Fascism
- Sherman, Charles B.
- "Antifa," movement for Jewish-Arab amity; C. 196
- Shipping; strikes; help for strikers asked. S. J. Smith; C. 28
- Strikes; Pacific coast, men return to work; EP. 170
- Show is on, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 79
- Silbert, Morris
- Chicago Jewish daily press, organized 100 per cent; C. 167; see also 68
- Silicosis, Caterpillar traction company treatment of victims. M. S. Mayer; S. 432
- Silone, Ignazio
- Rhetoric—or life; S. 459
- Simpson, J. Fred L.
- Praises The Nation for approval of Wagner act; C. 688; see also C. 604
- Sinclair, Upton
- Supreme court; C. 335
- Sit-down strikes. See Strikes
- Slocum, Frank D.
- Collective action not preventive of war; C. 420
- Spanish government rights denied by United States; C. 575
- Smedley, Agnes
- Chiang-Kai-shek, capture by Chang Hsueh-liang; S. 180; see also EP. 170
- Hundred white horses, a; S. 377
- Not secretary to Mrs. Sun Yat-sen. 520
- Smith, Al., red-baiter; E. 454
- Smith, Edwin S.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- Smith, James
- Hearst, William R.; empire may be wrecked by Securities and exchange commission; S. 703; see also 706
- Smith, Paul C., on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- Smith, Sarah Jackson
- Help for striking seamen; C. 28
- Snowden, Philip; death. O. G. Villard; S. 619
- "Snuggery," word. D. Scudder; C. 167
- Social credit. See Alberta
- Social reconstruction; Keynes articles in London Times; E. 145
- Social regeneration; reply to H. P. Fairchild. O. G. Villard; S. 185
- Social security; act upheld by supreme court; E. 607
- Action needed. M. S. Stewart; S. 582
- Socialist party, British. See Great Britain
- Socialist party; Chicago convention; EP. 395
- Socialized medicine. See Medicine
- Soong, T. V. See China
- South, the; labor, help asked. I. Thomas; C. 448
- See also Agriculture
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Spain
- Alas, Doctor L., condemned to death. F. de Los Rios; C. 308
- Almeria, shelling of, by German warship; E. 665
- American committee for Spanish relief continues work for Franco; EP. 579
- Anarchists. J. Freeman; C. 139
- Basque children find refuge; EP. 606; EP. 662
- Bilbao:
- And the world's conscience; E. 523
- British backdown on blockade; EP. 422
- Fall of; EP. 718
- Fight for; EP. 494; EP. 689
- Holds out; EP. 578
- Bombings treated as a jest. H. Broun; S. 620
- Bowers, Ambassador, whereabouts; EP. 365
- British foreign enlistment act of 1870, revival; EP. 57
- Broadcasts from Madrid. J. Maguire; C. 448
- Cabinet, new; EP. 577
- Can Madrid hold out? L. Fischer; S. 62
- Catalonia, struggle in. B. D. Wolfe; C. 657; with reply by F. Fischer; see also E. 552
- Conflicting opinions on situation; EP. 197
- Deutschland, battleship, bombed from air; EP. 663
- European crisis over Spain; EP. 29
- Fascist front, German-Italian, holds; E. 88
- Fascist government set up by Franco; EP. 494
- Fighting man's fate. A. Malraux; S. 315; see also C. 447
- Food ship. See Nation, The
- Franco favored by state department?; E. 285
- Franco gives his views; E. 174
- Franco's death list. G. Seldes; S. 555
- Government forces gain; EP. 29; EP. 225; EP. 254; EP. 394; EP. 605
- Government forces take offensive; EP. 450
- Government holding its own; EP. 142
- Government makes headway; EP. 281
- Government rights denied by United States. F. D. Slocum; C. 575
- Guernica, bombing of; EP. 551
- Guernica, bombing of, and other atrocities by the rebels; E. 523
- Hitler's spies in Spain. H. C. Engelbrecht; S. 639; see also EP. 634
- Hull, secretary, reverses stand on passports for relief missions; EP. 310
- International brigade (Abraham Lincoln brigade); R. P.; S. 531
- Irishmen in Spain. An Irish republican; C. 420; see also EP. 57
- Italian and German forces in Spain; EP. 366
- Italian and German intervention in the balance; E. 369
- Italians on the run; EP. 309; EP. 338
- Leipzig, cruiser, alleged attack on; EP. 718
- Madrid civilian government reestablished; EP. 494
- Malaga, loss by loyalists; EP. 169
- Mann, T., with the Spanish people. T. Mann; S. 429; EP. 422
- "Mar Cantabrico," steamship, sinking; EP. 281; EP. 310
- Mola, General, death; EP. 662
- Morocco front; E. 60
- Nation, The*, thanked for aid. F. de los Rios; C. 630
- Neurath visit to London postponed; EP. 717
- Neutrality, American. L. Fischer; S. 347; see also C. 420
- Neutrality law, American, found not applicable to civil conflicts; E. 33
- Neutrality, one-sided; EP. 366
- New York Times news, biased; EP. 394
- Philadelphia Record; boycott by Roman Catholics. J. M. Thompson; C. 686
- Press censorship in Italy on news from Spain; EP. 691
- Raw materials, war for. F. C. Hanighen; S. 456
- Rebel turned loyalist. J. F. Gracia; C. 688
- Rebels' entry into university city. L. Fischer; C. 140
- "Red" foreign legion. L. Fischer; S. 36
- Refugees; homeless million. L. Stowe; S. 702
- Relief, American, for Franco; E. 553
- Seaman does his bit. R. B.; C. 138
- Showdown in Rome; E. 424
- Socialist view, a. N. Thomas; S. 698
- "Spain in flames," moving picture, censored in Pennsylvania; E. 340; see also EP. 365; E. 396; C. 660
- Spain the key to European peace or war; E. 172
- Spirit of Spain; R. A.; C. 391
- See also Neutrality
- Speech, freedom of. See Freedom of speech
- Spies, Pinkerton; EP. 198
- Stage. See Theater, the
- Staley, Eugene
- Neutrality, effective; C. 167; see also 19
- Stambaugh, Michigan. See Academic freedom
- Stearns, Perry J.
- Reform program, The Nation's; C. 335; see also E. 173
- Steel and iron
- Aliquippa celebrates. R. M. Stein; S. 466
- Aliquippa workers vote for Committee for industrial organization; EP. 606
- Frey, J. P. confers with Carnegie-Illinois steel corporation; EP. 310
- Labor: United States steel yields to Committee for industrial organization; E. 286
- Steel masters talk with Committee for industrial organization; EP. 253
- Steel workers' organizing committee; work at Weirton. R. M. Stein; C. 27
- Strikes:
- Committee for industrial organization calls supporting strikes; EP. 690
- Republic Steel Corporation:
- Battle of Chicago; EP. 363
- Chicago; film, suppressed; EP. 717
- Chicago slaughter. M. Levin; S. 670
- Corporation sticks to its guns. R. M. Stein; S. 668
- Girdler defiance of law; E. 664
- "Mail, irregular"; incident seen by D. Thompson; EP. 663
- Washington looks at steel. T. L. Stokes; S. 696
- Youngstown and Johnstown; EP. 717
- Steel workers' organizing committee, the; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936. 7
- See also Steel and iron
- Stein, Rose M.
- Aliquippa celebrates; S. 466
- Books for workers asked; C. 548
- Republic steel strike; S. 668
- Weirton, fall of; C. 27
- Stewart, Maxwell S.
- Nebraska fights for survival; S. 375
- Social security, action needed; S. 582
- Still, James
- Pattern for death; P. 22
- Stocks, market recession; E. 525
- Stokes, Thomas L.
- Garner turns on F. D. R.; S. 722
- Washington looks at steel; S. 696
- Stolberg, Benjamin
- Committee for industrial organization marches on; S. 203
- Trotsky, L., on the U. S. S. R.; S. 401
- Stone, Hannah M.
- Birth control wins; S. 70
- Stone, Harlan F.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- Stores, chain. See Chain stores
- Storm over Patsy. J. W. Krutch; D. 333
- Stowaway. M. Van Doren; MP. 26
- Stowe, Leland
- Spain's homeless million; S. 702
- Strikes
- Anderson, Indiana, violence. M. M., and H. Vorse; C. 279
- Government attitude. P. W. Ward; S. 35
- Government intervention, dispute over; E. 397
- Picketing. See Labor unions
- Settling; law and reality; Wagner act workings; E. 692
- Sit-down:
- And the I. W. W. By J. Anderson; C. 55
- Developing as technique and issue; EP. 226
- Hysteria; E. 368
- Law and; E. 171
- Legality coming; EP. 310

- Legality of; E. 340
 Views of J. P. Frey, P. W. Ward; S. 176
- See also Automobiles; Bus drivers, London; Carpet workers; Electric boat company; Ford motor company; Forth carpet company; Hershey company; moving pictures; Shipping; Steel and iron; Taxicabs; Woolen mills
- Students' strike against war; EP. 422
 Sugar pact, world, signing of, EP. 550
 Sun and I, the. B. B.; D. 304
 Sun kissed. J. W. Krutch; D. 361
 Sun Yat-sen, Mrs.; A. Smedley not her secretary 520
- Supreme court, United States
 And civil liberties. I. Feinstein; S. 151
 Borah speech in defense of court; EP. 141
 Chain-store-tax decision; EP. 577
 Crucial battles yet to come; EP. 1
 Decisions in cases involving prison-made goods and Oregon criminal-syndicalism law; EP. 30
 Outlaws Washington state utility tax; EP. 141
 Program for the judicial power; E. 89
 Robinson, Senator, not fit for bench; E. . . 608
 Roosevelt reform proposal:
 Bill reported unfavorably by committee; EP. 689
 Bills in congress. P. W. Ward; S. 63
 Broun, H., views on Roosevelt proposal; and on liberals; S. 269
 Columnists' attitude toward Roosevelt proposal; EP. 254
 Court of big business. U. Sinclair; C. Debate impending; EP. 225; see also C. 364
 Discord among the members; EP. 393
 Enlargement issue, and fascism; E. 201
 Going liberal? E. 367
 Government by judiciary, opinion of T. Paine. R. C. Roper; C. 335
 Hughes checkmates the president. R. S. Allen; S. 610
 Judges are human; E. 451
 Legality of president's proposal; EP. . . . 339
 Lerner comments on president's plan distorted by Washington Herald; EP. 283
 Lippmann, W., and proposed reorganization of court. M. Lerner; S. 230
 Proposals for reform; publicity for justices. H. Broun; S. 353
 Proposals of American bar association in 1921; EP. 719
 Public problem number one; E. 255
 Reconstruction, Roosevelt plans; EP. 169; E. 173; see also C. 335
 Reform proposal; liberals need awakening. H. Broun; S. 730
 Roosevelt radio speech; E. 284
 Roosevelt radio speech and statement by R. H. Jackson; EP. 309
 Roosevelt will win; P. W. Ward; S. 202
 United front on; K. N. Llewellyn; S. 288; see also E. 284
 Wertheim, M., open letter to The Nation on attitude of The Nation toward the court; 399; EP. 394
 Social security act upheld; 607
 Van Devanter resignation; E. 607
 Wagner act decision; E. 423
 Wagner act decision; American newspaper publishers association fights decision. H. Broun; S. 509
 Waiting for decisions; EP. 253
- Swanson, Louis
 Teachers in Stambaugh, Michigan, gain rights; C. 491
 Swedish-American line. See "Kungsholm"
 Sweezy, Alan, term at Harvard cut; E. . . . 423
 Symes, Lillian
 Medical censorship in California; S. 349
 Syphilis. See Venereal diseases
- T
- T., C.
 Puerto Rico; Ponce massacre; C. 630; see also EP. 337; C. 447
 Taft, Charles P., speech to the D. A. R.; EP. 495
 Tapley, Roberts
 Cardinal of the Medici, a; review of; C. 741; see also 623
 Tariff, United States
 Anglo-American agreement discussed by Roosevelt and Runciman; EP. 115
 Textiles, tariff on, in way of aid for labor; EP. 423
 Trade agreements act, extension asked by Roosevelt; EP. 115
 Taxation. See Finance, public
 Taxicabs, strike. G. Frank; S. 410
 Teachers
- De Voto, Bernard, and Kitty Smith, F. Dell; S. 98
 New Orleans meeting shows courage and intelligence; EP. 254
 Oaths of allegiance; Massachusetts law stands; EP. 395
 See also Academic freedom
- Tenancy, farm. See Agriculture
 Tennessee valley authority; crisis. P. W. Ward; S. 91
 Morgan-Lilienthal feud, and power company stubbornness; EP. 86
Tennessean, Nashville. See Nashville Tennessean
 Texas school disaster; EP. 337
- Textiles
 Agreement with Japan; EP. 199
 World conference; E. 453
 World conference; tariffs in way of aid for labor; EP. 423
- Theater, the Actors and critics. M. McCarthy; S. . . . 536; 566; see also 573
 Freedom of the stage. J. W. Krutch; D. . . 594
 Prize of Drama critics' circle awarded to High tor; EP. 366
 "Tenderness" coming in again; EP. . . . 283
 See also Censorship, stage; and B., B.; G. M.; Krutch, J. W. (for reviews of plays)
- Third degree. See Police
 Thomas, Irene
 Help for southern labor asked; C. 448
 Thomas, Norman
 Pacifist's dilemma; S. 66
 Spain: A socialist view; S. 698
 Thompson, Carl D.
 Power companies' fight against public ownership; C. 575
 Thompson, Dorothy, and the "irregular mail" incident; EP. 663
 Thurston, Ralph
 Hitler mobilizes "Mother Goose"; S. . . . 317
 Tiktin, Judah
 Broadcasts from Berlin; C. 547
- Time
 Story of Ford strike fight; EP. 662
 See also Fortune (for Macdonald articles)
- Times, London. See London Times
 Times, New York. See New York Times
 Tires. See Rubber
 Tobias and the angel. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . 543
 Toledo taxi strike. G. Frank; S. 410
 Torres Rioseco, A.
 Latin America dilemma; C. 742; see also 643
 Toscanini, Arturo; radio plans; EP. 171
 Tracy, Spencer; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- Trade agreements. See Tariff, United States
 Trade commission, Federal. See Federal trade commission
 Tragical history of Doctor Faustus, the. B. B.; D. 108
 Trials, European. G. Salvemini; C. 391; see also E. 143
 Tribune, new English labor weekly; EP. . . . 115
 Trotsky, Leon; commission, work of; E. . . . 496
 Failure. L. Fischer; S. 404
 In Mexico; EP. 58
 Malraux, A., controversy with; EP. 339; 351
 On the U. S. S. R. By B. Stolberg; S. . . . 401
 Trusts; Roosevelt administration and monopolies. P. W. Ward; S. 526
 Turney, Robert; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936 7
- U
- Unemployment relief
 And public works. J. Voorhis and M. Maverick; S. 557
 Curtailment recommended by Roosevelt; EP. 58
 Long-range planning needed; EP. 2
 Program for relief; E. 61
 Relief bill, passage; EP. 606
 Robinson, Senator, on relief; E. 720
 Roosevelt message. P. W. Ward; S. 498
 Works progress administration; new set-up. P. W. Ward; S. 287
- Unicameral legislature. See Nebraska
 Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
 "Cleanings" continue; EP. 578
 Constitution, new. A. Feiler; C. 55
 Executions of generals; EP. 691
 Hundred white horses, a. A. Smedley; S. . . 377
 May day in Moscow. Y. Fischer; C. 618
 Moscow trials; EP. 114; E. 143; see also C. 196, 224, 252, 391
 Views of O. G. Villard attacked. O. G. Villard; S. 564
 Romm case. P. W. Ward; S. 147
 Trotsky, L. See Trotsky, L.
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
 United automobile workers of America. See Automobiles
- United States
 Age of man in America. G. Mason; S. . . . 100
 Armed forces, proposed reorganization. O. G. Villard; S. 155
 Congress. See Congress
 Constitution. See Constitution, United States
 Finance. See Finance, public
 Government press handouts in Washington; move to centralize; EP. 31
 Government reorganization; planned; EP. . 87
 Proposed. P. W. Ward; S. 91
 Report, Brownlow; E. 116
 Navy policy a contradiction of foreign policy; EP. 283
 Supreme court. See Supreme court, United States
 Unemployment and public works. J. Voorhis and M. Maverick; S. 557
 United States steel corporation. See Steel and iron University of Wisconsin. See Wisconsin, university of Utilities, public. See Public utilities
- V
- Van Devanter, Justice, resignation; E. 607
 Van Doren, Mark
 Abyssinia; MP. 26
 After the thin man; MP. 80
 Beloved enemy; MP. 80
 Black legion; MP. 137
 Cabinet of Doctor Caligari, the; MP. . . . 137
 Camille; MP. 194
 Captains courageous; MP. 679
 Czar to Lenin; MP. 362
 Elephant boy; MP. 489
 Eternal mask, the; MP. 80
 Good earth, the; MP. 194
 Great guy; MP. 80
 History is made at night; MP. 410
 Janosik; MP. 80
 Kimiko; MP. 419
 Last night, the; MP. 602
 Last of Mrs. Cheyne, the; MP. 305
 Lost horizon; MP. 305
 Love from a stranger; MP. 545
 Love of Jeanne Ney, the; MP. 251
 Man who could work miracles, the; MP. . . 305
 Marked woman; MP. 545
 Night must fall; MP. 602
 Plainsman, the; MP. 137
 Plough and the stars, the; MP. 194
 Prince and the pauper, the; MP. 602
 Prisoners; MP. 305
 Razumov; MP. 362
 Revolutionists; MP. 80
 Shall we dance? MP. 685
 Stowaway; MP. 26
 Wave, the; MP. 545
 Wedding of Palo, the; MP. 305
 Woman alone, the; MP. 305
- Van Sweringen corporation, sale of notes to the public; EP. 87
 Van Sweringen finances. J. Edmunds; S. . . 182
 Venereal diseases; government campaign for public education; EP. 3
 Opposition of doctors to free clinics; EP. . 282
 Vera Cruz, state of. See Mexico
 Vidakovic, Alexander
 Germany's economic impasse; . . . S. . . 125, 153
 Villard, Oswald Garrison
 Issues and men:
 Armament race; S. 677
 Armed forces, United States, proposed reorganization; S. 155
 Brisbane, Arthur; S. 45
 Colonies, German treatment of; S. 209; see also C. 547
 Coronation, "bunkum and bunting"; S. . . 592
 Davis, Norman, open letter to; S. 677
 Ford, Henry, truth about; S. 467
 Frank, Glenn, case of; S. 101
 Germany and ethics; S. 127
 Hagood, General, on national defense; S. . . 155
 Haiti, 1937; S. 267, 297
 Hearst asks for help; S. 706; see also 703
 Lippmann, Walter, prize piece; S. 72
 Militarism; S. 240
 Moscow trials, views on, attacked; S. . . 564
 Nation, The, attitude on supreme court proposal; S. 352
 Neutrality; S. 508; see also 148
 Neutrality; legislation needed; S. 19; see also C. 167
 No swastikas at New York's world fair; S. 648
 Roosevelt; a letter he ought to write; S. . . 729
 Santo Domingo, 1937; S. 323
 Snowden, P., death; S. 619
 Social regeneration, reply to H. F. Fairchild; S. 185

- Washington, situation in; S..... 534
 World war—twenty years after; S.. 436
 Puerto Rico, liberty and death in; S..... 371
 Puerto Rico, reconstruction in; S..... 408
 Voorhis, Jerry, and M. Maverick
 Unemployment and public works; S..... 557
 Vorse, Heaton
 Violence in Indiana; C..... 279

W

- WPA. See Works progress administration
 Wages-and-hours bill. See Labor
 Wagner act. See Labor
 Wagner-Steagall bill. See Housing, public
 Walker, Charles R.
 Farmer-labor party of Minnesota; S 292, 318
 Strike in Flint; S..... 175
 Wall street; now anti-fascist. T. H. Gammack; C..742; see also..... 583
 Walrus wept. L. Pelham; C..... 252
 Walsh, J. Raymond, term at Harvard cut; E. 425
 Walsh-Healey act. See Labor
 War

- And democracy. N. H. Crowell; C..420;
 see also..... 148
 Collective action not a preventive. F. D.
 Slocum; C..... 420
 Conscription bill, American. S. Raushen-bush; S..... 236
 Drift to; E..... 665 Measures for, United States, tend to fascism; E..... 496
 New ways of killing. H. C. Engelbrecht;
 S..... 290
 See also Neutrality; Pacifism; Peace

Ward, Paul W.

- Articles by:
 Automobile strike; S..... 91
 Consumer double-crossed by congress;
 S..231; see also.....C 335; C 519
 Corporations' plot against Wagner act; S..231; see also C..... 335
 Election news, reward of confidence in. C. O. Griffin; C..... 28
 Federal communications commission, scandal in the air; S..... 455
 Federal trade commission protection for frauds; S..... 554
 Frey, John P.; S..... 176
 Government reorganization, proposed;
 S..... 91
 Johnson, General, and labor; S..... 314
 Labor unions, incorporation; S..... 398
 Lewis, J. L. demand on Roosevelt;
 S..... 119
 Perkins, Secretary, declaration on General Motors company strike;
 E..... 147
 Romm, Vladimir; S..... 147
 Roosevelt II and the trusts; S..... 526
 Roosevelt and prices; S..... 427
 Roosevelt message to congress; S..... 63
 Roosevelt relief and budget message;
 S..... 498
 Rural electrification administration;
 failure; shake-up impends; S..343;
 see also C..... 491
 Strike, automobile, government attitude; S..... 35
 Supreme court proposal; Roosevelt will win; S..... 202
 Tennessee valley authority crisis;
 S..91; correction..... 339
 Works progress administration; new set-up; S..... 287
 Goes to London for Baltimore Sun; EP.. 579
 Johnson, H. S., states case against statements by Ward; letter replies; C..447;
 see also..... 314
 Nashville Tennesseean, ownership of. Letter by E. L. Davis, with reply by Ward;
 C..519; see also..... 231
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Washington letter, see Washington, letters from

- Warne, Colston E.
 Consumers on the march; S.....645, 675
 Washburn, J. Gowen
 Puerto Rico; Ponce massacre; C..630;
 see also EP..337; C..... 447
 Washington. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
 Washington battlefield; E..... 665
 Washington, District of Columbia, Jefferson memorial, protest against. J. P. Marvel and H. S. Churchill; C..... 448
 Washington, letters from, P. W. Ward; S..8,
 35, 63, 91 (correction, EP, 339); 119,
 147, 176, 202, 231 (see also C, 335);
 258, 287, 314, 343 (see also C, 491);
 370, 398, 427, 455, 498, 526, 554
 Washington dehydrated food company. I. D.
 Cardiff; C..... 660
 Washington Herald; distorts Lerner remarks on supreme court; EP..... 283
 Washington state; utility tax outlawed by United States supreme court; EP..... 141

- Watkins, Ralph S.
 Bureau of business research, university of Pittsburgh, and "The economics of the iron and steel industry"; C..630;
 see also..... 538
 Watson, Morris; and Morris Ernst. H. Broun;
 S..... 468
 See also Newspapers—American newspaper guild
 Wave, the. M. van Doren; MP..... 545
 Wedding of Palo, the. M. Van Doren; MP.. 305
 Wehle, Louis B., correction of reference to;
 EP..339; see also..... 91
 Weirton. See Steel and iron
 Werth, Alexander
 French crisis; S..... 723
 Wertheim, Maurice
 Open letter on attitude of The Nation toward the supreme court; 399; EP... 394
 Westbrook, Lawrence
 Farm tenancy; a program; S..39; see also
 EP..... 31
 Wheeler, Burton K.; ambition to become president. H. L. Maury; C..364; see also
 EP..... 225
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Wheeler bill. See Indians
 Wilkes-Barre bombing case. See Jennings, E.
 Williams, Harrison; control of Central states electric corporation; EP..... 253
 Windsor, duke of, marriage; EP..... 607
 Wingless victory, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 53
 Winship, Governor. See Puerto Rico
 Wisconsin, university of Dykstra, C., elected president; EP..... 309
 Frank, Glenn, case of. O. G. Villard;
 S..... 101
 Franks, Glenn, in Madison. Faculty wife;
 C..... 195
 Ousting of President Frank; EP..... 59
 Wolfe, Bertram D.
 Catalonia, struggle in; C..657; with reply by L. Fischer; see also E..... 552 Rivera's frescoes, and the New workers' school; C..... 140
 Wolfe, Henry C.
 Fascism charts its course; S..... 16
 Fascism in Roumania; S..... 507
 Woman alone, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 305
 Women; charter offered; provisions; EP... 3
 Workers in Nazi Germany. J. Grunfeld;
 S..... 295
 Woolen mills, strikers, appeal for. J. Chupka;
 C..... 168
 Words, certain, use of; comment on Edman poem. H. Salz; C..... 56
 Works, public. See Public works
 Works progress administration; new set-up. P.
 W. Ward; S..... 287
 World-Telegram. See New York World-Telegram
 World's Fair, New York. See New York city
 World war; twenty years after. O. G. Villard;
 S..... 436
 Writers. See Authors
 Writers' congress. See American writers' congress

Y

- Yale university; C. Seymour selected for president; EP..... 199
 Yes, my darling daughter. J. W. Krutch; D.. 248
 Young, Art; on The Nation's honor roll for 1936..... 7
 Youngstown strike. See Steel and iron

Z

- Zerwick, M. B.
 Hollywood index; S..... 18
 Zionism. See Jews; Palestine

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

- B Book review
 AN Brief annotation
 R Reviewer

A

- Æ's letters to Minanlabain; AN..... 516
 Adams, Mrs. Henry
 Letters, 1865-1883. Edited by W. Thoron;
 AN..... 193
 Adler, Mortimer J.
 Art and prudence; B..... 326
 Aeschylus
 Agamemnon. Translated by L. MacNeice;
 B..... 680
 Aesthetic theories of Kant, Hegel and Schopen-hauer, the. I. Knox; AN..... 192

- After the genteel tradition. American writers since 1910. Edited by M. Cowley; B.. 707
 Agamemnon of Aeschylus, the. Translated by
 L. MacNeice; B..... 680
 Albee, George
 Young Robert; AN..... 388
 Alcott, Bronson, biography. O. Shepard; B... 650
 Alfange, Dean
 Supreme court and the national will, the;
 B..... 682
 All good Americans. J. Behr; AN..... 389
 Allen, Robert S., and D. Pearson
 Nine old men, the; B..... 187
 Amberley papers, the. The letters and diaries of Bertrand Russell's parents. B. and
 P. Russell; B..... 624
 America dancing. J. Martin; R..... 163
 American city. A rank and file history. C. R.
 Walker; B..... 327
 Andrews, John Williams
 Prelude to "Icaros"; AN..... 25
 Angels in undress. M. Benney; AN..... 516
 Anna Becker. M. White; B..... 273
 Annals of the New York stage. Volume IX.
 G. C. D. Odell; B..... 511
 Another such victory. C. Cuthbert; B..... 300
 Antigua stamp, the. R. Graves; AN..... 332
 April. A fable of love. V. Fisher; B..... 214
 Armfield, Eugene
 Where the weak grow strong; B..... 132
 Armstrong, Hamilton Fish
 "We or they"—Two worlds in conflict; B 103
 Army without banners. E. O'Malley; B..... 387
 Arnett, Alex Mathews
 Claude Kitchin and the Wilson war policies; B..... 709
 Arouse and aware. MacK. Kantor; AN..... 25
 Art and prudence. M. J. Adler; B..... 326
 Art and society. H. Read; B..... 301
 As I was going down Sackville street. Oliver
 St. John Gogarty; B..... 441
 Ascent of F6, the. W. H. Auden and C. Isher-wood; B..... 439
 Aspects of Wilde. V. O'Sullivan; AN..... 135
 Atoms, men, and stars. R. D. Rusk; B..... 626
 Auden, W. H.
 On this island; B..... 214, 354
 Auden, W. H., and C. Isherwood
 Ascent of F6, the; B..... 439

B

- Bach, Julian S., Jr.; R..... 707
 Barnes, Djuna
 Nightwood; B..... 382
 Barzun, Jacques; R..... 482
 Bates, Ralph
 Rainbow fish; B..... 472
 Bates, Ralph; R..... 103
 Beach, Susan Hicks
 Cardinal of the Medici, a. Being the memoirs of the nameless mother of the cardinal Ippolito de' Medici; B..623;
 see also C..... 741
 Beachcroft, T. O.
 You must break out—sometimes; AN.... 445
 Becker, Carl; R..... 48
 Beckford, G. Chapman; B..... 568
 Behind the Spanish barricades. J. Langdon-
 Davies; B..... 103
 Behr, Jerome
 All good Americans; AN..... 389
 Belitt, Ben; R..... 131, 329, 439, 571, 656
 Benney, Mark
 Angels in undress; AN..... 516
 Bernard Shaw, Frank Harris, and Oscar
 Wilde; R. H. Sherard. Preface by Lord
 Alfred Douglas; B..... 220
 Between the hammer and the anvil. E. Seaver;
 B..... 300
 Binns, Archie
 Laurels are cut down, the; B..... 539
 Biography of Traman. W. T. Scott; B..... 570
 Bixler, Paul; R..... 193
 Blackmur, R. P.
 From Jordan's delight; B..... 512
 Blythe, LeGette
 Marshal Ney: A dual life; B..... 443
 Boas, George
 Primer for critics, a; B..... 359
 Bogan, Louise
 Sleeping fury, the; B..... 488
 Book of contemporary short stories, a. Edited by D. Brewster. Appendix on writing the short story, by L. B. Gilkes; B..... 131
 Book of hours, a. D. C. Peattie; B..... 469
 Book of the symphony, a. B. H. Haggin; B... 482
 Borchard, Edwin, and W. P. Lage
 Neutrality for the United States; B..... 595
 Bowen, Marjorie
 William Hogarth: The cockney's mirror;
 B..... 25
 Boys in the back room, the (Les copains).
 J. Romans. Translated by J. Le Clerq;
 AN..... 416
 Bradford, Roark
 Three-headed angel, the; B..... 539

- Brand, Millen
Outward room, the; B..... 542
- Brawne, Fanny
Letters to Fanny Keats, 1820-1824; B.. 413
- Bread and sword. E. Scott; B..... 484
- Bread and wine. I. Silone. Translated by G. David and E. Mosbacher; B..... 412
- Brewster, Dorothy; R..... 472, 572
- Brindze, Ruth; R..... 107
- Brookings institute
Recovery problem in the United States, the; E..... 90
- Bruun, Geoffrey; R..... 443
- Buckskin breeches. P. Stong; B..... 539
- Burke, Kenneth; R..... 131, 622
- Butler, Samuel, study of. M. Muggeridge; B. 383

C

- Cabell, Branch
Smire; AN..... 389
- Cabinet government. W. I. Jennings; B..... 244
- Calder-Marshall, Arthur
Pie in the sky; AN..... 303
- Caldwell, Erskine
Sacrilege of Alan Kent, the; B..... 76
- Cardinal of the Medici, a. Being the memoirs of the nameless mother of the cardinal Ippolito de' Medici. S. H. Beach; B..... 623; see also C..... 741
- Carnap, Rudolph
Logical syntax of language, the. A. Smeaton, translator; B..... 599
- Catherine de' Medici and the lost revolution. R. Roeder; B..... 75
- Centennial essays for Pushkin. Edited by S. H. Cross and E. J. Simmons; B..... 515
- Ch'ao-ting Chi
Key economic areas in Chinese history; B. 133
- Chapman, Guy
Beckford; B..... 568
- Charles M. Doughty; B..... 299
- Chase, Stuart; R..... 510
- Chen Han-seng
Landlord and peasant in China; B..... 133
- Chevallier, Gabriel
Scandals of Clochemerle, the. J. Godefroi, translator; AN..... 628
- Chi, Ch'ao-ting
Key economic areas in Chinese history; B. 133
- China, two books on; B..... 133
- Clapp, Frederick Mortimer
New poems; B..... 23
- Clark, Charles E.; R..... 682
- Clark, Jane Perry; R..... 739
- Claude Kitchin and the Wilson war policies. A. M. Arnett; B..... 709
- Cocteau, Jean
Infernal machine, the. Introduction and English version by C. Wildman; B.... 158
- Coffin, Charles Monroe
John Donne and the new philosophy; B.. 443
- Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Kennebec: Cradle of Americans; B..... 736
- Competition and cooperation among primitive peoples. Edited by Margaret Mead; B.. 440
- Constitutional government and politics. C. J. Friedrich; B..... 739
- Corle, Edwin
People on the hearth; B..... 539
- Court disposes, the. I. Feinstein; B..... 682
- Crane, Hart. The life of an American poet. P. Horton; B..... 733
- Croquet player, the. H. G. Wells; B..... 329
- Crowthier, J. G.
Famous American men of science; B.... 626
- Curti, Merle
Peace or war. The American struggle, 1636-1936; B..... 219
- Cuthbert, Clifton
Another such victory; B..... 300

D

- Dance of the quick and the dead, an entertainment of the imagination. S. Sitwell; B. 598
- Darkling plain. S. B. Field; AN..... 192
- Daugherty, Carroll R., M. G. de Chazeau, and S. S. Stratton
Economics of the iron and steel industry, the; B.. 538; see also C..... 630
- Dear Theo: The autobiography of Vincent Van Gogh. Edited by I. Stone; B..... 601
- de Chazeau, Melvin G., C. R. Daugherty, and S. S. Stratton
Economics of the iron and steel industry, the; B.. 538; see also C..... 630
- Decline and fall of the romantic ideal, the. F. L. Lucas; B..... 50
- Denmark—the cooperative way. F. C. Howe; B..... 107
- Deutsch, Babette; R..... 598
- Dewey, John; R..... 412
- Diary of Vaslav Nijinsky, the. Edited by R. Nijinsky; B..... 78

- Dictionary of slang and unconventional English, a. E. Partridge; B.. 478; see also C..... 688
- Dinneen, Joseph F.
Ward eight; AN..... 25
- Doberer, Kurt, and M. Seydewitz
Todesstrahlen und andere kriegswaffen; S..... 290
- Dobson, Ruth Lininger
Straw in the wind; B..... 246
- Donne, John, and the new philosophy. C. M. Coffin; B..... 443
- Doughty, Charles M., three books on; B..... 299
- Dreyfus case, the. By the man Alfred Dreyfus and his son Pierre Dreyfus. Translated and edited by D. C. McKay; B..... 651

E

- Earnest atheist, the. A study of Samuel Butler. M. Muggeridge; B..... 383
- Economics of the iron and steel industry, the. C. R. Daugherty, M. G. de Chazeau, and S. S. Stratton; B.. 538; see also C. 630
- Edman, Irwin; R..... 22, 50
- Edmunds, Craddock
Five men: A poem; B..... 656
- Education and the class struggle: A critical examination of the liberal educator's program for social reconstruction. Z. Slesinger; B..... 412
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo; The lonely wayfarer man: Emerson and some Englishmen. T. Scudder; AN..... 25
- Engelbrecht, H. C.; R..... 290
- Engstrand, Stuart David
Invaders, the; B..... 246
- Ernst, Morris L.
Ultimate power, the; B..... 187
- Escape to the tropics. D. Holdridge; AN..... 516
- Examination of logical positivism, an. J. R. Weinberg; B..... 599

F

- Facing the tax problem. A survey of taxation in the United States and a program for the future. Prepared under the auspices of the committee on taxation of the Twentieth century fund; B..... 653
- False security: The betrayal of the American investor. B. J. Reis. Introduction by J. T. Flynn; B..... 597
- Famous American men of science. J. G. Crowthier; B..... 626
- Far-eastern crisis, the. H. L. Stimson; B.... 24
- Farrell, James T.; R..... 244, 300
- Feinstein, Isidor
Court disposes, the; B..... 682
- Fergusson, Francis; R..... 163
- Feuchtwanger, Lion
Pretender, the; B..... 684
- Field, Sara Bard
Darkling plain; AN..... 192
- Final struggle, the: Being Countess Tolstoi's diary from 1910. Translated by A. Maude; B..... 272
- Fischer, Louis; R..... 404
- Fish, Hamilton: The inner history of the Grant administration. A. Nevins; B.. 276
- Fisher, Vardis
April. A fable of love; B..... 214
- Five men: A poem. C. Edmunds; B..... 656
- Fletcher, Phineas, man of letters, science, and divinity. A. B. Langdale; AN..... 516
- Földes, Jolán
Street of the fishing cat, the; B..... 50
- Forbes, Esther
Paradise; B..... 302
- Ford, Ford Madox
Great trade route; B..... 358
- Portraits from life; B..... 358
- Foreigner looks at the TVA, a. O. Keun; B.. 510
- Forty years on Main street. W. A. White; B.. 476
- Forward from liberalism. S. Spender; AN.... 354
- Fox, Ralph
Novel and the people, the; B..... 651
- Friedrich, Carl Joachim
Constitutional government and politics; B. 739
- Friedrich, Carl Joachim; R..... 711
- From Jordan's delight. R. P. Blackmur; B... 512
- Fuchs, Daniel
Low company; B..... 244

G

- Gale, Zona
Light woman; AN..... 628
- Gaudy empire, the. A. Neumann. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B..... 655
- Geismar, Maxwell; R. 220, 243, 383, 444, 568, 650
- Genzmer, George; R. 478; see also C..... 688
- Gessner, Robert
Some of my best friends are Jews; B.... 52
- Gide, André
Retour de l'U. R. S. S.; B..... 210

- Gods arrive, the. G. Lewi; AN..... 389
- Gogarty, Oliver St. John
As I was going down Sackville street; B. 441
- Goldberg, Isaac
Major Noah: American-Jewish pioneer; AN..... 444
- Golden fleece of California, the. E. L. Masters; AN..... 516
- Gordon, Caroline
None shall look back; AN..... 332
- Graves, Robert
Antigua stamp, the; AN..... 332
- Great trade route. F. M. Ford; B..... 358
- Gregory, Horace; R..... 104, 388, 414
- Groseclose, Elgin
Persian journey of the reverend Ashley Wishard and his servant Fathi, the; AN..... 445
- Grown-ups, the. C. Whitcomb; AN..... 303
- Gruening, Ernest; R..... 516
- Guedalla, Philip
Hundred years, the; B..... 161
- Gunther, John; R..... 212

H

- Haggin, B. H.
Book of the symphony, a; B..... 482
- Hagood, Major General Johnson
We can defend America; B..... 134
- Hallgren, Mauritz A.
Tragic fallacy, the; B..... 479
- Hamilton, Walton H.; R..... 76
- Hamilton Fish: The inner history of the Grant administration. A. Nevins; B..... 276
- Hamsun, Knut
Ring is closed, the; B..... 568
- Han-seng, Chen
Landlord and peasant in China; B..... 133
- Harris, Frank, Bernard Shaw, and Oscar Wilde. R. H. Sherard. With Preface by Lord A. Douglas; B..... 220
- Hart Crane. The life of an American poet. P. Horton; B..... 733
- Haslip, Joan
Parnell; B..... 104
- Herndon, Angelo
Let me live; B..... 414
- Herskovits, Melville J.
Life in a Haitian valley; B..... 567
- Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 474
- Herzog, George; R..... 567
- Heth, Edward Harris
Told with a drum; AN..... 164
- Hitler's drive to the east. F. E. Jones; B.... 707
- Hogarth, William: The cockney's mirror. M. Bowen; B..... 24
- Hogben, Lancelot
Mathematics for the million; B..... 380
- Holdridge, Desmond
Escape to the tropics; AN..... 516
- Hopkins, Gerard Manley
Notebooks and papers, the. Edited by H. House; B..... 511
- Horton, Philip
Hart Crane. The life of an American poet; B..... 733
- Housman, Laurence
Unexpected years, the; AN..... 417
- Howe, Frederic C.
Denmark—the cooperative way; B..... 107
- Huberman, Leo
Man's worldly goods; B..... 76
- Human comedy, the. J. H. Robinson. Introduction by H. E. Barnes; B..... 48
- Hundred years, the. P. Guedalla; B..... 160
- Hutchinson, R. C.
Shining scabbard; B..... 191

I

- I can get it for you wholesale. J. Weidman; B..... 572
- Ideology and utopia. K. Mannheim. Translated by L. Wirth and E. Shils; B.... 131
- Infernal machine, the. J. Cocteau; introduction and English version by C. Wildman; B. 158
- Inquiry into the nature and causes of the wealth of nations, an. A. Smith. Edited by E. Cannan; B..... 356
- Invaders, the. S. D. Engstrand; B..... 246
- Invasion. M. Van der Meerich; B..... 130
- Invertebrate Spain. J. Ortega y Gasset. Translated by M. Adams; B..... 735
- Isherwood, Christopher, and W. H. Auden
Ascent of F6, the; B..... 439

J

- Japan, two books on; B..... 476
- Japan's feet of clay. F. Utley; B..... 476
- Jeffers, Robinson, book about. R. Gilbert; AN. 191
- Jennings, W. Ivor; R..... 244
- John Donne and the new philosophy. C. M. Coffin; B..... 442

- Johnson, Edgar
One mighty torrent: The drama of biography; B 622
- Johnson, Gerald W., F. R. Kent, H. L. Mencken, and H. Owens
Sunpapers of Baltimore, the, 1837-1937; B 540
- Johnson, Josephine
Jordanstown; B 487
- Jones, F. Elwyn
Hitler's drive to the east; B 707
- Jordanstown, J. Johnson; B 487
- K
- Kalm, Peter
Travels in North America; B 361
- Kantor, MacKinlay
Arouse and aware; AN 25
- Kataev, Valentine
Peace is where the tempests blow. C. Malamuth, translator; B 486
- Katz, Leo; R 301
- Kay-Scott, Cyril; R 22
- Kaye-Smith, Sheila
Rose Deeprose; AN 106
- Kennebec: Cradle of Americans. R. P. T. Coffin; B 736
- Kent, Frank R., G. W. Johnson, H. L. Mencken, and H. Owens
Sunpapers of Baltimore, the, 1837-1937; B 540
- Keun, Odette
Foreigner looks at the TVA, a; B 510
- Key economic areas in Chinese history. Ch'ao-tung Chi; B 133
- King John. W. Shakespeare. Edited by J. D. Wilson; AN 517
- Kipling, Rudyard
Something of myself; B 243
- Kitchin, Claude, and the Wilson war policies. A. M. Arnett; B 709
- Knight, C. Wilson
Principles of Shakespearean production; B 188
- Knox, Israel
Aesthetic theories of Kant, Hegel and Schopenhauer, the; AN 192
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R. 74, 157 (see also C, 252); 270, 326, 380, 469, 511
- L
- Lage, William Potter, and E. Borchard
Neutrality for the United States; B 595
- Lancer at large. F. Yeats-Brown; AN 164
- Landlord and peasant in China. Chen Hanseng; B 133
- Landlord and tenant on the cotton plantation. T. J. Wooster, junior; E 257
- Langdon-Davies, John
Behind the Spanish barricades; B 103
- Laski, Harold J.; R 244
- Last romantic, the. W. Orton; AN 303
- Late George Apley, the. J. P. Marquand; B 77
- Laurels are cut down, the. A. Binns; B 539
- Lawrence, Josephine
Sound of running feet, the; AN 106
- Lawrence: The last crusade. S. Rodman; AN 417
- Lawyer Lincoln. A. A. Woldman; AN 416
- Lazare, Christophe; R 191, 487
- Lee, Lawrence
Monticello and other poems; B 360
- Lenin, letters of. Translated and edited by E. Hill and D. Mudie; B 480
- Lenrow, Elbert; R 189
- Lerner, Max; R 187
- Let me live. A. Herndon; B 414
- Letters of Fanny Brawne to Fanny Keats, 1820-1824; B 413
- Letters of Lenin, the. Translated and edited by E. Hill and D. Mudie; B 480
- Letters of Mrs. Henry Adams, the, 1865-1883. Edited by W. Thoron; AN 193
- Letters of William and Dorothy Wordsworth. The middle years (1806-1820). Arranged and edited by E. de Selincourt; B 481
- Levin, Harry; R 358, 485, 651, 684
- Levin, Meyer
Old bunch, the; B 384
- Levy, Julien
Surrealism; B 102
- Lewi, Grant
Gods arrive, the; AN 389
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
Trumpet of jubilee; B 708
- Life in a Haitian valley. M. J. Herskovits; B 567
- Life of Charles M. Doughty, the; B 299
- Life of Jesus. F. Mauriac; B 331
- Life of Richard Wagner, the. Volume II: 1848-1860. E. Newman; B 189
- Light woman. Z. Gale; AN 628
- Lincoln, lawyer. A. A. Woldman; AN 416
- Living again. Captain F. Riesenber; B 386
- Living in Tokyo. K. Sansom; B 476
- Livingston, Arthur; R 735
- Lloyd George, David
War memoirs. Volumes V and VI; B 211
- Logical syntax of language, the. R. Carnap. Translated by A. Smeaton; B 599
- Lonely wayfaring man, the: Emerson and some Englishmen. T. Scudder; AN 25
- Long way from home, a. C. McKay; B 414
- Lore, Ludwig; R 480
- Low company. D. Fuchs; B 244
- Lucas, F. L.
Decline and fall of the romantic ideal, the; B 50
- Ludwig, Emil
Nile, the: The life-story of a river; B 216
- Lynd, Robert S.; R 440
- Lynd, Robert S. and Helen Merrell Lynd
Middletown in transition; B 474
- M
- Macdonald, Dwight; R. 538; see also C 630
- Magic of monarchy, the. K. Martin; B 737
- Major Noah: American-Jewish pioneer. I. Goldberg; AN 444
- Mannheim, Karl
Ideology and utopia. W. Wirth and E. Shils, translators; B 131
- Man's worldly goods. L. Huberman; B 76
- Marburg, Anita; R 272
- Marquand, John P.
Late George Apley, the; B 77
- Marshal Ney: A dual life. LeG. Blythe; B 443
- Martin, John
American dancing; B 163
- Martin, Kingsley
Magic of monarchy, the; B 737
- Masters, Edgar Lee
Golden fleece of California, the; AN 516
- Whitman; B 330
- Mathematics for the million. L. Hogben; B 380
- Maugham, W. Somerset
Theatre; AN 332
- Mauriac, François
Life of Jesus; B 331
- Maurois, André
Miracle of England, the: An account of her rise to preeminence. H. Miles, translator; B 483
- Maverick, Maury
Maverick American, a; B 734
- Maverick American, a. M. Maverick; B 734
- Maxwell, William
They came like swallows; AN 627
- McCarthy, Mary; R 25, 132, 302, 417
- McCleary, Dorothy
Naked to laughter; AN 106
- McKay, Claude
Long way from home, a; B 414
- Mencken, H. L., G. W. Johnson, F. R. Kent, and H. Owens
Sunpapers of Baltimore, the, 1837-1937; B 540
- Metaphysical poets, the. A study in religious experience. H. C. White; B 442
- Middletown in transition. R. S. Lynd and H. M. Lynd; B 474
- Midnight on the desert. J. B. Priestley; AN 444
- Millis, Henry Alvin
Sickness and insurance. A study of the sickness problem and health insurance; B 385
- Millis, Walter
Viewed without alarm: Europe today; B 212
- Milton, George Fort; R 276
- Miracle of England, the: An account of her rise to preeminence and her present position. A. Maurois. Translated by H. Miles; B 483
- Mitchell, Burroughs; R 25, 516
- Mitchell, Wesley C.; R 356
- Monticello and other poems. L. Lee; B 360
- Moore, Marianne; R 158
- Mortgage your heart. S. K. Winther; B 246
- Muggeridge, Malcolm
Earnest atheist, the. A study of Samuel Butler; B 383
- N
- N., R.; R 331
- Naked to laughter. D. McCleary; AN 106
- Neff, Emery; R 514
- Neumann, Alfred
Gaudy empire, the. E. and C. Paul, translators; B 655
- Neutrality for the United States. E. Borchard and W. P. Lage; B 595
- Neville, Helen; R 417, 445
- Nevins, Allan
Hamilton Fish: The inner history of the Grant administration; B 276
- New poems. F. M. Clapp; B 23
- Newhouse, Edward
This is your day; B 300
- Newman, Ernest
Life of Richard Wagner, the. Volume II: 1848-1860; B 189
- Ney, Marshal: A dual life. LeG. Blythe; B 443
- Nietzsche, the philosophy of; B 710
- Nightwood. D. Barnes; B 382
- Nijinsky, Vaslav, diary of, the. Edited by R. Nijinsky; B 78
- Nile, the: The life-story of a river. E. Ludwig. Translated by M. H. Lindsay; B 216
- Nine old men, the. D. Pearson and R. S. Allen; B 187
- Nirdlinger, Virginia; R 24
- Noah, Mordecai Manuel, biography. I. Goldberg; AN 444
- Noel-Baker, Philip
Private manufacture of armaments, the; B 439
- None shall look back, C. Gordon; AN 332
- Noon wine. K. A. Porter; B 571
- Not all rivers. A. Spadoni; AN 163
- Notebooks and papers of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the. Edited by H. House; B 511
- Novel and the people, the. R. Fox; B 651
- Novel in motley, the. A history of the burlesque novel in English. A. B. Shepperson; AN 136
- Novikoff-Priboy, A.
Tsushima. E. and C. Paul, translators; B 190
- O
- Odell, George C. D.
Annals of the New York stage; B 511
- Oenslager, Donald
Scenery then and now; B 161
- Of mice and men. J. Steinbeck; B 275
- Old bunch, the. M. Levin; B 384
- O'Malley, Ernie
Army without banners; B 387
- On the contented life. E. A. Singer, junior; B 22
- On this island. W. H. Auden; B 214, 354
- One mighty torrent: The drama of biography. E. Johnson; B 622
- Ortega y Gasset, José
Invertebrate Spain. M. Adams, translator; B 735
- Orton, William
Last romantic, the; AN 303
- O'Sullivan, Vincent
Aspects of Wilde; AN 135
- Outward room, the. M. Brand; B 542
- Owens, Hamilton, G. W. Johnson, F. R. Kent, and H. L. Mencken
Sunpapers of Baltimore, the, 1837-1937; B 540
- P
- Paine, Tom, biography. H. Hesketh; B 157; see also C 252
- Paradise. E. Forbes; B 302
- Parnell. J. Haslip; B 104
- Parsons, Alice Beal; R 216
- Partridge, Eric
Dictionary of slang and unconventional English, a; B. 478; see also C 688
- Peace is where the tempests blow. V. Kataev. Translated by C. Malamuth; B 486
- Peace or war. The American struggle, 1636-1936. M. Curti; B 219
- Pearson, Drew, and R. S. Allen
Nine old men, the; B 187
- Pearson, Hesketh
Tom Paine, friend of mankind; B. 157; see also C 252
- Peattie, Donald Culross
Book of hours, a; B 469
- Pedlar's progress. The life of Bronson Alcott. O.; Shepard; B 650
- People on the hearth. E. Corle; B 539
- Persian journey of the reverend Ashley Wishard and his servant Fathi, the. E. Groseclose; AN 445
- Personal realism. J. B. Pratt; B 301
- Peter Kalm's travels in North America; B 361
- Philosophy of Nietzsche; B 710
- Phineas Fletcher, man of letters, science, and divinity. A. B. Langdale; AN 516
- Pickering, Ruth; R 78
- Pie in the sky. A. Calder-Marshall; AN 303
- Political and economic democracy. Edited by M. Ascoli and F. Lehmann. Foreword by A. Johnson; B 711
- Porter, Katherine Anne
Noon wine; B 571
- Portraits and self-portraits. Collected and illustrated by George Schreiber; B 22
- Portraits from life. F. M. Ford; B 358
- Pratt, James Bissett
Personal realism; B 301
- Prelude to "Icaros." J. W. Andrews; AN 25
- Pretender, the. L. Feuchtwanger; B 684
- Priestley, J. B.
Midnight on the desert; AN 444
- Primer for critics, a. G. Boas; B 359
- Primitivism and decadence. A study of American experimental poetry. Y. Winters; B 216
- Principles of Shakespearean production. C. W. Knight; B 188
- Private manufacture of armaments, the. P. Noel-Baker; B 439
- Pushkin. E. J. Simmons; B 218
- Pushkin, centennial essays for. Edited by S. H. Cross and E. J. Simmons; B 515

R

- Radziwill, Catherine; R..... 655
 Rahv, Philip; R..... 273, 384, 412, 486, 733
 Rainbow fish. R. Bates; B..... 472
 Ratcliffe, S. K.; R..... 211
 Raushenbush, Stephen; R..... 439, 595
 Ravage, M. E.; R..... 210
 Read, Herbert
 Art and society; B..... 301
 Recovery problem in the United States, the.
 The Brookings institute; E..... 90
 Reis, Bernard J.
 False security: The betrayal of the American investor. Introduction by J. T. Flynn; B..... 597
 Reis, Lincoln; R..... 359
 Remarque, Erich Maria
 Three comrades. A. W. Wheen, translator; B..... 485
 Reperusals and recollections. L. P. Smith; B..... 159
 Retour de l'U.R.S.S. By A. Gide; B..... 210
 Revolution betrayed, the. L. Trotsky. Translated by M. Eastman; B..... 401
 Rice, Philip Blair; R..... 25, 192, 360, 512
 Richter, Conrad
 Sea of grass, the; B..... 247
 Riesenbergh, Captain Felix
 Living again; B..... 386
 Ring is closed, the. K. Hamsun; B..... 568
 Roberts, Donald A.; R..... 516
 Robinson, James Harvey
 Human comedy, the. Introduction by H. E. Barnes; B..... 48
 Rodman, Selden
 Lawrence: The last crusade; AN..... 417
 Roeder, Ralph
 Catherine de' Medici and the lost revolution; B..... 75
 Rogers, Lindsay; R..... 737
 Romans, Jules
 Boys in the back room, the (Les copains). J. Le Clerq, translator; AN..... 416
 Rorty, James; R..... 327, 385
 Rose Deeprose. S. Kaye-Smith; AN..... 106
 Rudlin, W. A.; R..... 624
 Rusk, Rogers D.
 Atoms, men, and stars; B..... 626
 Russell, Bertrand, and Patricia Russell
 Amberley papers, the. The letters and diaries of Bertrand Russell's parents; B..... 624
 Russell, George W.
 AE'S letters to Minanlabain; AN..... 516

S

- Sacrilege of Alan Kent, the. E. Caldwell; B..... 76
 Sansom, Katharine
 Living in Tokyo; B..... 476
 Saroyan, William
 Three times three; B..... 76
 Sayers, Michael; R..... 159, 247, 601
 Scandals of Clochemerle, the. G. Chevallier. Translated by J. Godefroi; AN..... 628
 Scenery then and now. D. Oenslager; B..... 161
 Schapiro, Meyer; R..... 103
 Schuyler, Jack; R..... 626
 Scott, Evelyn
 Bread and a sword; B..... 484
 Scott, Winfield Townley
 Biography of Traman; B..... 570
 Scudder, Townsend
 Lonely wayfaring man, the: Emerson and some Englishmen; AN..... 25
 Sea of grass, the. C. Richter; B..... 247
 Seaver, Edwin
 Between the hammer and the anvil; B..... 300
 Seydewitz, Max, and K. Doberer
 Todesstrahlen und andere neue kriegswaffen; S..... 290
 Shakespeare, William
 King John. Edited by J. D. Wilson; AN..... 517
 Shaw, Bernard, Frank Harris, and Oscar Wilde. R. H. Sherard; with preface by Lord A. Douglas; B..... 220
 Shepard, Odell
 Pedlar's progress. The life of Bronson Alcott; B..... 650
 Shepperson, Archibald Bolling
 Novel in motley, the. A history of the burlesque novel in English; AN..... 136
 Sherard, Robert Harborough
 Bernard Shaw, Frank Harris, and Oscar Wilde; with preface by Lord A. Douglas; B..... 220
 Shine, perishing republic. R. Gilbert; AN..... 191
 Shining scabbard. R. C. Hutchinson; B..... 191
 Sickness and insurance. A study of the sickness problem and health insurance. H. A. Millis; B..... 385

- Sillen, Samuel; R..... 444
 Silone, Ignazio
 Bread and wine. G. David and E. Mosbacher, translators; B..... 412
 Simmons, Ernest J.
 Pushkin; B..... 218
 Simonson, Lee; R..... 161
 Singer, Edgar A., junior
 On the contented life; B..... 22
 Sitwell, Sacheverell
 Dance of the quick and the dead, an entertainment of the imagination; B..... 598
 Sleeping fury, the. L. Bogan; B..... 488
 Slesinger, Zalmen
 Education and the class struggle: A critical examination of the liberal educator's program for social reconstruction; B..... 412
 Smire, B. Cabell; AN..... 389
 Smith, Adam
 Inquiry into the nature and causes of the wealth of nations, an. Edited by E. Cannan; B..... 356
 Smith, Caroline; R..... 106, 163, 332, 388, 539, 627
 Smith, Logan Pearsall
 Reperusals and recollections; B..... 159
 Snyder, Charles Lee; R..... 416
 Social security. M. S. Stewart; B..... 650; correction of price..... 712
 Some of my best friends are Jews. R. Gessner; B..... 52
 Something of myself. R. Kipling; B..... 243
 Sound of running feet, the. J. Lawrence; AN..... 106
 Spadoni, Adriana
 Not all rivers; AN..... 163
 Spender, Stephen
 Forward from liberalism; B..... 354
 Steinbeck, John
 Of mice and men; B..... 275
 Stewart, Maxwell S.
 Social security; B..... 650; correction of price..... 712
 Stewart, Maxwell S.; R..... 24, 133, 653
 Stillman, Clara Gruening; R..... 160, 361, 483, 651
 Stimson, Henry L.
 Far-eastern crisis, the; B..... 24
 Stolberg, Benjamin; R..... 401
 Stong, Phil
 Buckskin breeches; B..... 539
 Stratton, Samuel S., C. R. Daugherty, and M. G. de Chazeau
 Economics of the iron and steel industry, the; B..... 538; see also C..... 630
 Straw in the wind. R. L. Dobson; B..... 246
 Street of the fishing cat, the. J. Földes. Translated by E. Jacobi; B..... 50
 Sunpapers of Baltimore, the, 1837-1937. G. W. Johnson, F. R. Kent, H. L. Mencken, and H. Owens; B..... 540
 Supreme court and the national will, the; D. Alfange; B..... 682
 Surrealism. J. Levy; B..... 102
 Swing, Raymond Gram; R..... 621

T

- Theatre. W. S. Maugham; AN..... 332
 Theater guild anthology, the; B..... 74
 They came like swallows. W. Maxwell; AN..... 627
 This is your day. E. Newhouse; B..... 300
 Three comrades. E. M. Remarque. Translated by A. W. Wheen; B..... 485
 Three headed angel, the. R. Bradford; B..... 539
 Three times three. W. Saroyan; B..... 76
 Todesstrahlen und andere neue kriegswaffen. M. Seydewitz and K. Doberer; S..... 290
 Told with a drum. E. H. Heth; AN..... 164
 Tolstoi, Countess
 Diary from 1910. The final struggle. Translated by A. Maude; B..... 272
 Tom Paine, friend of mankind. H. Pearson; B..... 157; see also C..... 252
 Tragic fallacy, the. M. A. Hallgren; B..... 479
 Travels in Arabia Deserta. C. M. Doughty; B..... 299
 Trotsky, Leon
 Revolution betrayed, the. M. Eastman, translator; B..... 401
 Troy, William; R..... 76, 130, 216, 354, 416, 441, 473, 511, 681
 Trumpet of jubilee. L. Lewisohn; B..... 708
 Tsushima. A. Novikoff-Priboy. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B..... 190

U

- Ultimate power, the. M. L. Ernst; B..... 187
 Unexpected years, the. L. Housman; AN..... 417
 Utley, Freda
 Japan's feet of clay; B..... 476

V

- V. D., M.; R..... 445
 Van Arx, Hugo; R..... 386
 Van der Meersch, Maxence
 Invasion; B..... 130
 Van Doren, Dorothy; R..... 77, 246, 484, 516, 708
 Van Doren, Mark; R..... 25, 50, 136, 188, 214, 275, 299, 382, 442, 481, 517, 542, 707
 Van Gogh, Vincent, autobiography. Edited by I. Stone; B..... 601
 Van Kleeck, Mary; R..... 650
 Vaughan, Richard; R..... 135
 Victorian England: The portrait of an age. G. M. Young; B..... 514
 Viewed without alarm: Europe today. W. Millis; B..... 212
 Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 103, 134, 219, 476, 540, 709, 734
 Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 192, 301, 599, 710

W

- Wagner, Richard, biography. Volume II: 1848-1860. E. Newman; B..... 189
 Walker, Charles Rumford
 American city. A rank and file history; B..... 327
 Walton, Eda Lou; R..... 23, 191, 214, 330, 413, 488, 516, 570, 733
 War memoirs of David Lloyd George. Volumes V and VI; B..... 211
 Ward eight. J. F. Dinneen; AN..... 25
 We can defend America. Major General J. Hagood; B..... 134
 "We or they"—two worlds in conflict. H. F. Armstrong; B..... 103
 Wealth of nations, the. A. Smith. Edited by E. Cannan; B..... 356
 Weaver, Raymond; R..... 75, 623; see also C..... 741
 Weidman, Jerome
 I can get it for you wholesale; B..... 572
 Weinberg, Julius Rudolph
 Examination of logical positivism, an; B..... 599
 Wells, H. G.
 Croquet player, the; B..... 329
 Werth, Alexander
 Which way France? B..... 621
 Wertheim, Barbara; R..... 190, 476
 Where the weak grow strong. E. Armfield; B..... 132
 Which way France? A. Werth; B..... 621
 Whitcomb, Catharine
 Grown-ups, the; AN..... 303
 White, Helen C.
 Metaphysical poets, the. A study in religious experience; B..... 442
 White, Max
 Anna Becker; B..... 273
 White, William Allen
 Forty years on Main street; B..... 476
 White mule. W. C. Williams; B..... 733
 Whitman. E. L. Masters; B..... 330
 Wilde, Oscar, aspects of. V. O'Sullivan; AN..... 135
 Wilde, Oscar, Bernard Shaw, and Frank Harris; R. H. Sherard; with preface by Lord A. Douglas; B..... 220
 William Hogarth: The cockney's mirror. M. Bowen; B..... 24
 Williams, William Carlos
 White mule; B..... 733
 Winters, Yvor
 Primitivism and decadence. A study of American experimental poetry; B..... 216
 Winther, Sophus Keith
 Mortgage your heart; B..... 246
 Wise, James Waterman; R..... 52
 Wolman, Albert A.
 Lawyer Lincoln; AN..... 416
 Woolf, Virginia
 Years, the; B..... 473
 Wooster, T. J., junior
 Landlord and tenant on the cotton plantation; E..... 257
 Wordsworth, William and Dorothy, the letters of. The middle years (1806-1820). Arranged and edited by E. de Selincourt; B..... 481
 World's classics, the; R..... 270

Y

- Yarmolinsky, Avrahm
 Pushkin; B..... 218
 Years, the. V. Woolf; B..... 473
 You must break out—sometimes. T. O. Beachcroft; AN..... 445
 Young, G. M.
 Victorian England: The portrait of an age; B..... 514
 Young, Robert. G. Albee; AN..... 388
 Young, Stanley; R..... 568, 736

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 2, 1937

NUMBER 1

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

DRIFT, NOT MASTERY

HITLER'S TANGLED WEB

GOLD IS DETHRONED

STUBBORN FACTS IN PALESTINE

THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1936

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

HITLER'S HOUSE OF CARDS

by Walter Duranty

BILL HUTCHESON'S CONVENTION

by Edward Levinson

THE PROMISE OF ZIONISM

by Philip S. Bernstein

FASCISM CHARTS ITS COURSE

by Henry C. Wolfe

HOLLYWOOD INDEX by M. B. Zerwick

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

BROUN'S PAGE

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE HALF-TRUTH OF THE WHOLE TRUTH

by Joseph Wood Krutch

PATTERN FOR DEATH by James Still

TEXT AND PICTURES by Cyril Kay-Scott

PHILOSOPHER'S CONTENT by Irwin Edman

IMAGES IN CONTEMPLATION by Eda Lou Walton

OUR FAR EASTERN POLICY

by Maxwell S. Stewart

THE ART OF HOGARTH by Virginia Nirdlinger

SHORTER NOTICES

DRAMA: WHAT PORRIDGE HAD JOHN KEATS?

by Joseph Wood Krutch

FILMS: ETHIOPIA AND THE RED SQUARE

by Mark Van Doren

63817

The Shape of Things

★

WITH A GENIUS FOR DOING THE RIGHT thing at the wrong moment, Senator Pittman of Nevada is reported to have suggested that citizenship be taken away from all Americans participating in the Spanish civil war. For years American adventurers have served in the armies of Central and South American dictators who held power only by force of arms. As recently as 1934 American aviators aided Chiang Kai-shek in his struggle against the Chinese red army. Yet the moment a few American idealists enlist in the defense of Spanish—and world—democracy, agitation is started not only to punish future volunteers but to apply it retroactively to all Americans fighting on the loyalist side. The case is but one illustration of the danger of rigid neutrality laws which take no account of political realities. Many others could be cited. Mr. Villard, who supports a mandatory neutrality on another page of this issue, would be the last to deny, for example, that Hitler is the greatest threat to world peace today; yet any policy which would arbitrarily cut off all American trade with belligerents in the event of war would react directly to the advantage of Hitler and to the disadvantage of England, France, and the other democratic states which are normally dependent on American supplies. It is probable that no neutrality policy could keep us out of a war once it was started, but a discretionary policy might be a powerful weapon to prevent war if the United States would throw its economic strength in support of collective security.

★

THE CHANCES FOR A BATTLE OF THE TITANS between the President and the Supreme Court in the coming year seem rather slim. The justices have thus far this term shown a new sweetness and light toward state legislation and administrative measures, and the President may be expected at least to meet them halfway. We welcome the new attitude of the court, but we have learned to fear Greeks bearing gifts. We cannot believe that the recent decisions mark a definite change of heart on the part of the court majority. They represent in part a response to the Roosevelt electoral sweep, in part a reflection of the new and more tolerant mood of the business community toward the Administration, and in part the temporary victory of the minority judges, who have throughout been arguing against the assumption of legislative power by the court. But the crucial court battles are yet to come. It is significant that the Labor

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

PUBLISHED

Relations Act cases have been deferred to the week of February 8 to allow Justice Stone time for recovery. This indicates that the decisions, at least in the cases that do not involve interstate commerce directly, are likely again to depend on the "odd man." Meanwhile the sentiment for a constitutional amendment to equip Congress with adequate power seems to be lagging. It is likely to be revived only when labor groups or farm groups have once more felt the impact of the Supreme Court ax.

★

HARRY HOPKINS IS FIGHTING FOR A RELIEF budget based on the expectation that we shall have a permanent body of unemployed far exceeding that of the pre-depression years. Specifically he wants an appropriation of $750,000,000 for work relief for the first half of 1937 instead of the $500,000,000 generally reported to be the President's figure. Against him is ranged the business man—and his name is legion—who got a dividend check one morning and decided that relief should stop the next. Louis Stark has recently contributed to the New York Times a comprehensive survey of the problem of unemployment and relief which should convince every thinking person that a long-range plan of work relief is essential. The ever-rising productivity of labor must throw an ever-increasing number of workers into the discard unless new industries spring up. The WPA is one substitute for non-existent new industries; and business men, if they knew their own best interests, would be the first to support a device designed to bolster capitalism, not destroy it.

★

THE TERMS ON WHICH CHIANG KAI-SHEK was released can only be surmised from subsequent political developments at Nanking, but it is probable that they were not unfavorable to the anti-Japanese faction. Chang Hsueh-liang's sensational journey to Nanking has all the appearances of a face-saving gesture by a man who had obtained his demands by rather dubious tactics. The best indication that the settlement may have included a commitment for a firmer stand against Japanese aggression is to be found in the fact that the negotiations were carried out by T. V. Soong, former Minister of Finance, who is known to be strongly anti-Japanese and is being mentioned as the next Premier. It happens that Soong is the one man in China who can command support from both Nanking and the opposition. As a brother-in-law of Chiang Kai-shek, he is tied by unbreakable family bonds to the present ruling clique. His sister, Mme H. H. Kung, is credited with being the power behind the Nanking throne. At the same time he has the prestige of having served in the left Hankow government in 1927, and is the only member of the Soong family who has kept on friendly terms with his elder sister, Mme Sun Yat-sen, the chief spokesman of the left opposition. Soong is an exceptionally able man and is known to harbor ambitions for national leadership. If China is to achieve a genuine united front against Japan, he is the logical leader.

POPE PIUS'S CHRISTMAS BROADCAST, PLANNED to offset anxiety about his illness, has only served to aggravate it. The faltering speech, the painful pauses, and the news that followed of his exhausted condition leave little doubt that this is the last time his voice will be heard. To his successor he will leave a throne that is no longer a rock but a raft tossed on the waves of the world's social and political struggles. Threatened from the right in Germany, from the left in Spain, the Pope, though he took issue in his speech with the "false and fatal" ideas of those "who pretend to be defenders of order against subversion," has more outspokenly aligned the church against the left. By identifying his crusade against communism with opposition to the government in Spain, he has directed the Catholic church, with its more than 330,000,000 members, to become the enemy of any people's-front movement in any future crisis.

★

EVER SINCE THE ELECTION OF MIGUEL GOMEZ as President of the Republic of Cuba, Colonel Fulgencio Batista has been telling his best friends that the façade of democratic government would be dismantled immediately after the American Presidential election of 1936. The prediction has been borne out, except that the dismantling took place in December when it had been expected in November. Laredo Bru is now President, but well-informed observers expect Batista himself to take over the office within a short time. Batista is not a lone dictator. He is rather the spokesman for a military junta whose members are also ambitious. With Batista in the Presidential chair, José Eleuterio Pedraza y Cabrera, inspector general of the army, chief of police for the whole island, and officially designated successor to Batista, can become commander-in-chief; this in turn will open the way for promotion to other members of the army clique who are anxious to dip their hands deeper into power and gold. This clique will control, for instance, the appropriation for army schools which Gomez vetoed; and the moneyed classes of Cuba will continue to find such appropriations a cheap enough price to pay for complete suppression of labor unions and strikes.

★

WHEN GLASS WORKERS GO ON STRIKE AND shut down 90 per cent of production, the supply of windshields gets low; when the supply of windshields gets low, the automobile belt slows down; when the conveyor is shut off, the need for steel falls off; and when the demand for steel slackens, the noise of the steel mills is muted. In the ensuing silence along the industrial front the mere worker, who has not been able before to make his voice heard over the roar of machinery, can talk turkey to employers who like to think that the machinery and the executive brain are the real creators of automobiles and profits. The lack of unionization in the mass-production industries has given color to that illusion. To William S. Knudsen of General Motors the realization that he could not afford to ignore the demand for a conference with Homer S. Martin of the United Automobile Workers and the Committee for Industrial Organization must have come as a bit of a shock. By breaking the bottle neck of craft unionism the C. I. O. has loosed strong forces for economic and political change which are already in motion. "The present trouble," as the president of a brokerage firm put it, "differs from previous happenings" in that it involves "dreams of political power" as well as the desire for dues-paying members. N. B.: William Green has issued a statement in which he congratulates the A. F. of L. for its organizing work in the mass-production industries! In the same statement he sets the wage necessary for a family at $3,600. Given time, the C. I. O. may accomplish even that.

★

THE GREAT FRIEND OF SYPHILIS AND THE worst obstacle in the way of its elimination is the taboo under which the subject has been buried. Surgeon General Parran's convention to control venereal disease just concluded in Washington discloses a significant change in the public attitude. Euphemisms are being discarded, and syphilis and gonorrhea are being openly discussed. Indications of the change are the warm indorsement of the conference by Mr. Roosevelt, the series of articles in the New York Daily News, the Institute of Public Opinion's poll, which was 90 per cent in favor of a government campaign of public education on venereal disease. These are encouraging signs but they are not enough. While Great Britain has halved its syphilis rate since 1920, while Scandinavia, with a population equal to that of New York State, has reduced its rate to 2,000 new cases annually in comparison to New York's 50,000, in this country syphilis continues to attack half a million persons each year, more than are the victims of scarlet fever, diphtheria, tuberculosis, and automobile accidents put together. With Wassermann tests made a routine part of every physical examination, compulsory reporting of cases, and free treatment for all cases, we could do what Scandinavia has done.

★

IN SPITE OF ITS RATHER GRANDIOSE TITLE the new Women's Charter is a good working outline of the present objectives of most progressive women's organizations. It combines demands for equal opportunities in education and public life with a realistic grasp of the need for protective legislation in industry. Representatives of some fourteen organizations, as well as the Department of Labor, collaborated in formulating the charter, which will be submitted to women's organizations throughout the world and ultimately to the League of Nations and the International Labor Office. Obviously the document will meet with objections as well as indorsements. The National Women's Party in the United States has already denounced it for supporting the discriminations implied in protective legislation. Their position is, as always, logically sound and theoretically progressive. Humanly, however, it is impractical and reactionary. As the charter emphasizes, minimum-wage laws and restrictions on working hours are essential for men as well as women. But in the present phase of our industrial development, to oppose such laws for the protection of women until they can be passed—and sustained—for both sexes is to delay indefinitely the achievement of decent standards.

★

WE CANNOT ADD OUR OWN WREATH TO the garlands of praise that have been heaped upon Arthur Brisbane. Granted that he was a successful newspaperman, granted that he had the power of simple speech to reach and influence millions of Americans, one must still inquire into the nature of his success and the way he used his power. His success was tied up with that of Hearst, and he was part and parcel of the degradation of American journalism that Hearst's name implies. He used his power over words to express not the interests of the masses and the middle class who read him but their prejudices. Despite Mr. Roosevelt's delight in "exploring with him the teachings of history and the philosophy of our civilization," he was neither a cultural historian nor a social philosopher, unless those terms are denuded of all meaning. His importance in American life will not lie in his achievement but will be documentary: men will read him in later generations and say, "This is the sort of stuff Americans used to read in those days and think they were reading philosophy." As one compares him with his father, Albert Brisbane, a genuine and militant reformer who saw the possibilities of American life, one can measure in the span the thinning out of the American tradition.

Drift, Not Mastery

EVERY indication is that 1937 will mark time. Neither the program that the Congress now assembling will draft, nor the message that the President reads to them, nor his inaugural address is likely to contain the stuff of decisive action. None of them will be in any real sense progressive. They will be part of a new policy of drift and indecisiveness.

Harbingers of this new policy are already to be seen all around us. The budget-balancing crusade is on. Relief expenditures are being cut. The tax structure may, with luck, stay as it is: it is likely to be revised downward. Further bank legislation is being soft-pedaled, and whatever is proposed will strike a snag in the feud between Senator Glass and Governor Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board. The much-mooted farm-tenancy program is likely to fall short of the projected Bankhead bill. The power program is caught tragically in a Capulet-Montagu tangle in the Tennessee Valley. Further regulation of the security market may be pushed eventually, but investigations now under way will take some time, and some legislation is not probable until the next session of Congress. In fact, the most hopeful activity going on now in Washington consists of investigations. While they are doing much to lay bare the ribbed structure of finance capitalism, no further steps seem contemplated for tightening the control over the finance capitalists. And as for the vaunted struggle between Mr. Roosevelt and the Supreme Court oligarchy, or the plans for constitutional amendments, they are gone with the wind that blew through the country on Election Day.

Some will attribute the gloomy outlines of this picture to the biliousness of progressives. To us it seems to represent only the obvious deductions and projections of what is happening today in and out of Washington. Paul Ward, who writes on the subject elsewhere in this issue, sees in the whole matter the triumph of bureaucracy over good intentions. But one may go farther and build up a logical defense for the new "mellow mood" that the newspapermen tell us the President is in.

That defense would run as follows: The emergency which originally inspired the New Deal is now over. Recovery, as the recently issued Roper report tells us, is definitely on its way. In fact, it has about caught up with us, the index of industrial production for November being 114, using 1923-25 as a base. There must be an end therefore to the harrying of business with new tax measures and devices for control. The most that the government can be expected to do is to consolidate the positions it has won. The real sphere of activity for the next four years is in foreign affairs. America has a mission to perform in showing that a capitalist democracy can regain prosperity, preserve order, and achieve an equilibrium of social forces. To attempt at this point to push the program of government control farther would be to court the forces which have in Europe produced fascism and revolutionary disturbance.

So runs the argument, and to some it may prove persuasive. But the pity of it is that such an argument should ever be made. If it is the pattern of thought uppermost in Mr. Roosevelt's mind now, he has traveled a good way from the Roosevelt who said as late as November, 1936, "We have only just begun to fight." Can it be that the President is really taking in good faith the cries of "Kamerad!" coming from the National Association of Manufacturers, the newspaper publishers, and others who so recently regarded him as the Antichrist?

We are not arguing for a policy of vengeance. But millions of Americans have supported the New Deal program not only as an emergency measure but because it promised a controlled economy and a progressive social system. Mr. Roosevelt's stature, for them, lay in his decisiveness, the sense that he gave of mastery over an economic system that had formerly been allowed to drift. Our premise is that Mr. Roosevelt was sincere, but that he is now yielding to the atmospheric pressure of business recovery, widespread public fatigue with "problems," and general good-fellowship. And he is thus falling into a policy of drift which must breed dismay.

To be fair to Mr. Roosevelt, one must say that it is a different kind of drift from that of the Coolidge and Hoover administrations. They were concerned to have the sort of government in which big enterprise practically ran the country. Mr. Roosevelt, if we understand him rightly, is concerned with maintaining a balance of social forces and letting well enough alone. During the depression, when the business men of the country were in panic and their forces were demoralized, Mr. Roosevelt was able to crack a whip over them and give the impression of mastery. Now that business has recovered from its demoralization, he finds that if he wishes to push his program farther he must actually place himself at the head of the common people who voted for him and force the issue. That might mean a social struggle, continued rancor, the sort of class bitterness that has gathered around the Blum government in France. And that Mr. Roosevelt seems unwilling to risk.

The President has a chance in his message to Congress, in his inaugural address, and in his guidance of Congress to show that he has not slackened in his determination to build a progressive society in America. Otherwise the American people may yet see through the illusion of reform governments under capitalist parties. They will know that even the Roosevelts cannot give them the sort of mastery over their economic fortunes which is essential for achieving real living standards. That can come only when the labor forces have put themselves at the head of their natural allies among the farmers and the middle class, and learned to act on a political plane.

Hitler's Tangled Web

GERMANY'S demand that Spain release the steamer Palos has precipitated the most serious international crisis of the Spanish civil war. The Basque government at Bilbao has indicated that it will ignore the demand on the ground that the Palos was carrying contraband materials. This leaves Hitler in a position where he must either intervene openly on the side of the rebels, as he has apparently been requested to do by General Franco, or back down and suffer a disastrous loss of face. The firm stand taken by England and France against the further dispatch of German troops under the guise of "volunteers" makes Hitler's choice doubly difficult. Under the circumstances intervention might lead not only to a general European war but to a war in which Germany's chance for victory would seem extremely slim.

For there can be no question that England as well as France would be arrayed against the Reich in a war growing out of the violation of Spanish neutrality. Somewhat belatedly Britain has realized that its imperial interests would be very seriously threatened by a German occupation of the Iberian peninsula. Reports from London indicate that a French request for an increase in the British expeditionary force in case French North African troops were delayed by German control of the Mediterranean was the immediate cause of Britain's sudden shift in policy. Baldwin was apparently made to realize that inadequate French man-power might enable Germany to seize the Channel ports and possibly invade England before the cumbersome British defenses could be perfected.

There is every indication, moreover, that Mussolini, under British pressure, has agreed to withdraw his active support of the Spanish rebels, leaving Hitler to hold the bag. Italy has even more reason than England to fear the permanent occupation of Spain by Germany; and success for the rebels under present circumstances would amount to just that. In addition, Mussolini appears to have obtained a substantial quid pro quo from the British government, including de facto recognition of the conquest of Ethiopia and the offer of much-needed financial assistance in exploiting his new African empire. To make the situation even worse for the Nazis, Germany's latest ally—Japan—is torn at the moment by a grave domestic crisis growing out of the German-Japanese pact.

Threatened by complete isolation Hitler is most unlikely to provoke a war. As the result of years of exchange difficulties Germany is practically denuded of important raw materials. Military preparations have not yet been fully completed. And most important of all, the Reich is deficient in essential foodstuffs. While it might be argued that a serious domestic situation is the sort of incentive which would cause Hitler to gamble everything on a foreign war, there is little evidence that the current food shortage has yet created an internal political crisis. On the contrary, the offer of colonies which France is alleged to have made would probably assure Hitler of mastery over the internal situation for an indefinite period.

But the danger of war is by no means eliminated. Hitler will doubtless try to play both sides of the game. He may seek to conciliate Britain and Italy while continuing to support the rebel cause secretly. In this way he may avoid an immediate showdown and yet seek the advantages which would accompany a rebel victory. The difficulty of this course of action lies in the fact that the rebels seem to be beaten unless they can obtain immediate large-scale assistance from the Reich. If this is actually the case, Hitler will be compelled to retreat unless he wishes to be caught in the sort of tangled diplomatic web which he so carefully prepared for the Soviet Union.

Gold Is Dethroned

QUIETLY and without fanfare the Treasury has taken a step which may well have more effect on the economic well-being of the American people than all of the laws enacted by the Seventy-fourth Congress. Hereafter the Treasury will buy outright all newly mined and imported gold so as to prevent it from serving as a basis for potential credit expansion. The former practice of issuing gold certificates to the Federal Reserve system will be discontinued. Similarly, gold exports will be withdrawn without any contraction in the credit structure. This action has been taken as a safeguard against inflation. In the past two years the United States has added approximately three billion dollars to its gold reserves, sufficient for a credit expansion of at least twenty-five billion dollars. While this expansion has not occurred, more than two billion dollars has accumulated in the Reserve Banks as excess reserves ready to be used as a foundation of an epoch-making boom once the momentum of business demand gets fully under way.

Sympathy with the immediate objectives of the Treasury's policy should not blind us to its rather menacing implications. Before the depression all countries, including the United States, depended on the ebb and flow of gold not only to adjust international prices and standards of living but to mitigate the rigors of booms and depressions. While the system has not worked any too well since the war owing to the imposition of various forms of governmental control, it remains the only known means of achieving an equilibrium of economic forces throughout the world. The Treasury's action constitutes a complete break with the automatic mechanism of the gold standard, and places the United States unequivocally on a managed monetary basis. This is unquestionably a necessary step, but it carries great dangers if the men in control are influenced, as has been so frequently the case in the past, by narrow nationalistic prejudices or are preoccupied with short-run problems. For American monetary policy of necessity has profound effect on the entire world, and a step which may seem to our immediate advantage may ultimately have catastrophic consequences.

It happens that one of the best illustrations of this occurred in connection with a previous attempt to "sterilize" gold. In 1928 the Federal Reserve authorities became alarmed at the huge flow of gold to the United States and took steps to render a portion of the imports "inactive." The move doubtless prevented the 1929 boom from going to greater extremes, but it also prevented a natural adjustment in American prices which would ultimately have permitted gold to flow out again to the hard-pressed debtor countries. Many economists attribute the depression primarily to the "sterilization" policy of the Reserve Board and the board's subsequent failure to raise the rediscount rate quickly and drastically enough.

The same error might easily be made again. Since devaluation American prices have tended to be somewhat below the world level, and any attempt to curb their natural rise might accentuate the unhealthy condition whereby more than half the world's supply of monetary gold lies idle in the vaults of the United States while much of the rest of the world is desperately in need of the metal. Our high tariff makes payment in goods difficult, and a continued influx of gold is the last thing to be desired. The conflict between immediate national interest and world stability was not created by the Treasury's recent action. It existed prior to the depression and was greatly intensified by devaluation. But once we have cut loose from the moorings of an international standard, a much greater responsibility devolves on our monetary authorities. If they are to act in the interest of economic stability, they will frequently have to make decisions which run counter to the immediate interests of powerful pressure groups. Conceivably this is possible even in a society dedicated to quick profits. But we have yet to see it work out that way.

Stubborn Facts in Palestine

JEW S and Arabs struggle for control of the land of Palestine—the dry and bony soil, the barren mountains, the bitter waters of the Dead Sea, the narrow green valley of the Jordan. And their struggle dates not from the World War or the Balfour Declaration but from the earliest incursions of the harried Jews who fought their way into the land some fifteen hundred years before Christ and maintained a precarious and intermittent control until finally under the rule of Rome they lost hold altogether. A sense of the unhappy history of Palestine is useful chiefly as a reminder that the problems besetting the country today are old problems—rooted in age-long rivalries and intolerances and economic suffering. Being old the problems are also tough, and are as little likely to be solved by a British commissioner as by a Roman governor. They are, in fact, not likely to be solved at all. That conclusion should be taken not as the end of hope, but rather as the beginning of wisdom. Admit the fact that a problem is basically insoluble and you may learn to live with it.

To live with the problem of Palestine means first to accept its unchanging elements. One of these is the firm resistance of the Arabs to the idea of a Palestine politically controlled or dominated by Jews. Argue that the Jews have brought to Palestine prosperity and culture and sanitation; argue that Arab leaders whip up the passions of the peasants who, left to themselves, would harbor no anti-Jewish feeling; make a dozen equally convincing points, and the answer remains the same. The threat of Jewish domination will be resisted literally to the death.

Another element similarly to be accepted is the determination of the Jews to stay in Palestine. This, too, is a position easy to assail. Ask any Arab. The Jews are interlopers in a country that they left nineteen centuries ago. They want to run it; they hope to outnumber the indigenous inhabitants, to draw a living for their immigrant millions from a land too poor to feed decently its own population. Under what possible interpretation of the doctrine of self-determination should a people be asked to allow the mass occupation of their land by aliens speaking an alien tongue and demanding superior political rights? Such argument is logical, and futile. The Jews are there. They will stay. More will come. Immigration may be checked or more rigidly regulated, but it will not be ended—either as the result of riots or petitions or commissions of inquiry. Jews may go to Biro-Bidjan or Kenya or Brazil; but no other refuge will wipe out the will to found a home if not a state in Palestine. For racial nostalgia is also an unchanging element.

Another stubborn fact on which both Jew and Arab have gagged is the fact, with all its implications, of British imperialism. After all, it is said, imperialism is the root of the whole trouble—the source of conflict, of economic insecurity. Lift the paw of the Lion and the people will work out their own destiny—or fight it out.

This, too, is a hopeless suggestion. Great Britain needs Jews in Palestine to offset Arab nationalist agitation, to provide an oasis of loyalty and order. But they must be kept dependent on British arms and British financial help, and they must not get an upper hand with the Arabs. Play one off against the other and keep both groups hopeful and insecure. That is not only traditional imperialist strategy; it is the only strategy possible as long as the Empire is to be maintained by force.

So what? If solutions are to be foresworn, what remains? Only the hope of such modest improvements as emerge from the facts, a program that might be described as enlightened muddling. It can easily be sketched, but it will not in practice follow any outline. In the first place it will accept the Arabs' unwillingness to permit the development of a Jewish state, but it will resist their efforts to stop Jewish immigration. It will tie the immigration of Jews to the capacity of the land to support them. It will undertake a careful survey of the potential resources of the country to determine the numbers it can absorb. It will provide for a broad program of reclamation of land and other resources at the expense of the government—on the theory that the Empire should pay at a decent rate to have its chestnuts raked out of the Near Eastern coals. It will encourage Jews to take up new lands and develop them rather than buy farm land already in use, but it will not prevent the sale of land by Arabs when no hardship is caused.

As for administration, it will go on for the present as it is. Much as we should like to support Mr. Viton's scheme for the international control and neutralization of Palestine, a look at the Near East forces us to dismiss the idea. Palestine will be held by Great Britain as long as British control of the Mediterranean and the approaches to the Suez Canal continues to seem of first importance to the Empire. The same may be said of the proposal, frequently made, of a pan-Arab federation, with Palestine as one of its states. That, too, would be rejected by Great Britain unless it were faced with the alternative of a general Arab war; and by the Jews as well, unless they were in a clear majority. But even under British rule much can be done to extend local autonomy, encourage participation of Jews and Arabs in government agencies, and develop education as far as possible as a joint enterprise. Labor restrictions should be done away with as general labor standards improve. But to insist that Arab labor should at this time be allowed to compete with Jewish labor in a free market would wreck the labor movement and play directly into the hands of unscrupulous employers. On the other hand, unions should be freely open to Arab workers. Only organizational unity can end the existing competition.

Zionists must be content with less than most of them want, less than the Jewish masses of Europe need. They must curb their intransigent elements, make heavy concessions to the Arab masses, establish good relations with the more enlightened Arab leaders. Even now in the midst of conflict such men as Judah Magnes and some of the best of the Jewish labor group are supporting such efforts. They should be adopted as official Zionist policy.

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1936

FOR the ninth successive year The Nation offers a roster of Americans who, either as individuals or as groups, deserve the applause of their countrymen. In a world in which courage is at a premium, they have been courageous; they have been intelligent when intelligence was sorely needed; in public affairs, journalism, or the arts they have made a contribution, by a particular act or by their general behavior, which is worthy of honorable notice.

LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, HARLAN F. STONE, and BENJAMIN H. CARDOZO, justices of the United States Supreme Court, for maintaining in a crucial year and against heavy odds the best traditions of the court.

Three federal investigating committees and their staffs, headed by Senators ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, BURTON K. WHEELER, and GERALD P. NYE, respectively, for painstaking and illuminating revelations designed to protect the Bill of Rights, to examine the more predatory aspects of railroad finance, and to further the cause of peace by curbing the munitions manufacturers.

J. WARREN MADDEN, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, and his associate, EDWIN S. SMITH, for their unspectacular but effective work in implementing the spirit and the letter of the Labor Relations Act.

JOSEPH B. EASTMAN, formerly Railroad Coordinator, now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, DAVID E. LILIENTHAL, of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and ROBERT H. JACKSON, of the Department of Justice, for showing that government administrators can combine courage, character, and expert knowledge.

The STEEL WORKERS' ORGANIZING COMMITTEE; its chairman, PHILIP MURRAY; its regional directors, CLINTON S. GOLDEN, VAN A. BITTNER, and WILLIAM MITCH; and its rank-and-file organizers in the steel towns for their organizing campaign in steel.

HARRY BRIDGES, for his outstanding leadership of the Maritime Federation of the Pacific, and JOSEPH CURRAN, for his pioneer work in building a maritime federation on the East Coast.

JOHN L. LEWIS, of the Committee for Industrial Organization, for continuing to give strength and a backbone to the American labor movement.

CHARLES P. HOWARD, president of the International Typographical Union, a craft organization, for his far-sighted advocacy of the principle of industrial unionism as a means of organizing the unorganized.

ELINORE M. HERRICK, for her intelligent work as Regional Director of the New York Labor Relations Board and for her effective management of the campaign of the American Labor Party.

EDWARD S. CORWIN, professor of constitutional law at Princeton University, for his scholarly analysis of the history and functioning of the judicial power, and especially for his address, The Constitution as Instrument and Symbol, at the Harvard Tercentenary celebration.

GEORGE MCLEAN, the courageous editor of the Tupelo (Mississippi) Daily Journal, who has for the past year successfully conducted a liberal newspaper in the dark regions of Mississippi, where poverty and political dictatorship have produced our first corporative state.

PAUL C. SMITH, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, who went to Salinas, California, to see for himself, in the best editorial tradition, what was actually happening to the lettuce strikers and wrote a series of plain-speaking and vigorous articles entitled It Did Happen Here.

JAY ALLEN, of the Chicago Tribune, LAWRENCE FERNSWORTH, of the New York Times, and LOUIS FISCHER, of The Nation, for courageous, informative, and unprejudiced reporting of the civil war in Spain.

PAUL W. WARD, for his reporting of the election campaign, which demonstrates that news writers are likely to be more successful at predicting election results than are the most "scientific" straw votes.

CYRUS LEROY BALDRIDGE, member of the American Legion, for his pamphlet "Americanism—What Is It?"

ART YOUNG, for his great contribution to the art of the political cartoon in America and for his firm, good-humored faith that the world can be improved—which has persisted against heavy odds for half a century.

The AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LEARNED SOCIETIES, DUMAS MALONE and the late ALLEN JOHNSON as editors, and an able staff, for the completion of the "Dictionary of American Biography" a work conceived and executed on a plan which makes it unequaled by anything else of the sort in England or America.

H. L. MENCKEN, for the joyous as well as solid scholarship of his "American Language," appearing this year in a completely revised edition.

JOHN GUNTHER, for "Inside Europe," a brilliant piece of journalism which has contributed much to the American public's understanding of European affairs.

VAN WYCK BROOKS, for "The Flowering of New England," probably the most notable work yet written by a man long regarded as one of America's finest critics.

JOHN DOS PASSOS, for carrying to completion in "The Big Money" a trilogy which affords in terms of the novel an analysis of recent American society.

CARL SANDBURG, for "The People, Yes!"—a new poem celebrating, as have all his important works, the American folk tradition as a historical and cultural force.

ROBERT TURNER, for "Daughters of Atreus," one of the most distinguished plays written in this country.

SPENCER TRACY and FRITZ LANG, for their work in "Fury," a courageous indictment of lynching.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Nothing Red but the Tape

Washington, December 28

PERHAPS in the next few weeks, and certainly in the next few months, the national retina is going to catch more than one glimpse of a New Deal aspect that heretofore has been visible only to those of us who, working in Washington, see the Roosevelt Administration at close range. It is, moreover, the New Deal's most depressing aspect. I refer to its bureaucratic trends and, more particularly, to its overwhelming demonstration of the speed with which bureaucrats are made.

To understand what has made this demonstration so depressing one must go back to the New Deal's beginning and recall that the hopes it inspired were in very large measure based upon the character of the personnel it brought to Washington. The army of jobholders that began trooping into the nation's capital in March, 1933, was not the usual horde of boozy precinct runners, police-court bailiffs, ambulance chasers, and assorted party hacks bent solely upon fattening themselves and their kinsmen at the public trough. It was instead—or so it seemed to be—a quite different crowd, a throng of youngish lawyers whose concepts of justice had outlived their contacts with the judicial processes, and of youngish professors whose flair for cold, bold thinking the cloisters had not diminished. And these were merely the leaders of the invading host that promised to raise the civil service to a new high.

The distinguishing characteristic of this throng which comprised the New Deal's one substantial gift to American government was that its members respected facts, knew how to sift and winnow them, and were prepared to follow facts to their logical conclusions. They were objectivists, and hence it seemed that they could never fall heir to the diseases of bureaucracy. But sicken they did. It was only a matter of months before the symptoms began to manifest themselves. Now, less than four years later, most of them are in the final stages of the bureaucratic illness. Their zeal is gone; the only ambition that now consumes them is a desire to maintain their prestige by increasing their duties and powers no matter how needlessly, and by raising the number and salaries of their underlings so that they themselves may, in turn, lay claim to higher salaries, swankier offices, and more resounding titles. Press agents in some departments have become more difficult to reach than the Cabinet members who head the departments. Many bureau chiefs who prior to November 3 operated almost constantly in the public eye have since that day hidden themselves away even from their closest friends outside the Administration.

I realize that what I have said may sound like nothing more than the grouching of a reporter who is having trouble with his news sources, and that a bill of particulars should be provided. However, you yourself will begin to detect the symptoms of the New Deal's bureaucratic paralysis soon after Congress meets a few days hence. You will notice that in such battles as the coming session produces the participation of the executive branch will be limited almost wholly to quarreling over bureaucratic prerogatives; there will be almost no attempt by that branch to revive the New Deal's early promises and to force legislation of fundamental importance. To be sure, the executive branch is not supposed to have any part in the legislative process under the Constitution, but the truth is that most of the vital legislation passed by Congress is shaped and drafted in the executive branch. It is also true that, under the New Deal at least, the participation of executive departments in the legislative process has not been channeled exclusively through the White House and that in past days of zeal executive departments have contrived to press forward in Congress measures too strong for the President's stomach. As the New Deal enters upon its second term, you will find most of the departments, bureaus, and agencies lacking in anything recognizable as a legislative program, and you will note this down as a manifestation of the lassitude that accompanies the bureaucratic plague.

I use the phrase "bureaucratic plague" to describe not the excessive officiousness usually associated with bureaucracy but that far more dangerous condition in which the jobholders place their personal fortunes and comforts above those of the nation that employs them. That disposition is not confined to the New Deal's bureau chiefs and their underlings. It is alarmingly apparent at the White House, which has never been as zealous about the New Deal's avowed purposes as many of the subordinate officials of the New Deal were in the beginning and a few still are today. It is too much to hope that a Congress even more overwhelmingly Democratic than the last one will show a contrary disposition and carry on where the New Deal's titular leader all too obviously has left off. We may expect instead to see a Congress performing in the true tradition of party wheel horses and party drudges, obediently turning out only those statutes the White House requests or smiles upon and using the brute strength of the majority to crush and stifle minority opposition. We may expect to see the President requesting and smiling upon very little, unless forced into new fields of positive action by developments beyond his control. The chances either for NRA legislation of the O'Mahoney-bill type or for simpler wage and hour regulation are hardly worth reckoning, and there is even less chance of action toward amendment of the Constitution. The executive branch will concentrate its attention on getting from Congress extensions of its present powers, including the President's monetary manipulation authority and the State Department's power to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements without ratification by the Senate. If Roosevelt has not misled his rich friends, there will be some softening up of the last tax bill.

The Great Peacemaker—who is about to have the most militaristic inaugural Washington has seen since the war years—also seems ready to press for a softening of the neutrality bill to the extent of demanding for himself broader discretionary powers in picking our next war. There will be legislation setting up a form of crop insurance for the benefit of speculative wheat producers—"suitcase farmers"—in the Plains states; meanwhile, without legislative or Supreme Court sanction, the AAA openly will return to production control, having at last found how to make its "soil-conservation" program perform that feat. Legislation aimed at the farm-tenancy problem but falling far short of the mark is certain to find a place on the session's agenda, but anything properly describable as housing legislation is likely to get little attention. The Social Security Act may come in for some administrative amendments, but its basic flaws almost certainly will be preserved despite fright-born campaign insinuations to the contrary. And the tea leaves indicate that the coming session's record on public-works and unemployment-relief legislation will be worse than that of the last, as a result of Mr. Roosevelt's desire to make a stab at budget-balancing.

Hitler's House of Cards

BY WALTER DURANTY

THE European situation is really simpler than it looks. It can be regarded in two ways. One theory is to sum the whole matter up as the attempt to undo the Treaty of Versailles and redraw the map of Europe. That is a well-known historical process which has been repeated after every war for the last two thousand years. The other theory, which Hitler enunciated somewhat too assiduously at Nürnberg, is that Europe now faces a struggle of rival ideologies, or as he put it, a fight between the benign forces of law and order, known as Nazism or fascism, and the dark elements of barbarism, anarchy, and the destruction typified by Soviet Russia.

Last summer, at the time of the Nürnberg speeches, I was inclined to the first theory and credited Hitler with playing a more subtle game than he was playing. I thought—and wrote—that it was essential to bear in mind that the coming struggle in Europe was fundamentally the attempt of Germany to recover what it had lost by the defeat of 1918. I knew that Hitler had come to power by his appeal to the wounded pride of the strong German nation, that he had said to them, "I will lead you out of the wilderness of despair and defeat and break this wicked treaty which shackled you with chains of gold, which humbled your hearts, and tore away from you the brothers of your blood." That, in short compass, is the substance of "Mein Kampf," which is a not uninteresting book. In point of fact, the golden shackles had already been broken before Hitler came to power. His first act, therefore, was to remove the second cause of German humiliation, which, as it happens, was particularly humiliating to the Germans. I refer to the armament clauses of the Versailles treaty. How Hitler dealt with that problem is a matter of history. He rearmed Germany and one early cold morning last March took the chance of sending troops into the Rhineland. The French might have fought him back and could legally have called upon the British for help because the forward march of the German legions was an infraction of the Treaty of Versailles and of the Locarno pact. The French did not act for the excellent reason that they were unsure of the support of Britain.

I assumed at the time that Hitler's purpose was clear enough, that he wanted no more and no less than to redress the Treaty of Versailles, which every German felt was an intolerable outrage to Germany. The logical conclusion was that Hitler's next step would be an attack upon the territorial clauses of that treaty—an attempt to bring back to Germany those of its sons who had been torn away from it in Silesia, northern Bohemia; and Poland, and to replace the overseas colonies with nearer colonies like the Ukraine, of which Hitler spoke rashly at Nürnberg. In support of this view one had only to look at the intensive reconstruction of German military power, not merely in terms of troops but in terms of planes and tanks, artillery, gas and munitions, and last but not least the great new motor highways which have been built across the country, aimed like a dagger at the Russian border. That was the obvious deduction and perhaps it was correct. On the other hand, there were the Nürnberg speeches, which I interpreted as an attempt to evade or disguise the issue. I thought that Hitler was trying for the sake of world opinion—which is most important to Germany, as the last war showed—to substitute the myth of a crusade of civilization against the dark forces for the blunt facts of an aggressive war.

Perhaps, at that, I was right. But I am now inclined to think that I was wrong, and that the second of my two theses is the more accurate. The world today, and not only Europe, is in a period of transition no less important than the transition from feudalism to capitalism. I am not trying to talk bolshevism, but I do say that a transition from capitalism to something else—call it collectivism or what you will—is not only inevitable but is occurring before our eyes. In both Germany and Italy, as well as in Soviet Russia, the restrictions upon the private use of money grow sharper every day, and by private use I mean what Mr. Hoover once termed "rugged individualism" or the right of the capitalist to use his money for his own advantage without regard to social interest. I think Hitler understands this and that when he spoke at Nürnberg he was not just trying to evade an issue but was expressing a much more fundamental truth than he imagined. For the choice is not one between capitalism and collectivism, but between two tendencies within collectivism itself. The issue, as Hitler described it, was between civilization and the dark forces. But the question remains: Which is civilization and which are the dark forces?

Therefore, I now accept Herr Hitler's thesis—backwards. There is a struggle of ideologies going on in Europe. It is the struggle of cruelty and reaction against all that noble men from Socrates to Jefferson have fought for throughout history. The Russians understand it too, although—or perhaps because—they have so recently emerged from a state of feudal absolutism. The new Soviet constitution may or may not be functioning completely in the U. S. S. R. today, but it is, nevertheless, a pledge of future freedom. I maintain that the Italian and German systems are unfree and therefore wicked.

But these are theories and one must look at facts, which, as Lenin said, are stubborn things. One dreadful fact of the modern world is that there are three great nations, Germany, Italy, and Japan, which are being driven into war by the pressure of population. The Marxists say that the causes of war are basically economic, and they probably would argue that population pressure is an economic cause. That may or may not be true, but in any case it is necessary for a strong and virile people to obtain for itself the standard of living to which it believes itself entitled and for which it is prepared to shed its blood. That, I fear, is the case of these three countries, and that is why I believe that another war cannot be avoided. If, perhaps, the nations richer in possessions and material resources were more intelligent, a compromise might be found. For it is just within the bounds of possibility that in rearming Germany Hitler has understood that unless it is strong enough to be alarming to the others, Germany cannot obtain what it knows to be necessary for its national life. The same may be said of Italy, or even of Japan. There is a very faint chance that the leaders of Europe may recoil from the horror of war, and work out a plan for distributing resources. It would be the intelligent thing to do if the world were ruled by intelligence, of which unfortunately one sees few signs.

As things stand today, however, the World War has already begun—in Spain. No matter what nonsense or propaganda was written some months ago, no one now can doubt that the Spanish civil war was begun by Germany with the aid and connivance of Italy. For a time it looked as if they would win, but there were three reasons against them which operated with all the force Lenin attributed to stubborn fact. First, there was a revolutionary situation in Spain in the Marxist meaning of the phrase—that is, 90 per cent of the population were utterly dissatisfied and 10 per cent were over-satisfied. That is a thing which people will not endure. The pressure of such a condition made possible the French and Russian revolutions. Its absence in the United States has allowed America to go through the greatest depression in its history with no greater disturbance of the public peace than the somewhat artificial scuffle of the "bonus army" in Washington. The second reason is that the French finally realized that a fascist Spain would expose them to attack on both flanks instead of one. They saw also that it would involve the virtual occupation by Italy of the Balearic Islands; and that, of course, meant the cutting of communications between France and its African possessions. The third reason is that the British, usually slow to make up their minds and always inclined to waver and wobble and wonder and wait and see, became sharply annoyed by the German-Japanese agreement, which trod on their Dutch East Indian toes.

That is a story in itself, involving imperialist rivalries and the enormously important question of oil concessions, but it happens to be true. Germany had overplayed its hand. And so British influence, which hitherto had been, if anything, in favor of the Spanish fascists, suddenly swung the other way. That gave the French the feeling of security which hitherto they had lacked; so they threw in against Franco. I venture to guess that if the Germans should continue to pour troops and planes and tanks into Spain, the French could send three men and three tanks and three planes for every one the Nazis send. And they can do it more easily because they are much closer, and have come to understand that it is pleasanter to fight a war in Spain than to fight it in northern France. Thus the unhappy Spaniards are the guinea pigs of an experiment. If the Germans and Italians dare carry on, they will be foolish, because geography is one of the things which counts in war. If not, Franco will share the fate of Kolchak or perhaps, like Denikin, be more lucky and escape.

As for Russia, which is today the greatest power in Europe, it has at last begun to realize that one of the ways to avoid war is to pursue an active policy. I do not mean that Russia has been as active in Spain as Hitler asserts. But I do say that the Russians also are beginning to feel that war on someone else's territory is preferable to war on one's own. If the Germans are looking for trouble, they may find it rather soon.

My belief is that the Nazi-Fascists will drop their Spanish experiment, but the question which interests me now is whether or not they can successfully pursue what appeared to be, and is generally assumed by well-informed people in Europe to be, the next logical step in Hitler's action, that is, an attempt to reunite with Germany the 3,500,000 Germans in Czecho-Slovakia. Three months ago it looked as if they could have done this successfully, which would have involved German domination of Austria, Hungary, and Rumania. At this point I may be developing my argument too fast to do it justice, but lack of space prevents me from giving it in detail. Three months ago it seemed that the French would not fight for the sake of Czecho-Slovakia, and it must not be forgotten that the Russian pact of mutual assistance with Czecho-Slovakia was contingent upon French assistance too. Today, I think, the situation has changed. For the first time Hitler's hitherto uninterrupted forward march has been sadly checked, not by the defeat of Franco at Madrid but by the tactical error of the agreement with Japan, which trod on a British toe. That started the French going and that helped the Russians to take some action—if the Russians need help, which I rather doubt—and the result is that German plans in regard to Czecho-Slovakia are by no means so likely to succeed as they were before. This all sounds like the "House That Jack Built." The structure that Hitler is building, however, seems little more solid than a house of cards.

Bill Hutcheson's Convention

BY EDWARD LEVINSON

THE Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, pillar of craft-union opposition to the industrial organization of the mass-production industries, epitomizes in its structure and policies all that is worst in craft unionism. The recent convention of the brotherhood at the Carpenters' Home in Lakeland, Florida, where General President William Hutcheson permits good carpenters to idle away their old age, brought these traits into clear focus.

Craft Imperialism. The brotherhood has absorbed, with or without the consent of the workers concerned, members of the machinists', coopers', bridge and structural iron workers', brewers', longshoremen's, metal lathers', and loggers' unions. "God made the forests," as one man put it, "and gave them to Bill Hutcheson." While the brotherhood inveighs against John L. Lewis as an invader of jurisdictions, it accords itself a jurisdiction as wide as the nation. The general president, says the constitution, "may issue charters to auxiliary unions composed of persons working at an industry where organization would be a benefit to the brotherhood." While denouncing industrial unionism, the brotherhood takes the per capita dues of 74,000 wood workers in the Northwest organized in industrial unions. It virtually sells its union label to any locals which will pay the full per capita tax, and insists that no branch of the diverse industry may have its own label. It exacts what General Secretary Frank P. Duffy called a "service charge" for "non-beneficial" members who wish to enjoy the privilege of a card in the union.

Craft Autocracy. Among its 300,000 members are 130,000 "non-beneficial" members who enjoy neither voice nor vote in the affairs of the brotherhood. As Mr. Duffy told these members at Lakeland, they are in the family only "on probation," and if they do not like it they can get out of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Hutcheson is a potentate. He may revoke local charters, grant "dispensations," decide points of law, appoint organizers, suspend officers, and expel or fine duly elected convention delegates.

Social Backwardness. Mr. Hutcheson repeatedly heads the labor committee of the Republican National Committee; he opposes social legislation—including the demand for a thirty-hour week; he kept the executive council of the A. F. of L. from carrying out the command of the 1935 convention to work for a constitutional amendment. Mr. Duffy at the Lakeland convention, calling the role of great Presidents, found good words only for Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, and William Howard Taft.

The bugaboo of communism was paraded as though it were not a discredited scarecrow. It served to silence all opposition to the reelection of Mr. Hutcheson. It was used as an excuse for the tabling of resolutions aimed at depriving Mr. Hutcheson of some of his many prerogatives. It was decided that any members who signed "Communist" resolutions were to be expelled. And all critical resolutions were declared to be "communism." "All in favor of the motion rise; all opposed give their names to the secretary," Chairman Hutcheson said in taking the vote. When Delegate Stewart suggested that the constitution of the union grants the members the right to their political views, President Hutcheson announced that he had ruled that communism was not a political theory and that therefore Delegate Stewart was out of order. Delegate Dunn then opined that "every dog that comes out of a litter is a dog, no matter what its breed," and that, logically, every man who "went to a meeting and sang the International" was a Communist. This closed the argument. For the rest, the convention raised dues to $1 a month, denounced the C. I. O. as a "wild dream," and amended the ritual so that those who are tainted with belief in revolution might be expelled from membership forever.

The disturbing moments to the stand-patters were furnished by the "fraternal" non-voting delegates representing 74,000 woodworkers in the Northwest. The men are members of the vigorous locals of loggers, sawmill, shook, and veneer workers, furniture makers, and cooper-age workers which dealt a deathblow to the company union, the Loyal Legion of Lumbermen and Loggers, in National Labor Board elections. Until the summer of 1935 they were organized in federal locals of the A. F. of L. Mr. Hutcheson suddenly decided that their per capita dues belonged to him, and they were duly turned over by the executive council. The special dispensation granted them by Mr. Hutcheson did not include the right to share in the financial benefits of the brotherhood. The locals were willing to accept this provision since their per capita tax of 25 cents was lower than the usual 75 cents, but they were greatly pained to find that they would have neither voice nor vote even in those affairs of the union in which they were concerned. Last September they met in Portland, Oregon, and formed the Federation of Woodworkers. They indorsed the C. I. O., demanded democratic rights within the carpenters' brotherhood, asked to be allowed to use the carpenters' label, and insisted on the right to choose their paid organizers. The only response came from a spokesman for the lumbermen who said that he had heard that Mr. Hutcheson was planning to invite in such craft unions as the teamsters, the machinists, and others in order to dismember the Northwest locals.

The demands of the Northwesterners were presented to the Lakeland convention through Duncan Campbell, a beneficial delegate from Longview, Washington. Mr. Duffy at first railed against "these fellows" who were looking Mr. Hutcheson's gift horse in the mouth. He accused them of ingratitude and of permitting a United Mine Workers' leader to address the Portland convention. He challenged them to carry out their threat to secede from the brotherhood and join the C. I. O., promised them "the sweetest fight you ever had," and indicated what the mechanics of this fight would be. Carpenters' locals would be instructed to give the Northwest locals no assistance; and the brotherhood would "notify firms with which we have contracts for the timberworkers that if they want to continue employing you outside of the brotherhood we will put them on the unfair list and your manufactured stuff won't be handled anywhere."

Mr. Campbell, refusing to be intimidated, reminded the convention that the rebellious locals expected to pay $150,000 in per capita dues during the next year. At that point discretion seemed to overcome Messrs. Hutcheson and Duffy. They appointed a committee which bargained with Mr. Campbell and the others for more than three days. No complete agreement was reached. Finally the committee reported without the approval of the second party to the negotiations. The convention sanctioned the report, which promised an investigation of the timber industry, ordered that a label be issued to designate "fair lumber," placed several notably anti-union lumber firms on an unfair list, promised an organization drive among the non-union lumbermen, and permitted six fraternal delegates to address the convention. The demands for democratic rights—for some autonomy for the locals and for the privilege of selecting their own organizers—were rejected.

The atmosphere of conciliation and conviviality induced by Florida sunshine and good-fellowship served to mollify some of the fraternal delegates, but it was noticed that the entire delegation departed for Washington to seek council there with Mr. Lewis. Talk of secession has been revived. It will come up again at a special convention which is scheduled for February but which may now be advanced.

Promise of Zionism

BY PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

WRITING as a liberal I shall attempt to demonstrate to liberals why the success of the Zionist enterprise is indispensable to the welfare of European Jewry and of the Arabs of Palestine. It is with special feeling that I write, for I have recently visited most of the important centers of Jewish life in Europe.

In Rumania I came upon the aftermath of a pogrom. In the village of Balaceano I saw Jews sitting like Job in the midst of their desolation but without hope. The sentiment of the masses as well as every agency of the nation's life was opposed to them. Although inhabitants of Rumania for centuries they remained strangers in a strange land, unwelcome, unprotected, and unhappy.

In Poland, where the largest Jewish population of Europe lives, half the Jews are in dire need and all regard themselves as unwanted. I have visited large families living in one barren room and spoken with numberless children who have never even seen meat or sugar. In the dislocated, post-war economy of Poland, cut off from natural markets and resources in Russia, the Jews, never too popular, are being crushed. What little they have either evokes bitter envy, oppressive legislation, and pogroms, or is taken from them. Their misery and degradation have touched such tragic depths that even the Polish Foreign Minister has petitioned the British government to facilitate their emigration.

The Jews in Germany are doomed. Deprived of almost every opportunity to earn a livelihood, abused and humiliated at every turn, the constant victims of fear and precarious insecurity, they know neither life nor death, but only black despair. Their whole tragedy was expressed in the little girl's prayer I overheard, "O Lord, why did you make me a Jew?"

Anti-Semitism has as yet discovered no impenetrable frontiers. No nation is free from its threat. What is happening today in Rumania, Poland, and Germany may tomorrow overtake Austria, Hungary, Lithuania, and even countries farther west. The overwhelming majority of European Jewry lives under the shadow of actual or impending persecution.

To these miserable millions the true liberal, the humanitarian, has a moral obligation. He cannot be content with pity or indignation. These are not enough. He must think through the problems and support the solutions which realistically promise relief.

What, then, can be done? The obvious answer is that the Jew should stay where he is and fight for his rights. Let us analyze this solution as it applies, for example, to German Jewry. In the first place, every realist knows that resistance to the Nazi regime is futile and suicidal. With the Nazis controlling every instrument of propaganda and force, nothing can prevent the annihilation of the Jews. Second, the minds of the German children have been so thoroughly poisoned against the Jews that even the overturn of the Nazi regime, at present entirely unlikely, would effect no change in the Jewish situation. Finally and most important, the factors which produced Nazi anti-Semitism will continue to operate long after Hitler is forgotten, as they did before he was heard of. The peculiar middle-class position of the European Jew that makes him the ready victim of popular ill-will in every period of distress, the bitter envy with which he is regarded by competitors in every field open to him, the profound and unalterable anti-Semitism of European Christianity, those internal and external conditions of his life which forever make him different from his neighbors, the strange and often unpleasant characteristics which these in turn evoke from him—all these are segments of the vicious circle from which there seems to be no escape.

Communism is a possible solution of the Jewish problem, as various writers in The Nation have suggested. But communism would destroy religion; most Jews are religious. Communism is totalitarian; most Jews are individualists. Communism necessarily implies violent revolution and dictatorship; Jews are traditionally pacifist and democratic. Apart from these ideological considerations, the espousal of communism by the Jews of Germany, Poland, and Rumania as a program for the redemption of Jewry would be mass suicide, nothing less. It would lead to the most terrible pogroms in all Jewish history.

HOME TO PALESTINE

No one can foretell what will happen in the distant future, but it is clear that in the near future the only hope for the Jews of Central and Eastern Europe is emigration. But where shall they go? The great democracies of the West—France, Great Britain, and the United States—have been compelled by economic conditions and intensified nationalism to shut their doors against such immigration. The mass wisdom of the Jews points to the only solution of the problem. In Berlin and Warsaw and Bucharest I saw the Zionist offices besieged by thousands of Jews seeking immigration certificates, financial assistance, or information. They knew their only hope was Palestine. All over Europe I saw the collective training camps where erstwhile students, professional men and women, and business people are acquiring practical knowledge about farming and the manual trades in preparation for working in Palestine. Two hundred and fifty thousand Jewish youths are gathered in the Zionist pioneer movement, living only for the day when they will be granted immigration certificates. To deny them these certificates would be to cut them off from life. For they are doomed if they remain where they are. There is hardly a Jew in Poland who would not fly to Palestine if he could.

The reasons for this are three. First is the Jew's age-old devotion to Palestine. Neither Britain with Uganda nor Soviet Russia with Biro-Bidjan nor his own philanthropists with the Argentine could seduce him from his first love. Other conditions being equal, 90 per cent of Europe's Jews would prefer Palestine to any other haven.

Second is the fact that Palestine has accepted more Jewish immigrants since the war than any other country. It has welcomed more Jewish refugees since Hitler came to power than all the other countries of the world combined. From 70,000 when the war ended, the Jewish population in Palestine has grown to over 410,000. It now constitutes 32 per cent of the total population, the largest percentage in any country in the world. In 1935 alone 65,000 Jews entered Palestine. Even during the period of the Arab strike in 1936, when life and property were unsafe, no month saw fewer than 3,000 immigrants reach its shores. At the present time every boat brings scores of young pioneers, eager for their own and their people's renaissance. This has been possible because Palestine has been neglected and underpopulated. Its present population of 1,300,000 is but a quarter of that which the land contained in Bible times. The experts say that even the land between the Jordan and the Mediterranean can support over three millions if modern industry and intensive agriculture continue to be developed as Jews are developing them. In the light of the great numbers the country has already absorbed without depression or unemployment, in the light of the experience of such small progressive countries as Holland, Belgium, and Denmark, in the light of the great undeveloped markets of the Near East, Palestine should in the course of time be able to accept most of the unhappy Jews of Central and Eastern Europe, at least the unwanted excess population.

Third is the wonderful fruit of the Jew's remarriage with the soil he loves. He has irrigated deserts and drained malaria-infested swamps. He has covered barren hills and desolate valleys with fields of grain and orchards. Where once was wilderness, he has reared clean modern cities. In two decades he has created a Hebraic culture which already promises to rival that of Bible times. The vibrant Hebrew language lives again. A progressive school system crowned by the great university on Mt. Scopus brings the best in modern education to a generation of healthy and happy young Jews. Symphony orchestras, folk theaters, native art, newspapers, and magazines have sprung up. Can one wonder that the miserable Jews of Europe yearn to enter this new life?

There is another element in modern Zionism which makes it greatly appeal to Jewish youth, as it should to all progressive forces. Themselves the victims of terrible wrongs, the young Jews who went to Palestine determined to prevent injustice there. They organized the Histadrut, the General Federation of Jewish Labor, which is today the dominant element in Palestine and in world Zionism.

Its program rests fundamentally on the principle that Jews should do their own work and not exploit others or one another. It builds its colonies—there are now 159 of them—on the land of the Jewish National Fund, which permits no private ownership and thereby eliminates exploitation and speculation. It insists that Jews do their own hard work and do not become exploiters of cheap Arab labor. This policy has led to some ill-will but ultimately it will prove to be sound. For since Jews require higher wages than the native workers they are not employed by Arabs and Christians. If Jews would not employ Jews, there would be no work for the young Jews who wish to enter Palestine, and therefore no immigration. By maintaining high standards for themselves, Jewish workers are gradually raising the standards for all workers. Whereas if Jewish employers were permitted to employ the cheapest native labor, they would not only degrade all labor to its level but would reproduce in Palestine the vicious system which forced them out of Europe.

The Histadrut is transforming the economic life of the country. It has raised wages from 100 to 1,000 per cent above the pre-war level. It has reduced the hours of work to a reasonable number. It has introduced sickness and unemployment insurance.

Jewish labor has established collective farms of two types. The Kvutza is a commune where each worker labors according to his ability and receives in accordance with his needs. The Moshav allows each man or family a piece of land in an area owned by the Jewish National Fund. Because it belongs to the Jewish people they cannot sell it, nor may they employ—"exploit"—labor to work it for them. Machinery and equipment are owned by the community, and all purchases and sales are made cooperatively. These collective farms have multiplied and prospered, and they are now the backbone of Jewish agriculture in Palestine. The largest recent British loans were made on the basis of their success. This is all the more significant because these collectives, unlike those in Russia, are entered voluntarily. For the most part those who come, remain because they find spiritual satisfaction as well as economic security in these socialized farms.

The cooperative principle has been extended by the Histadrut to all of Palestine. Producers' and consumers' cooperatives now abound in the land. They not only handle agricultural products and other merchandise but also provide services, trained labor, building, contracting, irrigation, insurance, and credit on a cooperative basis. The Histadrut also supplies educational, cultural, and health services to its members.

THE LOT OF THE ARAB

What the Histadrut is doing in Palestine constitutes a social revolution. It is transforming an ancient, backward, feudal economy into one that is modern, efficient, and thoroughly socialized. This has been achieved within the Jewish community without bloody violence. As the Western democracies seek to infuse their institutions with the cooperative spirit and forms, they may well look to the Histadrut's bloodless revolution for an example.

Equally important is what the labor movement has done for the souls of the Jews. Former students, doctors, lawyers, merchants, and Luftmenschen have returned to the soil and from it have learned to appreciate the dignity of labor. And it has made them normal and healthy and freed them from their Ghetto complexes. They have proved to themselves and the world that the Jew can be a successful farmer and at the same time can achieve a rich cultural life. They have so effectively learned the art of disciplined self-defense that during the recent disturbances not one of their colonies was openly attacked. The Arabs limited themselves to sniping and burning trees at night. These Jewish workers also displayed the quiet courage of true pacifism, for although well able to return the attack, they refrained in order to prevent minor disorders from becoming bloody warfare.

All these benefits have been achieved without any hurt to the Arabs. Not an inch of land has been taken from them. The Jews own today less than 10 per cent of the land of Palestine, and every inch of that was purchased, usually at prices which made the sellers rich. Over 80 per cent of the land that Jews have acquired was purchased from Effendis, rich, often absentee, landlords who are glad to get Jewish money but resent interference with their ancestral feudal privileges. Most of this territory, being swampy and wasteland, was uninhabited and considered uninhabitable until the Jews acquired it. In fact, the Hebrew phrase to describe such acquisition is Geulat Haaretz—not purchase but redemption of the land. Wherever Arab tenants were displaced, the law required resettling them at the expense of the purchaser. Mr. Viton writes that after the 1929 disturbances evidence was presented to show that two thousand Arab peasants had been dispossessed.* He is apparently unaware that the government offered these peasants the opportunity to return to the soil and that all but a handful preferred to remain in the neighborhood of Jewish colonies, where wages and working conditions were good, rather than return to their own unprofitable agricultural labors. Evidence offered at the present inquiry indicates that fewer than two hundred were so displaced. Not once was compulsion employed either by Jews or the British authorities to seize land from Arabs for the use of Jewish immigrants. Where in all the history of national land acquisition is there a record so just and so considerate as this?

Nor have the Jews taken work from Arabs. This is clearly proved by the fact that there is today no appreciable Arab unemployment despite an increase since the war of 300,000 in the Arab population, including an immigration of over 100,000 non-Palestinian Arabs who were attracted by the country's prosperity.

Not only have the Jews not hurt the Arabs, but they have improved their condition in every way. A glance across the Jordan River will indicate how the Arabs of Palestine lived before the modern Jews came. For Transjordan was artificially separated from the rest of the country at the close of the war and therefore did not receive the benefits of Jewish immigration. Its peasants live together with their wives, children, and animals in one-room mud huts. Their wage when work is available is but a few cents a day. They live in indescribable filth and suffer from dreadful diseases which primitive hygiene could prevent. They breed rapidly and die early. Of course they are illiterate.

* Albert Viton discussed the future of Zionism in two articles published in the December 19 and December 26 issues of The Nation.

This was the condition of most of the Arabs on both sides of the Jordan at the end of the war. Today this picture is hardly recognizable in Palestine, and no Arab would return to it if he could. Jews brought prosperity to the natives by providing new markets for their products. Even today, with Jewish agriculture and industry so highly developed, the Arabs sell far more to the Jews than they buy from them. The average wage rate in various occupations has risen 300 to 1,000 per cent. It is from 100 to 500 per cent higher than in other Arab countries, including Egypt and Iraq. Skilled Arab laborers now earn the same wage as Jews—over a dollar a day—and enjoy a standard of living comparable to that of well-paid workers in Europe. Since 90 per cent of the employees in government services and public undertakings are Arabs, the tremendous increase in these activities caused by the Jewish immigration has brought unprecedented prosperity to large sections of the population.

Public education has greatly improved the condition of the Arab. In 1919 there were only 30 rural schools. Today, with 26 new schools about to open, the total is 309. These are supported by the government largely from taxes paid by Jews (the Jewish educational system is supported almost entirely by Jewish funds). Jewish taxes have enabled the government to establish secondary schools, training colleges, and agricultural institutes for Arabs. The result has been a significant reduction in illiteracy and ignorance among the Arab masses and a consequent improvement in the level of living. Today the percentage of literacy among Palestine Moslems is higher than that found among Arab Moslems in any other country.

The Jews have brought important benefits in sanitation and health. They have introduced preventive medicine and are stamping out Palestine's worst scourges, trachoma and malaria. Many of the Jewish hospital and clinic services are available to Arabs. Prodded by the Jews and largely supported by them through taxes, the government is now spending annually $1,250,000 on health services, 90 per cent of which go to Arabs. The net result has been not only a general improvement in health but a higher birth-rate, a lower death-rate, and a decidedly lower infant-mortality rate among the Arabs in Palestine in contrast to health conditions among Arabs in other countries, which have either remained the same or become worse during the past twenty years.

More important even than the actual benefits already attained are the possibilities of well-being that the Jews are opening up for the Arab masses. It must be remembered that the Arab rulers—the Effendi, the money lenders, the officials, the religious leaders—did not lift a finger to improve their social condition. They deliberately kept the peasants docile, poor, and ignorant. It was precisely because the Jews threatened to upset their apple cart that they so bitterly resented their intrusion. Like Krupp and Thyssen they, too, are exploiting nationalism in order to prevent the overturn of a social and economic system of which they are the chief beneficiaries. But in Palestine they are probably too late. For the Histadrut has already supplied the stimulation and the example of a highly intelligent, well-organized, thoroughly disciplined labor movement which cannot be permanently suppressed. The hope of the Arab masses for social betterment lies not with their present rulers, who up to this moment have not advanced a social program, but in joining forces with the Jewish masses for their common advancement.

However, even the best organization is ineffectual if a country is hopelessly poor and oppressed. The organization of Arab peasants still scratching a barren soil with ancient wooden implements would produce meager results. Here, too, the Jews are helpful, for by the introduction of modern agriculture and industry they are showing the Arabs how to develop the full economic possibilities of the country. As the Arab peasant sees the Jew with the aid of irrigation and modern implements producing more on one acre than he can coax from five, he will soon learn, for he is naturally intelligent, what must be done in order that he too may have water and tractors. As he sees the Jew's hens laying twice as many eggs and the Jew's cows giving five times as much milk as his, he will learn about the breeding and care necessary in order that he too may be well fed and prosperous. In industry the Jew will show him how to create wealth, and the Histadrut will teach him to demand his rightful share.

I do not mean to imply that the Jews are speedily bringing prosperity to all the Arabs of Palestine. The Near East is poor and backward, and generations will be required before its economic and social life will approximate that of the West. My point is that the Jews alone are improving it and that the welfare of the Arab masses is bound up with the success of Zionism, especially labor Zionism, and not with their exploiters, who in the name of nationalism wish to continue their exploitation.

As to the difficulties, they are serious, as has been pointed out. But there are moral factors in the situation of which the critics hardly seem aware and which ultimately defy their logic. I remember that in the summer of 1928 Louis Fischer solemnly assured me in his home in Moscow that the Zionist experiment could not possibly succeed because the government, the natives, and even the soil were hostile. Whereas, he maintained, the Biro-Bidjan project, then beginning, would certainly prosper because the Soviet government, the people, and the soil were all felicitous. Logically Fischer was right, and yet in the eight years that have passed Biro-Bidjan has been a colossal failure, attracting but a handful of Jews and losing more through emigration recently than it has acquired through immigration. During the same period Palestine welcomed nearly 200,000 Jews and enjoyed unprecedented prosperity while the rest of the world was suffering from a catastrophic depression.

The Jew waited 1,900 years for the present opportunity in Palestine. He will not be lightly turned aside.

Fascism Charts Its Course

THE Nazi war chariot may not yet be ready to start on its death-dealing European tour, but Herr Dr. Goebbels, Hitler's minister of Propaganda and Enlightenment, is laying out roads for the new German juggernaut. In preparation for the war of aggression which the whole world fears, fascist Germany has set its propaganda machine in motion inside and outside the Third Reich. At home Minister Goebbels uses every means at the disposal of authoritarian government to whip up a frenzy of nationalism that will insure blind obedience and a willingness to undergo privation and death for the fatherland. Outside Germany he is spending huge sums on a thorough and ruthless campaign to stir up all the forces of chauvinism and self-interest which may prove useful to German designs. His propaganda pours into Scandinavia, Poland, the Danubian countries, Belgium, Britain, even into Palestine and the Far East. Results are not always what the Nazis would wish: they cause the Swiss to increase their defenses on the German frontier, and they impel Englishmen to assume a still greater tax burden to build planes and tanks to stop a Nazi thrust into Belgium.

There are German groups scattered over Europe from Metz to the Volga, from the Gulf of Finland to Serbia.

National Socialism spares no effort to inspire in these Teutonic minorities a spirit of rebellion against their respective governments. On these pages are reproductions, in muted blacks and whites, of three of the brilliantly colored maps issued from German and Hungarian propaganda mills.

The large map was made in Germany by the Volksbund für das Deutschtum im Ausland to incite irredentist sentiment among the Teutonic minorities in neighboring countries. It is significant that northern Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark, and Sweden are shaded to indicate their close ethnic relationship to the Germans of the Reich. The large Teutonic population of Switzerland, the inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine, Luxembourg, the Sudetendeutschen of Czecho-Slovakia, the Austrians and South Tyrolese are summarily represented by the same color as the Reich itself. The small dots are Teutonic islands. On the original map they are represented in red—fever spots on the expanse of Europe. The Nazis are inflaming them by instilling dreams of a pan-German empire.

The ethnic map of Czecho-Slovakia, designed to show how the nationals of its revisionist neighbors impinge upon almost every mile of its borders, is a product of Budapest. Not only does it disagree with Czech maps; it disagrees with German ethnic maps of the same area. On the Hungarian map the main body of Slovaks nowhere touches Hungary. The Germans, in this respect, are more generous. They permit the Slovaks to overflow the Magyar frontier. Furthermore, the designers of this map portray the Moravians in a color different from that of the Czechs, an idea that is novel but hardly accurate.

The small map is a work unique even in this campaign of misrepresentation. Its purpose is to brand Czecho-Slovakia as the "sally-port of Bolshevism." The original map, thirty-four by forty-one inches, is captioned "Menaced Europe" in French, German, Italian, Polish, and English. The shaded portion of Poland denotes the area which Berlin and Budapest charge is threatened by a Czecho-Soviet invasion. This attempt to stir Polish suspicions against the Czechs is characteristic of the entire Nazi-Magyar propaganda offensive.

HENRY C. WOLFE

Hollywood Index

BY M. B. ZERWICK

ON SUNDAY, December 13, some twenty million American Catholics renewed in unison their annual pledge to support the National Legion of Decency in its great crusade to keep the movies clean. The formality of the vow, however, was almost superfluous, for the efforts of the faithful during the past year had been so effective that the Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, who came to America to solidify the anti-Communist movement, was able to announce on his return to Rome that motion-picture producers in the United States had achieved a standard higher than was ever known in the history of the industry.

Before the spring of 1934 the industry was not so exemplary. The motion pictures with subtle blandishments were still luring the young and mentally weak into paths of un-Christian error. This fact was given wide currency through a survey published early in 1933 by a committee of impartial educators. The survey stated that most films were bad object-lessons for the young, romanticizing such activities as safe-cracking, robbery, murder, seduction, divorce, and marital infidelity. As a sop to rising protests Will Hays, president of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, had prepared as early as 1930 a production code which had been duly adopted.

This production code was a complete index of forbidden subjects, and if it had been carefully enforced, nothing but the less anthropomorphic animated cartoons would now be distributed. It was printed in large, easily readable booklets, and Hays and Hollywood were roundly praised for their joint efforts to elevate the standards of the industry. Everybody waited for the self-imposed morality to take effect. What really happened was that the producers put the code to sleep and continued to make pictures glorifying murder, cracksmen, highwaymen, and divorces. Whereupon the protests mounted again. Ministers, educators, and incipient John Sumners once more raised the cry of indecency. It was the Catholic church, however, which expressed the gravest concern.

In November, 1933, eighty bishops met in Washington in annual conference. Organized action was decided upon. An Episcopal Committee on Motion Pictures, under the chairmanship of Archbishop John T. McNicholas, was appointed to study the problem and to root out the evil. In April of the following year the Legion of Decency was launched.

Such was the beginning of the most important censorship group in the history of our country. Its implications were not lost upon Will Hays. With the threat of an organized boycott suspended over the industry, he issued a call to arms and insisted that the producers abide by the production code signed some three years before. No major company dissented. The Pope had definitely come to Hollywood and in the space of six months had sent the jitters running through the industry. Hollywood readily submitted to self-regulating codes in all phases of the business. Czar Hays instituted a Code Authority and appointed as Czarevitch, Joe Breen, a Catholic strongly recommended by church authorities. Breen's single duty has been to keep pictures clean.

The method is simple enough. Breen examines all scripts before the actual shooting begins and supervises each step in production so that the end-product conforms with the code's requirements. When a picture is released with Breen's seal of approval it is unlikely that the Legion of Decency will disapprove. Breen gave early promise of success, and by November 17, 1933, Hays had created a similar authority to supervise all motion-picture advertising.

This watchful guardianship over America's second largest industry is no namby-pamby nonsense. The number of pictures condemned by the Legion has dwindled so rapidly that recently the objectionable films never number more than four or five and these are mostly foreign-made. More important, the Catholic church has found in the Legion a model for development of a worldwide control of motion-picture production. In the United States that control is now almost perfect, based as it is on the potential sales resistance of the country's largest minority group, and strengthened by a system of interlocking directorates: Breen, a Catholic, is head of the Production Code Authority; Mrs. James F. Looram, chairman of the Legion's reviewing board, is also a member of the National Board of Review; Martin Quigley, publisher of a group of motion-picture papers, is a member of the New York Archdiocesan Council of the Legion.

Although the Legion disclaims any interest in values other than moral ones, it has persistently played possum with productions of the Soviet Union. The effect is a blanket condemnation of all Russian pictures. Such sterling productions as "Son of Mongolia," "Gypsies," "Abyssinia," and "Song of Happiness" have been ignored. A spokesman for the Legion said that "Son of Mongolia" could not have been judged because no one on the examining board understood the obscure Mongolian dialect spoken by the characters.

The Legion does not disregard with similar thoroughness the output of the studios of Nazi Germany. Of the 256 pictures listed in the moral estimates of December 10, some 27 were made in Germany; one of these, "Wald-Winter," was deemed partially objectionable because "the plot is solved by divorce."

These are slight indications of some of the basic implications in the work of the Legion. More significant is the potential use which the church has for its new control over motion pictures at a time when its power is endangered. The Pope himself took official cognizance of the movies' value as a stabilizer of the status quo in the Encyclical "Vigilanti Cura" of July 2, 1936.

So important does the Pope consider censorship of film themes that he urges the bishops to set up special reviewing boards in their own dioceses to strengthen the criteria of the National Legion. "They may even," he says, "censor films which are admitted to the general list [approved list]."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE Supreme Court's upholding of the joint resolution of 1934, which authorized the President to proclaim embargos of arms and munitions, tremendously heartens all who believe that the existing neutrality legislation which will expire shortly should be reenacted and that everything possible should be done to reinforce it. If there is one thing that the American people want above all else it is to be kept out of the next war, and they are willing to make any sacrifice to that end. That the President and Secretary Hull realize this is plain from Mr. Roosevelt's peace speeches at Chautauqua and in South America and from Mr. Hull's earnest and moving address at Buenos Aires. Everyone who like myself constantly travels up and down this country knows that, as the late Admiral William S. Sims testified last winter, there are few audiences which do not voluntarily bring up the question of war and peace.

Despite this there is a distinct rift in the government and another in the peace forces on the question of neutrality. The State Department sticks to its position that legislation should not be mandatory for the President but should give him the power to interpret any war situation and apply an embargo according to his judgment. The President himself desired this when the fight for neutrality legislation began, but he subsequently modified his position and accepted provisions to which he was at first reported to be opposed. In the peace movement Raymond Leslie Buell, of the Foreign Policy Association, is against rigid mandatory legislation because, so he says in a recent bulletin, the neutrality proposal made by Secretary Hull in his draft convention at Buenos Aires "would penalize the victim of aggression to the same extent as the state violating its obligations." He fears that if the proposal is carried at Buenos Aires, the Latin American states will "drift away" from the League of Nations.

But the proposal that Washington shall have the right to decide as between the aggressor and the aggrieved seems to me to insure our taking part in future wars. It means setting ourselves up as judges in a war with which we may have no concern. It means that we shall aid those whom, at the hysterical moment of the explosion, we believe to be aggrieved. Who can be sure under such circumstances? It took years for the historians to bring out the relative responsibility and guilt of the nations which took the world to war in 1914 and to establish that Germany was by no means the sole criminal. President Roosevelt has on several occasions said that the aggressor nation is the one whose troops first cross another's boundaries. Do we really know today whether or not French troops crossed into Alsace-Lorraine before the Germans entered Belgium? We certainly did not in the fall of 1914. Not only is the role of deciding which is the aggressor in a conflict extraordinarily difficult; it would obviously be extremely dangerous if the aggressor should hold us accountable for aid to the nation we considered aggrieved.

The American people, I believe, want no risks of this kind taken. They want cast-iron, automatic, mandatory laws—I do not undertake to say now how extreme—that will say, "A plague o' both your houses, we are going our own way." They will not be moved by the argument that the wrong may triumph. They are thoroughly convinced that right and justice were not born of our participation in the World War, and that they were deceived into entering it by lying propaganda, the entanglement of our big business men with the English war machine, and the false Wilson slogans. They have no desire to usurp again the seat of the Almighty and pass judgments to be backed up by war. They will not be moved this winter by frantic arguments that this policy will wreck the League of Nations, for they wish to have nothing to do with the League. They will not be swayed by assertions that this would be an ignoble and selfish course and perhaps lead to the downfall of civilization. They will reply: "We had enough of all that bunk from Woodrow Wilson with his war to safeguard democracy and end war. We propose to be purely for ourselves this time."

That mandatory neutrality legislation will take us on uncharted seas is perfectly true. We shall be reversing our historic neutrality policy, and we shall have no precedents. But there are many untried departures in international relations, and anybody's guess as to how any policy will work out is little better than anybody else's. The American people are ready for the risks involved in mandatory legislation, and it is theirs to decide. They are, many of them, aware that the power to make war has slipped away from Congress, where it was placed by the Constitution, and now rests squarely in the hands of the President, as President Roosevelt admitted when he declared at Chautauqua that no neutrality legislation would keep us out of war if a President and Secretary of State wished to put us in. Can the people be blamed if they are opposed to granting the President more power to get us into war? He has usurped that power from Congress as it is.

I most earnestly appeal to every reader of these words and every lover of peace to make his wishes felt in Washington by the time-honored method of addressing his Senators and Congressman and President. There is no more pressing or patriotic duty than this.

BROUN'S PAGE

Kennel Revolution

YOU may ask me what racing dogs have to do with the progress of the labor movement in America. Of course, I could answer that I never asserted there was any connection, but I am minded to draw a few moral lessons from the hounds of Miami. As Nation readers probably know, the greyhounds are induced to run by a mechanical white rabbit, electrically controlled, which spins around a quarter-mile track.

Trainers tell me that even the stupidest of their charges come to know in time that there isn't any Santa Claus and that the rabbit is a fabricated myth. But even so, the dogs are conditioned to the job of running, and when the false foe spins by, they pretend an eagerness to crunch him between their jaws. All this is play-acting. The rabbit doesn't smell right, and neither does the industry in which they find themselves engaged. But being hounds instead of humans they accept their lot and pretend an eagerness for the chase in order to please their exploiters.

Still, primitive instincts are stronger than acquired ones, and the dog trainers have found that out. Indeed, many of them use a clever trick, which persists in spite of the frowns of the officials of the Kennel Commission. It is the custom to take a dog which is beginning to lose interest, a skeptic if you please, and allow him to run in the morning in vain pursuit of an authentic rabbit. When he comes to the track that night, part of his doubts have been dispelled. He says to himself, "I'm pretty sure they were playing me for a sucker last night and the night before. In fact, I've got a sneaking notion that I've been deceived ever since I got into this racket."

"But," ruminates the greyhound, "that rabbit this morning was the real McCoy. My nose knows. Perhaps these fakers are going to play ball with us working dogs after all. Maybe my interests do lie along with those of my employer. There's no point in being a malcontent. The man played fair with me this morning and why shouldn't I trust him now? This could be a new deal. From now on it's going to be nothing but real rabbits."

And the over-naïve animal gives of his best for three or four nights until he learns he has been fooled again. Sooner or later it becomes necessary to give him the real thing once again in a morning work-out. And the difference between greyhounds and human beings lies in the fact that the dogs can be fooled over and over again. It is easy to make them accept each cut of the cards as a brand-new deal.

But this article is written to celebrate the discovery of an exceptional dog in the racing world. Since owners are sensitive, I will invent a name for him and call him Australian Bill. I wouldn't like to see him blacklisted.

Upon the signboard where the odds against each dog are listed I saw the price of forty to one set opposite the name of Australian Bill. Since only eight dogs are entered in each race this seemed to me a most generous offer. For a two-dollar straight ticket in the mutuels I could get eighty-two dollars if Bill came home in front. But I looked up his record in the chart of past performances, and this dossier showed that he had won no races and generally finished eighth. Indeed, upon his two most recent appearances he had done a little worse than come in last. The chart rebuked him with a star and the curt explanation, "Australian Bill quit."

I turned to a trainer who sat in a seat beside me and said, "This is funny. What's the matter with this dog? Isn't he any good?"

"As a matter of fact," the trainer said, "Australian Bill is one of the fastest dogs in the country. He used to win a lot of races. Then he slumped a little, and one night when they opened the door of the box as the mechanical rabbit went by, Bill just wouldn't come out. They had to push him and of course by that time the race was over. The next time he did leave with the rest of the dogs, but after running about ten yards he sat down and waited for the rest to round the circuit. His owner is still trying to get something out of him, but you never can tell whether he'll sulk in the box or sit out the race."

"There's nothing wrong with him physically. But sometimes a racing dog loses his interest or his spirit. Don't tell anybody, but in cases like that we often take them out in the morning and let them go after a real rabbit. That seems to pep them up."

"I've heard of the practice," I told him.

"Well, his owner took Australian Bill out and let him loose after an honest-to-god rabbit. There was certainly nothing wrong with his speed. We had a terrible time saving the trial bunny from sudden death."

"That night, of course, everybody expected that Australian Bill would be so full of get up and go that he'd win by as far as you could throw a rock. He was in with a lot of no-account dogs which didn't compare with him on the line of his natural form, but on account of his tendency to quit you could get as good as forty to one against him in the morning line. A lot of us who knew about the morning experiment poured money into the machines and Australian Bill closed an even-money favorite. What do you suppose he did?"

"He won by as far as you could throw a rock," I guessed.

The trainer looked at me in scorn. "He broke all right," he said. "In fact he was away with a four-length lead. But as soon as he got a look at the mechanical rabbit he stopped running, turned around, and walked back into the box. What can you do with a dog like that?"

"Change his name," I said; "he ought to be called Agitator."

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE HALF-TRUTH OF THE WHOLE TRUTH

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LIKE most reviewers I am frequently guilty of saying that a book or a play is worthless because it lacks some specific virtue. I hope, at least, that I am usually right both as to the absence of the virtue in question and as to the general worthlessness of the work, but it should not require much reflection to conclude that I am almost certainly wrong in assuming that the existence of the specific defect is in itself a sufficient proof of the nullity of the whole. We say glibly that some novel is "destroyed" because the author has no sense of structure, because he understands only one kind of person, because he cannot write English, or because he has no social consciousness. And yet the fact remains that there is scarcely an artistic or intellectual virtue so important that it may not be lacking from some work of real importance.

Fielding lacked at least one-half of all the "finer feelings"; the structure of Goldsmith's one novel would shame a kindergarten; Jane Austen regarded the failure to possess an inherited income as placing a man outside the pale of humanity; Dickens had the sentimentality of a nursemaid; Theodore Dreiser cannot write the English language. Yet the works of each are far from valueless. A writer, in other words, stands or falls by his virtues, not by his defects. There is no one specific thing which he is required to do, no specific quality that he may not be without. When we dismiss a book because it fails in some one direction, we are really giving only an excuse, not a reason, for the general judgment. That judgment may be correct if the book has no virtues; it may be wrong if we are simply unable or unwilling to see them.

Just as there is no one technical virtue which is absolutely indispensable, so too there is no attitude or emphasis or scope which can be made to serve as a universal criterion, and that is the reason why, of all the clichés of criticism, the phrase about "seeing life steadily and seeing it whole" is one of the most pernicious. The "steadily" may, I suppose, be either accepted or dismissed with indifference on the ground that it probably doesn't mean anything anyway. But who ever saw "life whole," or who is capable of judging whether another has seen it whole or not? A certain number of us agree with jesting Pilate about the difficulty of knowing truth, but even to assert that one knows the truth is to make a very modest claim beside the assertion that one knows all the truth. Yet that is what a great writer is supposed by Arnold both to know and to communicate. A true picture of any aspect of any part of life is something near to a miracle, but a picture of the whole is too much to expect even of a magician.

How little Arnold himself meant, or at least how little he was able to make of what he thought he believed, is plain enough from his own touchstones for the judging of poetry. Sometimes he makes it appear that "seeing life whole" meant to him simply seeing its elegiac aspects, and that "seeing life steadily" meant simply seeing it through a romantic mist. By implication he was paying a very high compliment to the particular poets he was discussing. He was, that is to say, revealing the fact that they said what they did say so vividly and so persuasively that he was for the time being under the illusion that nothing else could exist, that this was "life whole." But if he was thus unconsciously revealing what the great poet does do, he was also, and at the same time, making nonsense out of his own pronouncement.

In recent years "seeing life steadily and seeing it whole" has seldom been quoted—largely because the phrase has come to be surrounded by a certain stuffy, Victorian atmosphere. In its place the more esoteric critic got to substituting the more scientific-sounding term "synthesis." Writers were praised or blamed for having achieved or failed to achieve a synthesis, that is, for having seen or failed to see "life whole"—though of course few ever stopped to realize that what they really meant by a "synthesis" was a treatment of those aspects of life which happened to seem to them most important or interesting or fashionable. Most recently of all the accepted phrase, now ostensibly more simple and more complete, has become "giving a picture of society"—as though, in the first place, even the longest novel were not, on the scale of the whole, almost as inadequate as the shortest lyric as a "picture of society," and as though there were any reason why every work of art should treat of everything.

"Mr. A is an unimportant novelist because he seems unaware of the extent to which the motives of his characters are conditioned by the class status of his family"; "Miss B's novel fails of excellence because her Chicago has no meat-packers in it." Undoubtedly the meat-packers aren't there; probably enough Miss B's novel does fail of excellence. But one is rash to draw the conclusion that a meat-packerless novel set in Chicago would have to be bad. Only a very unobservant critic would fail to note that Jane Austen does not "see life whole." As a matter of fact, what she does see is so small a part of it that most intelligent and sensitive people have passed it over entirely. But that is the reason why she is one of the indispensable novelists.

In all seriousness I believe that one of the reasons why excellent contemporary artists are not commoner is that, by expecting too much of them, we have made them expect too much of themselves. The real business of the artists is not to say everything or even to say any one particular thing. His real business is to say something, and when he has done so it becomes our business to recognize what that something is. If his partial picture of life is vivid but never any more than that, then he is a minor artist. If he succeeds for the time being in making the part he pictures seem the only or most significant part, then he is a great one. Indeed, unless we are very careful indeed, he will be credited with having given a picture of society, achieved a synthesis, or "seen life steadily and seen it whole."

Pattern for Death

BY JAMES STILL

The spider puzzles his legs and rests his web
On aftergrass. No winds stir here to break
The quiet design, nothing protests the weaving
Of taut threads in a ladder of silk:
He is clever, he is fastidious, and intricate;
He is skilled with his cords of hate.

Who can escape through the grass? The crane fly
Quivers its body in paralytic sleep;
The giant moths shed their golden dust
From fettered wings, and the spider speeds his lust.

Who reads the language of direction? Where may we pass
Through the immense pattern sheer as glass?

BOOKS

Text and Pictures

PORTRAITS AND SELF-PORTRAITS. Collected and Illustrated by Georges Schreiber. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

MR. SCHREIBER has hit upon a capital idea, almost a talisman, which out of hand transforms serious writers into wits. Like all great discoveries it is simple, and consists in having them write two-page autobiographies! Among forty authors only six exceeded their allotted space, and most of the others wrote less, in one case only six and one-half lines—a volume of literary pemmican, so to speak. The result is a sort of modern miracle: before our very eyes, as it were, the staidest and solemnest of them become the most humorous.

The book is fascinating. Above all one wonders how most of our literati found time to write. First this one and then that one has been a sailor, lawyer, factory manager, school teacher, day laborer, dish-washer, sparring partner, government employee, banker, farm hand, waiter, professor, gardener, editor, impersonator, member of parliament, broker, railroad man, and so on until one's head reels and one wonders if literature is like hives and breaks out while you are doing something else.

As for the unexpected humor, conscious and unconscious: Henri Barbusse refers to the time when he was an "intellectual" and "ignorant as are most authors and intellectuals." Leon Feuchtwanger gravely informs us that he has "twenty-seven teeth" and is "five feet three inches tall." Thomas Mann remembers the city fathers of his home town, who were "somewhat humorously" addressed as "Your Wisdoms." John Masefield alludes to his "strange experiences, which imaginative writers have made to appear more strange." Hugh Walpole, when young: "I enjoyed greatly being told by my elders how I ought to write." And Thomas Wolfe plumps out with "I do too much of everything." This entire review could be filled with quotations from the autobiographies as good as these set down.

Were this a written book with illustrations instead of a picture book with writings, one wouldn't focus criticism on the drawings. But the book is delightfully turned around—almost as if the pictures were the text and the text the pictures. The reviewer has met about half of the men represented and the drawings are perfectly good picture-writing. But the faces are, may one say, too much like simple surfaces with bosses—in a word too topographical? One misses the underlying structure. The result is characterization of features but not rounded characterization of the whole. The artist, however, thoroughly understands accents—as Spanish women understand them in facial make-up—and shows great cleverness and wit in matters of silhouette and line shading.

By and large the forty autobiographers evince a pronounced distaste for autobiography. Few of them would have suggested the book, and probably a majority would agree with Franz Werfel, who begins his one-fifth of a page with "I have an insuperable aversion to writing my autobiography even if it be only two hundred words long." Some of these short contributions are beautifully done, a few of them are very beautiful, and one or two surpassingly so. Besides being great fun, the pages contain plentiful hefty and profound stuff—a book worth looking at, reading, and keeping.

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT

Philosopher's Content

ON THE CONTENTED LIFE. By Edgar A. Singer, Jr. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

MAKE no mistake; this is not an easy book to read, for all the apparent innocence of its title, nor is it a homespun homily on bucolic pleasures. Its title does something less than justice to the serious substance and the disciplined and subtle manner of mind revealed in its pages. This book is free, on the whole, from technical terms, and consists of scattered essays, but each of these is dialectically closely knit—Professor Singer professes a preference for mathematical language—and though there is unmistakable ardor in these pages, it is the heat of banked fires.

In a brief review one can only state with a looseness that should be anathema to its author, and perhaps a treachery to his thought, what seem to be the main themes of his analysis. These are "fugitive papers," but bound together by an inner and essential consistency of mood and insight. This can be exemplified by the closing paragraph of the first essay, on Esthetic and the Rational Ideal:

If it is not in his love of beauty that man's deepest craving lies, is it in his love of knowledge; is it in his love of goodness? Or is it perhaps in his reaching out for ■ something more ultimate than anything science, or morality, or art can offer; yet ■ something only to be approached ■ humanity advances in its science, its morality, its art? Whatever the answer, however difficult to find, there ■■■ be no more practical question than this; our one chance of living contentedly in an essentially painful world is our chance of finding what we would live for.

The content considered is the philosopher's content, the modest, almost tragic remnant of happiness open to ■ mind cured of easy hopes and unexamined illusions. Content is arrived at only after one has traversed the fires of successive incredulities, finding the "suspicion" of ulterior truths in insights successively inadequate. The "philosophies of wine and love" are really imperfect avenues to forgetfulness; the only perfect forgetfulness, we are reminded, is death. Progress, the cooperative conquest of nature, is meaningless unless one's goal be defined. Evolution may move to a superman, but the "superman is not ■ goal, unless he is a god."

Mr. Singer prescribes no goals, except the movement toward a realization in which the "temporal" and the "eternal" may both be embraced. One loves the temporal, some unique manifestation, something irreplaceable that dies. But one is "loyal," as Royce suggested, to an ideal limit involved in all specific objects of love, and in all cooperating wills. "Shall the lonely griefs and joys of men forever remain a pluralistic universe? Need they, if thought and will are bent in common religious interest on making this universe one?"

There are many implications to that sentence which a careful reader of this careful book will find: the ineluctable individuation of personality—Mr. Singer sees and clarifies the points of the great mystics; the importance of indefinables in life; and the moral urgency of definition if we are to "make secure for eternity the treasures of the moment." Mr. Singer might be described as an empirical idealist; Royce is stamped on these pages, but so is scientific method. He defines with rigor and austerity, yet with a tender sense of "ancient magic in new philosophies," the movement of individual will toward a common beckoning good, always distant, yet always implicit in love and in understanding. The essay Confessio Philosophi is a candid and touching account of how one fastidious mind came to this conclusion, now not very fashionable but recurrent in the history of thought, and perhaps in any age—or so one is tempted to believe after reading this book—the only alternative to callousness or despair. It is challenging to have this thesis so closely argued by a professional philosopher notable among his colleagues for precise analysis and intellectual candor.

IRWIN EDMAN

Images in Contemplation

NEW POEMS. By Frederick Mortimer Clapp. Harper and Brothers. $2.

THE truly poetic mind confined within itself, "alien to what will be and what has been," may create art. Frederick Mortimer Clapp, one of the finest though one of the least-known of our imagist poets, now organizing director of the Frick Art Museum, has such ■ mind. It was evidenced in his earlier books, "The Overland and Other Poems," "New York and Other Poems," and "Joshua Trees." These poems were concerned always with the mind, as it selected sense impressions, turned them over, and thought them through, and always ended upon the theme of individual isolation. Love, in the earlier poems, was part solace and part emotional ecstasy. The theme of this new book, the only one Mr. Clapp has published in fifteen years, is the contemplation of death ■ the end of his own significance.

As the author of scholarly works—"Des Dessins de Pontormo" (in French), "Jacopo Carucci, His Life and Works," and other essays—Mr. Clapp is ■ recognized authority. Poetry has been his passion, however, though he could devote himself to it but seldom. A classical and Elizabethan scholar, a lecturer on the history of art, and an appraiser and collector of paintings, he has led a busy life. The imprint of his years of travel in many countries and of his study of painting is on his poetry. His lines are packed with exact pictures of what he has seen and of what has become most significant to him.

If Mr. Clapp's poems lack the simplicity of H. D.'s more emotional imagist poems, they have more richness of coloration. He has, moreover, always handled the more conventional rhythms in a unique way. I have remembered for many years certain lyrics in the earlier books. In "New Poems" we have a richer rhythmical music, a greater use of rhyme. Free verse as a form is rarely used these days. Mr. Clapp's ability to make it choral, to give it ■ intellectual and emotional coherence is very unusual. Now and then, to be sure, we find in the new collection poems in which too many images pile up. Others, however, though they begin in complexity, flow suddenly into ■ conclusive definition of meaning, such a summary as the mind makes after the body has reacted to sensuous impressions. Nevertheless, I think that the stricter poetic forms suit better Mr. Clapp's austerity of feeling. Despite his ability to recreate sounds, sights, and smells, he is essentially a thinker who would resolve feeling into an austere contemplation.

TALONS

As death comes nearer fiercely the hoofs beat
On the stampeded days, Yet age is not
These sloping shadows that bury the noon's heat
But the collapse of thoughts that chill and clot
In the dimming brain. Once like citadels,
Cliff-perched to dare adventure to their gates,
They seemed, those thoughts, that now the mist that dwells
In the heart itself of time obliterates.
Hoofs in the mist! There is no pathway back
Out of this place blown bare of tree or flower.
Age stumbles on, and stalling to attack,
Hovering, circles, circles an unseen hour.
Then, like a hawk, seeing the prey it likes,
Snaps shut its wings and, flashing headlong, strikes.

Too much statement of thought destroys, of course, the pure imagist technique. Usually, however, Mr. Clapp speaks for himself out of the image. He does not, as does H. D., allow the image to stand alone pictorially and represent his emotion. Born in another age this poet would have been a mystic. Born in this, his tortuous process has been to free himself of solace, to cast aside fear, to observe clearsightedly the process of annihilation through which we all must go. He sees the poet's problem ■ that of the individual mind, peculiarly sensitive to impressions, turning upon itself for food. As the senses fail with age, the intellect registers whatever reactions there be to all that is accumulatively known by a single spirit. All the poems in this book are in one way or another the reflections of a poetic mind which holds no brief for past, present, or future, but would know itself.

HARVARD
YEN-ING-AM
PUBLIC
LIB

Our Far Eastern Policy

THE FAR-EASTERN CRISIS. By Henry L. Stimson. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

OFFICIAL apologies are frequently so distorted as to be practically useless as an accurate record of the events which they concern. To this general rule Mr. Stimson's book is a brilliant exception. Nowhere except in the report of the Lytton committee will one find a fairer or more comprehensive treatment of the crisis arising from the Japanese occupation of Manchuria and subsequent invasion of Shanghai. And while the Lytton Report traces the course of League action from a contemporaneous point of view, Mr. Stimson, from his experience as Secretary of State during the crucial period, presents the official position of the American government. He also has the advantage of viewing the struggle with the perspective made possible by the subsequent unfolding of Japan's grandiose ambitions on the continent of Asia.

Perhaps the most controversial aspect of American policy in this crisis is that which concerns the first few weeks of the struggle. When word first came of the attack on Mukden and other vital centers in Manchuria, the State Department had no illusions regarding the nature of the conflict. It was immediately recognized that the attack was provoked by the extreme military party in Japan without regard for international law and world public opinion. It was also evident that Baron Shidehara, the Japanese Foreign Minister, together with other civilian leaders, was completely out of sympathy with the action of the military clique. It was therefore an open question whether the civilian elements, if not handicapped by too much pressure from outside, could regain control and check the aggressive tendencies of the militarists. On this point the State Department guessed wrong. While the United States was refraining from open pressure against Japan in the hope of strengthening Shidehara, the military leaders were pursuing their preconceived course of action, which could only result in the complete elimination of the moderates. Meanwhile the United States had blocked an early effort of the League's to send an investigating commission, and had contributed, to take the kindest view of the effect of America's action, to the fatal procrastination which permitted Japan to take over the whole of Manchuria without effective protest. No one can say definitely that Japan could have been stopped, but it is obvious from subsequent events that the time for decisive action was in the first days of the invasion. And if such action was to have any effect on the military mind, it would have had to consist of more than note writing. Collective pressure by the powers, involving the threat of economic or military action, might have succeeded where efforts at conciliation were spurned. At the worst it could have scarcely provoked retaliation as long as it involved cooperation among all the leading nations.

Whatever mistakes may have been made at this time, it cannot be denied that Mr. Stimson possesses a clear understanding of the necessity for collective action. Few more persuasive or substantial arguments for collective security have been written than that contained in this book. And contrary to the generally expressed opinion, Mr. Stimson believes that the joint action taken in the Sino-Japanese dispute, while falling short of its immediate goal, laid the groundwork for future cooperation. Although the failure to curb Japan was discouraging, such action as was taken seems to have prepared the way for sanctions against Italy four years later. Mr. Stimson would not give up the struggle merely because the aggressors have won a temporary victory. Above all, he does not think that the United States should abandon its interests in the Far East, basing his position not only on our substantial financial and political stake in the East but even more on the necessity for preserving and strengthening the system of cooperative action which has already been created.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Art of Hogarth

WILLIAM HOGARTH: THE COCKNEY'S MIRROR. By Marjorie Bowen. D. Appleton-Century Company. $5.

THE danger noted by Lamb when he wrote that "we look at other painters but we read Hogarth" is not entirely heeded in the present work. The statement of Sir Walter Armstrong that "of no considerable painter has so little been written in his primitive capacity of an artist" still holds for Hogarth's English biographers.

In this respect it is interesting to note how the paths followed by Austin Dobson and Miss Bowen tend to converge. Dobson began his biography with the premise that Hogarth's chief claim upon posterity was "as a pictorial chronicler of life and manners and as a satirist and humorist on canvas." He concluded that this was "an exceptional genius, not to be entirely accounted for by any preconceived theory respecting his race, his epoch, or his environment." Miss Bowen, at the start, stresses the fact this was the art of a cockney inhabitant of Georgian London, and at the end reluctantly admits that if Hogarth failed fully to achieve himself the lack lay in the man rather than in the uninspiring temper of the times.

Before arriving at this conclusion, Miss Bowen attempts to set the stage for an actor who frequently refuses to play his part. Thus we have the spectacle of a distressed biographer struggling to account for an engraver who, despite the fact that he produced the century's most trenchant satires, never properly mastered his craft, of a colorist whose chromatics were sometimes inferior to the "black masters" whom he reviled, of a portraitist whose late work was occasionally technically less able than his early. How is a biographer to reconcile the conflicting characteristics of a man who, blind to all art but his own, attempts a burlesque of Rembrandt; who quarrels with every friend except his faithful Jane; who, while contending that the not unprovoked attacks of Wilkes and Collins dealt a mortal blow, is unsparing of the physical infirmities of Pope? With such a one the only consistency which the biographer can hope to achieve is in the frank admission of his inconsistencies. For this kind of candor it is only at the end that Miss Bowen's stomach is sufficiently stout. That she also considers Hogarth the victim of a tasteless and unappreciative age seems somewhat too thin-skinned an attitude toward genius, which nothing short of physical starvation can stop; for Hogarth "a bitter age, coarse, heartless, tinged with despair" was fertile soil for satire.

She does, however, rate much admiration for the fashion in which she has recreated an unregenerate age and for her appreciation of the side of Hogarth so long neglected by his compatriots; that side which, in defiance of time and tradition, brought forth, not in the satires but in such rare performances as The Shrimp Girl, England's unique contribution to the art of painting.

VIRGINIA NIRDLINGER

Shorter Notices

THE LONELY WAYFARING MAN: EMERSON AND SOME ENGLISHMEN. By Townsend Scudder. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

Mr. Scudder has gathered together all the available material on Emerson's English friendships and organized it into a surprisingly well-constructed and lively book. The period considered, between Emerson's first and last trips to England, covers the important years of his life; the emphasis is particularly on his English lecture tour. Mr. Scudder gives us brief glimpses of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Landor, and a half-dozen other Victorian figures, but it is Carlyle who steals the show; his long friendship with Emerson provides a unifying theme for the book. Because of the vitality, the humor, and sympathy of Mr. Scudder's picture of Carlyle and partly because of the man's naturally dramatic personality, the Scotchman elbows Emerson out of the place of honor. The story of the friendship between these two men so antithetical in character and ideas makes good reading. The secondary figures—John Sterling, Jane Carlyle, Clough, Crab Robinson, and the irrepressible Harriet Martineau—are all vividly presented. The chapter on Clough suggests much of the tragedy of that almost forgotten poet's life. Mr. Scudder's aim has been to construct a biographical study of Emerson as seen through the eyes of his British contemporaries, and he has collected a good deal of new information about Emerson's friendships and about the English attitude toward him. But Emerson himself remains indistinct in the midst of these fine studies of his English friends.

BURROUGHS MITCHELL

PRELUDE TO "ICAROS." By John Williams Andrews. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

This is one of the more readable, as it is one of the more ambitious, of the numerous aeronautical epics composed since our poets became air-minded. Although it is a first book, its author appears to have taken both his craft and his subject with uncommon seriousness. His story moves in nimbly cadenced free verse to whose making the work of his Yale contemporaries MacLeish and S. V. Benét may have contributed. According to the publisher, Mr. Andrews became a licensed pilot in order to gather material, and he is obviously erudite in the literature of flying. As a result, he is able to tell interestingly the history of flight, from mythological times through the French balloonists to the Wright Brothers—and there is promise of more to come about Lindbergh. The best parts of the book are those dealing with the tinkering at Kitty Hawk, where the neat handling even of technical detail contrasts with the gusty profusion of the mythological sections. Mr. Andrews is interested in flying for the sensations it gives him, for the drama of its invention, and for its appeasement of his romantic escapism. On the day I first read the poem the news came that fifty noncombatants had been killed in an aerial bombardment of Madrid. There is no indication in the poem that the airplane has such potentialities. One concludes that Mr. Andrews has not seen all round his subject, as did, for example, Muriel Rukeyser in her "Theory of Flight."

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

WARD EIGHT. By Joseph F. Dinneen. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

This account of the rise of a machine politician in Boston's historic Ward Eight is a novel which might better have been written as non-fiction. Mr. Dinneen has a great deal of interesting material on the organizational aspects of ward politics, much of it no doubt remembered from his childhood in Boston's North End, some of it probably picked up during his years as a reporter on the Boston Globe. Unfortunately, his choice of medium seems to have hampered him in the presentation of this material. Having limited himself to the story of one man's life, he has accordingly limited his field of vision. The whole social, economic, and political life of Boston forms merely a border for the figure of the hero. The ward itself is fairly clearly delineated, but the city and the state are shadowy. Mr. Dinneen is not a creative writer of sufficient authority to make this emphasis seem anything but false. What Mr. Dinneen has observed seems inevitably of more moment than that which he has imagined.

MARY MCCARTHY

AROUSE AND BEWARE. By MacKinlay Kantor. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

The author of "Long Remember," a large and complex novel about the Battle of Gettysburg, offers in this shorter book a simpler narrative of the escape made by three persons through the Confederate lines above Richmond in 1864. Two of them are soldiers who have broken out of the prison camp at Belle Isle; the third is a woman, Naomi Kincaid, who has stabbed a Confederate officer and is flying north for her life. Stumbling, stealing, starving, and sleeping together for many days and nights in a war-infected wilderness, they reach the Rapidan River at last; but not until after the men have become rivals for the woman, and not until after all three of them have suffered every torture both of mind and of body. The story of the triangle is less interesting than the larger story of war which Mr. Kantor tells with so much learning and imagination. His wilderness is truly terrible because it is a human wilderness, inhabited by a population out of which almost every virtue has been drained by the slow tide of war. Somewhat in the manner of Stephen Crane, but with a heavier emphasis befitting the time for which he writes, Mr. Kantor constructs this wilderness and hands it to us without comment. It is an excellent document, worth preserving.

MARK VAN DOREN

DRAMA

What Porridge Had John Keats?

RECENT discoveries are said to indicate that Fanny Brawne was not the heartless creature she has always been supposed and that she was not, after all, wholly unaware of the fact that the John Keats who loved her with so feverish a love was no ordinary man. They do not, I believe, give any reason for supposing that, Romeo-like, he actually spent one night in her arms before embarking upon the fatal journey to Italy, but that privilege is granted him a century later by the author of the play called "Aged 26," which undertakes to tell his story at the Lyceum Theater. For the most part it is, however, much more cautious in handling the facts, and it is marked by a kind of artless sincerity which holds the attention once one has grown accustomed to seeing great men trotted out for the sake of atmosphere and immortal poems being perused in manuscript by trusting publishers who murmur, "Hm, this is very good, indeed. We shall have another volume soon." At one point in the first act, when not only Keats himself but also Byron, Shelley, Gifford, and Lockhart are on the stage at the same time, one is reminded of some of the deathless stage directions in "Savonarola" Brown's life work, and when everybody is so carefully explaining who everybody else is, one expects momentarily to hear something like, "This is Mr. Lockhart, who will one day write a great biography of Sir Walter Scott."

I shall not pretend that Robert Harris in the leading role ever quite persuaded me that he had actually just tossed off the "Ode to a Grecian Urn" or that, after a struggle, he had actually just hit upon the line "Season of mist and mellow fruitfulness" as exactly what he had been looking for as the beginning to an "Ode to Autumn." No one, I suspect, could quite do that. To me, at least, it is easier to believe that an actor is George Washington about to cross the Delaware or that he is Napoleon and has just won the Battle of Waterloo than it is to believe that he has just written a great book or just painted a picture I have seen in the Louvre. That is one of the reasons why an artist seems to me one of the worst possible subjects for a play, and why I hope that the strange epidemic of plays about writers will not last very long.

The fact remains, however, that Mr. Harris does pretty nearly everything except the impossible, and that it is doubtless largely due to him that "Aged 26" takes on no little life once one has got over the impression unfortunately created in the beginning that we are in for nothing more or less than a painless—or at least moderately painless—course in the history of English literature. Mr. Harris is simple, restrained, gentle, and not unimpressive. He accepts the fact that Keats, like most great artists, probably bore few visible signs of his greatness and behaved in general very much as any other young man who was like him in everything except genius would have behaved. The result is to make the portrait extremely engaging and about as convincing as Keats as anyone could make it. Linda Watson is also extremely good as Fanny, and Kenneth McKenna as one of the devoted publishers.

What interests me most is the question why so many biographical plays should suddenly have made their appearance, and it is hard not to suspect that there is a genuine if negative significance in the fact. It must mean some sudden emptiness, some inability on the part of playwrights to discover themes which seem to them significant, and a consequent tendency to look not only for ready-made stories but for ready-made stories to which history has contributed a significance that cannot be questioned. Perhaps the present emphasis upon sociological themes has something to do with the situation. Perhaps the playwright whose interests do not go in that direction has been made to feel that the only way a play without sociological significance can be made to seem "important" at all is to give it a subject whose "importance" is already established. Or perhaps, as the sociologists themselves would prefer to argue, there are no contemporary subjects the significance of which is not in some way sociological. In either event it is difficult to regard any biographical play which is essentially no more than a dramatization of known facts as other than a sort of stop-gap. It cannot be really first-rate dramatic creation. There is not enough of the playwright in it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

Ethiopia and the Red Square

IN TWO quiet weeks before the Christmas storm I have seen nothing on the screen that was more interesting than a series of Russian newsreels (technically known as documentary films) at the Cameo. This is not to say that the two weeks were wasted, for good documents are good things, and these were miles out of the ordinary. They possessed that special power which all natural things have, the power of stimulating the observer to think quietly—and sometimes queerly—by himself. The leading film in the present case, called "Abyssinia" because it was about "The Fascist Rape of Ethiopia," prodded me for instance to think some thoughts of which I am not proud but which I must record. I was duly horrified by the bombing of hospitals, and I certainly saw nothing to make me glad that the Italians had ever left Italy; but I found it impossible to accept the Ethiopians as figures in a tragedy. Had they been savages I might have seen them so, or had they been civilized. The pathetic and even ridiculous thing about them was that they were neither; they were halfway between—hybrids under umbrellas—and in some nerveless, listless way irrelevant either to pity or to wrath. They were too long out of darkness to remember it, and they had not yet emerged into light. The camera painted them a transitional gray, just as it molded them into the thin shapes of ghosts. Many of their faces were beautiful, but the bodies below them had lost their dignity; at about the same time, I suppose, that the villages had lost their character. It was unspeakably pathetic, this rape, and decidedly nothing for a European nation to boast about. But I could not see it as the fall of a great people, or even of an interesting one.

Whereas the Russian people in the films which followed "Abyssinia" seemed greater than the camera knew how to say. My reflections at the moment were doubtless naive, but they sprang directly from what I saw, and this is what I saw—particularly in the film called Youth Day March in Moscow. A nation of young men and women marched across a huge square, and everyone of them was happy. They were strong first of all, for they were by way of being athletes; but each of their faces glowed with smiles that could be seen a block off. I seem to be making them out a waxwork army, a poster people. They were not that. The smiles must have had a deep inner source, for they kept on coming and they broke over the faces with an entirely natural joy. There could have been no rehearsal for this; nobody could have taught the art of smiling so, for it is not an art. I felt like the old Philadelphian who upon being taken for the first time to Niagara Falls stared at it a long time and then was heard to exclaim: "But it can't be artificial!" This couldn't be propaganda. Which means that it was excellent propaganda—the best, in fact, that has come out of Russia to my knowledge.

Someone told me that I should see Shirley Temple in her latest and best picture because in this picture she was more herself than usual, and less the dancing doll. I have no prejudice against child actors—quite the contrary, in fact—and so I went to see "Stowaway" (Twentieth Century-Fox). She dances only once, but she is still a doll. This remains a pity, for if someone could be induced to let the child alone for a minute she might smile in the right places and discover that her voice was her own.

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

Sitdown in Java

Dear Sirs: Whatever Louis Adamic touches he endows with the qualities of his forceful and colorful personality. None of your readers can escape the charm of his story of the sitdown in rubber in The Nation of December 5. But Mr. Adamic's cheerful narrative neglected to mention the fact that Goodyear is completing its first twelve months' operation of a giant new factory at Buitenzorg, Java, where in the midst of a plantation of some 8,000,000 mature rubber trees the docile Javanese are being taught to make tires. The project has Mr. Litchfield's particular blessing, and naturally the Dutch are enthusiastic.

If this is not the industry's answer to the sitdown, if the flight of rubber to this "Sans Souci" and others has not, as other writers claim, already doomed Akron, will Mr. Adamic tell us why? One other point. Mr. Adamic describes the police as helpless in the face of a strike in Akron. But elsewhere the management's reply seems to be tear gas.

BERNARD RAYMUND

Dublin, Ohio, December 15

Chain Stores and Independents

Dear Sirs: I read with a great deal of interest the article in the November 28 Nation by my colleague, Representative Wright Patman, entitled Curbing the Chain Store. I vigorously opposed the passage of this legislation on the floor of the House and before the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member. It was opposed by practically every economist of note, including Professors Malcolm P. McNair of Harvard, M. C. Waltersdorf of Washington and Jefferson College, W. A. Carter of Dartmouth, C. C. Huntington of Ohio State University, Walter E. Spahr of New York University, and T. R. Snavely of the University of Virginia. I have yet to discover any worthwhile economist who has espoused it.

My distinguished colleague states that as a direct result of this bill "small business is expanding, new buildings are being built and vacant ones occupied, men and women are being employed, the farmer is being aided by getting a fair return for his crops, . . . consumers . . .

are getting lower prices because monopoly has been checked and competition increased." Congressman Patman has assigned to his bill (which only became effective June 16, 1936) the cumulative results of more than three years of effort by the present Administration.

He speaks of a boon to the farmer but fails to indicate that the farmers were directly opposed to the passage of the act and continue in their opposition to it. The American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, and the Northeast Farmers' Union Legislative Committee, to name a few of the more important organizations, opposed it. It is pertinent to observe that Secretary of Agriculture Wallace was a vigorous opponent.

As a ranking member of the Judiciary Committee of the House, I opposed this bill primarily because it would be a raw deal for the consumer. It involves an annual increase in cost of food to the consumer of approximately $750,000,000. The increase in the cost of clothes and other essentials is comparable. Professor Harold G. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, recently said: "This bill, in so far as it would strike at all those who have heretofore been effective in reducing prices, to that extent will raise prices."

Large distributors, buying large quantities, are able to pass benefits in reduction in price on to the consumer. The Robinson-Patman Act, in so far as it would strike at quantity discounts, even if they be discretionary, to that extent impedes the passing on to the consumer of savings in price.

The bill was expected to assist the small retailer, but I fear the small retailer who urged its adoption has been following false prophets. Small wholesalers and retailers have written me advising that they are being dropped by their sources of supply and can no longer purchase the articles essential to their continuance in business. Many manufacturers are refusing to sell to small dealers and are confining their sales to large purchasers, to whom they grant discounts. Therefore the retailers and small wholesalers must buy from large distributors. The ultimate consumer must thus pay for the profits of several middlemen.

A rather new and unfortunate note in legal procedure is struck in that the bill provides that a defendant in proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission must prove that he is innocent. He must exculpate himself. A mere charge constitutes a prima facie case. Contrary to our time-honored tradition, he is considered guilty unless he proves his innocence.

EMANUEL CELLER,

M. C. Tenth New York District
New York, December 12

The Fall of Weirton

Dear Sirs: A few weeks ago the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee staged what might be called a coup at Weirton. Seven thousand employees of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company have been on strike now for several weeks. To keep up the workers' morale and increase the solidarity between plants, several steel organizers arranged for a caravan of 25 cars, holding 100 glass workers, to go to Weirton to help distribute Steel Labor. With them were several S. W. O. C. organizers, the committee's attorney, Lee Pressman, and a man ready to file $10,000 in bond in the event of anyone's arrest. There were also three investigators of the La Follette committee. Papers were distributed at every mill gate. A few of the workers looked at the papers guardedly and put them in the rubbish barrel; most of them stuck them in their pockets and walked off with them. Weir's police stood along the curb, said nothing, but wrote down, presumably, the names of those who took the papers. The La Follette committee investigators stopped their car and took a picture of the deputy writing down the workers' names. The deputy was so busy he did not even notice he was being photographed until someone from the office across the street cried: "Hey, you're going to get a free ride to Washington for this. You had your picture taken."

The workers have not had such a sense of freedom since the summer of 1933, after the NIRA was enacted. The organizers are signing them up right in the Weirton mills. Incidentally Steve Barron, who was beaten up by company police shortly before the election, was elected constable in Weir's own stronghold.

ROSE M. STEIN

Pittsburgh, December 20

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Personal History

Dear Sirs: Yesterday I visited a department of the city government with the object of collecting a bill. About a year ago our company erected a building for this department, under PWA supervision, since which time we have repented, confessed, and begged for absolution.

At the end of my five-hour interview, it appeared that only one item blocked payment of our last $10,000—a hitherto overlooked claim by the city that we might have provided a typewriter sooner than we did. It was tentatively suggested that we might have saved $24 by our delay.

Behold me arguing about that $24 for five hours with three well-paid officials! Why? Because to admit their claim would necessitate a change order.

A change order starts with a request from the architect for the building (who is at loggerheads with the department architect and would be reluctant to make it) and a reply from us, in two originals and nine copies, all signed. These reside on the desk of the department architect for six weeks. Eventually, if our papers do not get lost, they are moved from the department architect's desk to the deputy commissioner's office for signature, then back to the department architect for transmittal to the department auditor. The auditor loses them with surprising promptness. If I spend a morning in his office, he finds them. If it happens to be a Wednesday morning, he will probably stamp them Thursday. Then away they go again, through channels, to the Director of the Budget.

This good man works fast and obligingly—but one never knows how or when the papers reach him. In his turn he transmits them to the State Director of the Public Works Administration—which means in effect that they get lost in the mail department at 2 Lafayette Street. A visit to a rather temperamental old engineer who represents the state director on this project may produce them. If and when this individual, in his turn, receives a report from the resident engineer inspector in the field, he comments on our proposal and returns it to the mail department. From this point one week will generally suffice to get it across the street to the city department in question, and in three weeks more we may receive a letter some fine morning stating that our $24 credit is accepted, and the way is clear for our $10,000 payment, which can then be had in two months.

The saddest part of all this is that the men who, through force of unfortunate circumstances, have become government officials appear to be scrupulously honest, most of them intelligent, many of them well-intentioned, some extremely hard-working. The incredible madhouse which results from their labors is a sore discouragement to anyone who favors a planned economy.

For every dollar our company spends in supervision of construction we spend just about two on paper work.

I offer no answer. I merely add that our company views the return of private enterprise to construction with unmixed joy.

A HARASSED CONTRACTOR
New York, December 14

Help the Seamen

Dear Sirs: As a survivor of the Mohawk disaster I came to learn about the conditions suffered by the men who man our ships, and am writing you on their behalf. I know how just their demands are in the present strike and am convinced that victory for them will mean greater safety for crew and passenger alike.

I most urgently ask the readers of The Nation to help the strikers win. To do this, they must have food, clothing, shelter, funds.

Contributions may be sent to the Citizens' Committee to Aid the Striking Seamen, 232 West Twenty-second Street, New York. The telephone number is WAtkins 9-7447.

SARAH JACKSON SMITH,
Secretary
New York, December 22

Reward of Confidence

Dear Sirs: It may interest you to know that the accurate information and forecast of The Nation and Mr. Ward brought me in $300. I had absolute confidence in the impartiality of the election news in The Nation and rejected the public press, which gave an entirely different picture, and the Digest poll, which turned out the best farce of the period.

C. O. GRIFFIN
Lindsay, Cal., December 15

Correction

[In our issue of November 28 we referred to the Anarchist newspaper Man as having discontinued publication in 1929. On the contrary, Man was not born until January, 1930, and, as its editor assures us, is still very much alive. At present it is being published in New York City.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

CONTRIBUTORS

WALTER DURANTY is an Englishman by birth whose dispatches from Russia since the early years of the Soviet regime have made him perhaps the best-known foreign correspondent of the American press. His book, "I Write As I Please," was among the earliest of the sagas of foreign correspondents which have made such vivid reading during the last two years. After a brief period of reporting the civil war in Spain he is now on a visit to this country.

EDWARD LEVINSON is labor editor of the New York Post and author of "I Break Strikes," an account of the activities of Pearl Bergoff and his scabs.

PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN, rabbi of the B'rith Kodesh Temple of Rochester, New York, and chairman of the Committee on International Peace, has spent much time studying Jewish problems in Europe. He expects soon to return to Palestine on a sabbatical leave of absence.

HENRY C. WOLFE, lecturer and writer on European affairs, has recently returned from his annual trip to Central Europe and the Balkans.

JAMES STILL was born in Alabama, educated in Tennessee, and now lives in Troublesome Creek, Kentucky. His poems and short stories have appeared in the Yale Review, Atlantic Monthly, Poetry, and other periodicals.

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT, formerly dean of the School of Art at the University of Denver and curator of the Denver Art Museum, is at present one of the directors of the Federal Art Project in New York City.

IRWIN EDMAN, professor of philosophy at Columbia University, is the author of "The Mind of Paul" and the editor of Santayana's collected philosophical works.

VIRGINIA NIRDLINGER has been art critic and book reviewer for International Studio and Fine Arts.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 9, 1937

NUMBER 2

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

FOURTEEN POINTS FOR CONGRESS	31
GENERAL MOTORS MEETS THE ENEMY	33
PRO-FASCIST NEUTRALITY	33
BIRTH CONTROL TODAY	34
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	35
SPAIN'S "RED" FOREIGN LEGION by Louis Fischer	36
FARM TENANCY: A PROGRAM by Lawrence Westbrook	39
BLUM AND THE COMMUNISTS by M. E. Ravage	41
SENATOR NORRIS'S LEGISLATURE by Roscoe Fleming	43
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	45
BROUN'S PAGE	46
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
ON BEING MODERN-MINDED by Bertrand Russell	47
JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON by Carl Becker	48
THE WINGLESS LIFE by Mark Van Doren	50
AN IDEAL FOR LITERATURE OR LIFE by Irwin Edman	50
A BAEDEKER OF JEW-BAITING by James Waterman Wise	52
DRAMA: MORE MATTER AND LESS ART by Joseph Wood Krutch	53
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin	54

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

AS WE GO TO PRESS THE PRESIDENT IS ABOUT to deliver his annual message to Congress. We shall comment on it editorially next week. Meanwhile we submit to the attention of Congress a tentative legislative program of our own. It represents, obviously, only the bare bones of a policy. In the weeks that follow, The Nation will deal with each issue at greater length in editorials and articles, and will seek thus to clothe the skeleton in flesh and blood.

★

WHATEVER HOPE HAD EXISTED FOR A SPEEDY termination of the European crisis disappeared over the week-end when it became apparent that not only Germany but Italy was sending a large number of new "volunteers" to the support of General Franco's rebels. The German action was not unexpected, especially after the Reich's refusal to accept the release of the freighter Palos as final settlement of that controversy. But the renewal of Italian assistance to the rebels came as a bitter surprise following the Anglo-Italian pact. Britain obtained a definite pledge that "so far as Italy is concerned the present territories of Spain shall remain intact." It also received full assurance that Mussolini would not seek to undermine its present position in the Mediterranean. But it apparently did not receive any guaranties regarding Italian intervention in the Spanish conflict. This raises a suspicion that Britain may have agreed to an Italian-aided rebel victory in Spain on the condition that foreign troops be withdrawn at the conclusion of hostilities. In support of this possibility, it is known that the British Foreign Office has consistently favored a rebel victory and has only been concerned in recent weeks lest Spain be permanently occupied by German or Italian troops. On the other hand, the developments of the past few weeks make it increasingly evident that even if General Franco wins he cannot hold power without permanent occupation by foreign troops. And whatever Britain may do, France cannot afford to see an insurgent victory. Such stubborn facts may yet restore Britain to sanity.

★

MEANWHILE, IN SPAIN, THE INFLUX OF German and Italian troops seems not to have stemmed the tide which has been running strongly in favor of the loyalists in recent weeks. The new year found the government troops definitely on the offensive in every sector except possibly Andalusia—where a strong rebel attack has just been repulsed. The failure of the well-trained German troops to make a better showing against the workers' militia has been attributed to the "haphazard conditions" of the Spanish war in contrast to the mechanically perfect conditions under which they were trained. Considerable friction also appears to have developed between the Germans and their Spanish allies, who cling to the outmoded idea that Spain belongs to the Spaniards. At the same time reports from Catalonia indicate much closer harmony between the Anarchists and Popular Front parties than has hitherto existed, despite official notice that Catalonia will never assent to domination by Madrid such as existed prior to July 19. It is not unlikely that the improvement in organization and discipline in the government militia may have more effect on the final outcome than two divisions of German troops.

★

TWO MORE UNANIMOUS DECISIONS BY THE Supreme Court make it appear that the judges are trying very hard to present a united front to a hostile public opinion. One, upholding the constitutionality of the Ashurst-Summers Act implementing the state laws (already enacted by thirty states) against prison-made goods, will be good news to the labor movement, which has fought the competition of convict labor. The other, overruling the conviction of Dirk de Jonge under the Oregon criminal-syndicalism law, is even better news for the civil-liberties movement. De Jonge's case, since the only accusation against him was that he spoke at a Communist meeting called to protest against police activities in a seamen's strike, was one that struck a blow at the whole organizing movement in labor. Both decisions are clearly sound and enlightened, although we wish that Chief Justice Hughes in the De Jonge case had directly ruled the state criminal-syndicalism law unconstitutional. Meanwhile Senator Robinson's statement on the need for a wages-and-hours amendment looks perilously like an attempt to smooth his path against labor opposition to his possible appointment to a Supreme Court vacancy.

★

THE PARDON OF CHANG HSUEH-LIANG AFTER a nominal sentence of ten years' imprisonment for having kidnapped the country's dictator is consistent with the suspicion that an anti-Japanese deal was arranged in connection with the release of Chiang Kai-shek. Further evidence of the success of Chang's coup may be seen in the apparent abandonment of Nanking's recently announced anti-Communist campaign, and in the fact that the troops of the rebel Chang and Yang Fu-chen have been allowed to retain their positions in contact with the red army. While it does not seem probable that T. V. Soong, Chiang's anti-Japanese brother-in-law, will immediately assume the premiership, a general Cabinet shake-up is anticipated that will give a much larger representation to left-wing elements and may be the forerunner of a genuine Popular Front government for China.

AT LEAST ONE FUGITIVE INDUSTRY HAS BEEN stopped in its flight to the promised land of low wages and other "favorable conditions" in those small towns where there is a thriving chamber of commerce but no trade unions. Supreme Court Justice Philip J. McCook last week decreed that two affiliated dress companies must live up to an agreement with the garment unions in New York City not to move their shop or factory "from its present location to any place beyond which the public-carrier fare is more than five cents." In October the two dress firms locked out their workers and moved their machinery to Archbald, Pennsylvania. They have been ordered to move it back and to reimburse the 200 locked-out employees. This is a notable and entirely sensible decision. While it will have no legal bearing on those similar situations in which no such agreement exists, its psychological effect is salutary. There has been much talk of the ingratitude of labor in "forcing" employers to decamp from New York City because of alleged prohibitive labor costs. "With the end of NRA," said Justice McCook, "appeared a new need for such contracts as the one in suit. Without a remedy as wide as that need, unscrupulous employers of labor will be tempted to play one community off against another, unlawfully depriving New York City of her business and her inhabitants of their livelihood." At the risk of being branded ingrates, the labor unions no doubt will continue the attempt to raise the standard of living of their members and to fight the small-town sweatshop.

★

TWENTY-SEVEN PEOPLE WERE KILLED LAST month in airplane crashes. We do not intend to follow up this statement with an angry attack on the airlines, for in spite of these fatalities they have passed the best year in their history as far as safety is concerned. But December's tragic total of air deaths does call attention to grave problems in aviation which should be and can be rectified. To blind flying under dangerous weather conditions most of last year's accidents have been due, and until technical improvements make radio beams infallible, blind flying should be prohibited. More important is the necessity of transferring the regulation of commercial aviation from the Bureau of Air Commerce to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Remembering Secretary Roper's secretive policy in connection with the investigations into air and sea safety last spring, we may expect nothing of any value to emerge from the bureau's coming secret investigation of the December crashes. Nor, in view of the bureau's notorious incompetence and negligence, do we believe that its requested $10,000,000 appropriation for improving safety devices will help matters much. As was recommended by Joseph B. Eastman, former federal Coordinator of Transportation, the I. C. C., which already regulates bus lines and railroads, is the logical body to put in charge of commercial aviation. A bill to give the I. C. C. the necessary powers was introduced in the House of Representatives last session. Its passage should be one of the first acts of the new Congress.

LAWRENCE WESTBROOK ON ANOTHER PAGE of this issue presents a design for dealing with the evils of the agricultural system as it crumbles toward final extinction in the South. With his major point we agree. The logical solution would be to set up a separate administration to take over the functions of rural resettlement, and as Mr. Westbrook suggests, to draw upon the specialized knowledge and services that have been developed in a number of federal agencies. But this solution, simple on paper, bristles with difficulties in practice. To tackle simultaneously a knotty social-economic problem and a problem of interdepartmental, federal-state coordination and still to keep the red tape from throttling both efforts is a task of staggering proportions. With this single warning we indorse Mr. Westbrook's plan in its larger aspects. We support particularly his proposal that representatives of the tenant farmers' union be drawn into all discussions of legislation; we would go farther and urge that union men be included in any administrative agencies that may be set up. And we also urge that the government give legal protection to the legitimate activities of the farm organizations in the South. In the end the success of any plan of reform will depend on the ability of the croppers and laborers to organize for improving their own conditions and voicing their own grievances.

★

THE OLD GAG OF STEALING A MAN'S PANTS in order to prevent him from going out and doing whatever it is you don't want him to do has been adapted to new purposes in England. Parliament has passed the Public Order Bill, which prohibits the wearing of political uniforms and the maintaining, organizing, or training of private armies. Spurred by the Blackshirt parade which caused the East End riots last October, the act was drafted for the express purpose of curbing Sir Oswald Mosley's fascist organization and as such is all to the good. Under a similar act Scandinavian fascist groups, deprived of the glamor of uniforms and with their parades rendered innocuous, quietly melted away. At this moment Sir Oswald doubtless feels as frustrated and furious as the man without his pants. Nevertheless, the act cannot be regarded with unmixed rejoicing. The original draft contained many clauses which, in allowing the police to suppress demonstrations and parades at their own discretion without having to answer for their action in court and in other ways, constituted serious violations of civil liberties. Some of these were amended in committee, and all may since have been eliminated. But if the act stands as it was, it is an example of how democracy may trip itself up in trying to avoid fascism.

★

THE PLAN MOOTED IN WASHINGTON TO centralize the government press handouts strikes us as dangerous. For one thing it will shut hardworking newspapermen out of news. More important, it is a step toward the totalitarian state. A democracy can never afford to build a Chinese wall around public opinion.

Fourteen Points for Congress

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS: The editors of The Nation take the liberty of addressing this message to you. This is the first session in eight years not completely dominated by the shadow of the depression, and therefore one in which you can build a program of progressive legislation in more permanent terms. You will be told on all sides to be hard-headed and practical, not to go chasing after Utopias. We agree. But our social system is confronted today by certain hard facts which make their own demands and set their own pace for solution.

We shall waste no time in rhetoric. In the modern state the dispatches to a legislative assembly should be as brief and clipped as communiqués from a battlefield. We are setting down therefore a fourteen-point program, which represents not an ideal social system but the next steps that must be taken in social advance for America.

1. Relief and Unemployment. There must be no curtailing of work relief except as the unemployable are put on direct relief and the unemployed but employable are absorbed in industry. Until the end of the fiscal year the estimate of $877,500,000 made by the relief survey of the Conference of Mayors must be accepted as a minimum. A permanent relief and employment policy must be accompanied by a census of unemployment and the setting up of an adequate system of government employment exchanges.

2. Social Security. The present Social Security Act needs revision as follows: (a) Establish immediately federal health insurance; (b) provide for the inclusion of agricultural workers, domestic servants, and other exempt employees under the unemployment and old-age provisions; (c) eliminate employee contributions from both the unemployment and old-age provisions, and make up the difference with federal funds drawn from progressive taxation; (d) substitute a state-subsidy plan for the present cumbersome tax-offset plan for unemployment insurance; (e) eliminate the huge reserves contemplated for the old-age annuity plan, future deficits to be made up by taxation; (f) provide for an increase in the benefits under both plans, and advance the effective date for the old-age annuity plan to January 1, 1938.

3. Housing. A long-term program of low-cost housing construction, to be financed by federal subsidies to municipalities, trade unions, and public-housing groups, and to be carried on under the final control of a Federal Housing Corporation, but to be immediately subject to decentralized supervision. The construction is to be done under union wages and working conditions, with tenant and labor representation on the supervising groups to insure that rents will remain low.

4. Labor Standards and Labor Relations. To carry out President Roosevelt's expressed determination that "something must be done" to end child labor, starvation wages,

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

and long hours in industry, we recommend: (a) a federal licensing measure, on the lines of the O'Mahoney proposal, whereby firms whose products enter into interstate commerce will be licensed by the federal government and must comply with child-labor provisions, minimum-wage rates, and maximum-hour and collective-bargaining provisions; (b) a plan of control in particular industries, as coal and textiles, unless it injures the consumer interest; (c) a constitutional amendment.

5. Trade Practices. While the existing anti-trust laws are not adequate and have never really been enforced, the present pressure to suspend or repeal them is dangerous. Pending more adequate legislation, it is imperative that a strong food-and-drug act be passed to protect the consumer, and that methods be studied for protecting the low-income consumer, both as to price and quality, in such basic necessities as milk and coal.

6. Public Utilities. The Wheeler committee's evidence of recklessness in the financial control of railroads should be gravely weighed, and the problem raised whether government control of railroads can be effective short of nationalization. Similar studies should also be made for the public utilities in gas and electric power. The control of holding companies in public utilities should be protected from judicial assault. We favor taking air-transport regulation from the Commerce Department and placing it with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

7. Power. Ratification of the St. Lawrence waterways treaty will reduce the cost of power in the region affected. In the TVA controversy, principles must be placed above personalities, and every effort made to preserve the government's most promising experiment in making increased power available at low rates.

8. Security Control. The powers of the Securities and Exchange Commission in ordering the segregation of brokers and dealers, and in developing control of the over-the-counter operations should be supplemented by (a) legislation empowering the commission to regulate the activities of protective committees and other groups in reorganizations; (b) regulation of investment trusts.

9. Budget, Taxation, Monetary and Credit Policy. It is desirable to have a balanced budget, but no fetish should be made of it, and balance should not be achieved at the cost of necessary social services. The corporate-surplus tax should be retained. The need for increased revenue should be met by strengthening the income tax in the intermediate brackets. No great harm will be done if the President's power to fix the value of the dollar is allowed to lapse. The great danger now is from too rapid monetary and credit inflation, which should be discouraged as a concealed form of taxation resting on manual labor and the white-collar groups.

10. Agriculture and Land Settlement. While soil conservation and crop insurance are both desirable, amendments to the Soil Conservation Act are required to restore an adequate measure of federal control. The work of the Resettlement Administration must be continued in giving immediate aid to the landless in our derelict areas and to the impoverished landowners in drought-stricken and eroded areas. For a more permanent program we favor a government corporation as provided in the Bankhead bill, with adequate annual appropriations and power to finance the taking up of land by sharecroppers and tenant farmers. But this should be only part of a larger program of agricultural education, public health, and cooperation.

11. Personnel and Government Service. In effecting a reorganization of government agencies, care should be taken that, in the interest of either economy or efficiency, essential social services are not sacrificed or placed in hostile hands. The formation, by a regrouping of existing agencies, of three new Cabinet departments—Public Welfare, Public Works, and National Defense—is desirable. Government employees not under the merit system should be placed under it.

12. Civil Liberties. We favor (a) additional grants for the La Follette civil-liberties investigation; (b) legislation to insure greater freedom on the radio, the treatment of controversial subjects from all sides (as in political campaigns), and the exemption of the radio stations from libel suits; (c) an adequate anti-lynching bill, on the Wagner-Costigan model, providing federal prosecution of lynchers where the states fail to act; (d) legislation providing for jury review of the decisions of the Post Office Department solicitor banning material from the mails on the grounds of obscenity and sedition; (e) legislation to give the Labor Department wider discretion in handling "hardship" deportation cases; (f) repeal of the Blanton "red rider," muzzling the freedom of teachers in the District of Columbia.

13. Neutrality, Munitions, National Defense. We favor, as a neutrality policy, an embargo on the sale of munitions and basic war materials or the extension of credits to belligerent nations. Such an embargo should be imposed at the outbreak of war, but the President is to be empowered to suspend the embargo in case the majority of the signatories of the Kellogg Pact find that a country has been attacked in violation of the pact. We favor also the Nye plan for the nationalization of the munitions industry, and legislation "freezing" war profits in other basic industries to a minimum rate. We favor a unified national-defense policy which shall be restricted to the defense of the continental territory of the United States, and we ask a special Congressional investigation to determine a reasonable budget for such a policy.

14. Court and Constitution. We do not believe that action looking to a constitutional amendment precludes Congressional action regulating the exercise of the judicial power. Otherwise steps toward an amendment could be used as a screen to postpone indefinitely action to curb the Supreme Court's power. We favor therefore (a) a clarifying amendment, stating that the commerce clause shall apply to industry and agriculture wherever the products cross state lines, and giving Congress thus clear regulatory power; (b) a wages-and-hours amendment for the states, if later decisions should prove it necessary; (c) legislation either giving Congress the power to override a Supreme Court veto by two-thirds' vote, or providing that the court shall not invalidate an act of Congress except by at least a two-thirds' vote.

General Motors Meets the Enemy

THE ice age of craft unionism having come to an end, the forces of industrial unionism are spreading over the Great American Desert of unorganized mass-production labor with a speed that has outrun all expectations. The present crisis in automobiles, which had been more or less expected in the spring, had its beginning in an 85 per cent tie-up in flat-glass production; its end may be a stoppage in steel and coal. Such is the nature of industrial unionism. No wonder A. P. Sloan, Jr., and William S. Knudsen of General Motors want to divert this terrifying unity into as many separate ditches as the corporation has plants.

With sure instinct automobile employers have set out to discredit the unions with all the resources at their command. The first of these is publicity—and smoke bombs labeled "One Happy Family" and "Outside Agitators" have already been tossed into the public prints. Having fought collective bargaining tooth and nail they now self-righteously accuse the union of failing to bargain collectively before going on strike. Having for years cheated the workers out of a living wage or anything resembling security of employment, they now talk, more in sorrow than in anger, of the vast sums being lost in wages, of the thousands of "loyal" employees kept from jobs. Having agreed upon a uniform wage-and-hours policy in a directors' room in Detroit—or in Wall Street—they refer the union to plant managers, as if plant managers were anything more than glorified foremen.

Behind this smoke screen of publicity, the employers are preparing their real offensive—economic and, if necessary, physical attacks upon the workers and their unions. The united front of the automobile, steel, and coal operators is assured. Word comes from Toledo that officials of the struck glass plant there, under pressure from the automobile employers, have suddenly become reluctant even to discuss the new agreement proposed by the union. The coal operators meanwhile, in a flank attack designed to divert the energies of John L. Lewis, have served notice on the United Mine Workers that they intend to lengthen the work week in the next agreement. We may have no doubt that steel will also do its part.

We may have no doubt either that Mr. Knudsen's decrees holding up advertising and canceling orders for steel, rubber, and accessories are among the weapons agreed upon for ending the strike without benefit of collective bargaining. It is even possible that the industrialists are ready to sacrifice the rosy-cheeked child Recovery rather than allow the unions a victory. As for the cruder forms of coercion to be applied directly to the workers, there is the "legal" injunction. It has already been invoked—the stop-and-desist order issued in Flint makes it difficult to believe in the existence of an anti-injunction law—and it will lead all too logically, as it has already led in Cleveland, to tear gas, police clubs, and broken heads.

The industrialists know just how crucial this battle is. The United Automobile Workers and the Committee for Industrial Organization also know its significance. It remains for the rank-and-file citizen to realize its importance. Let him get the matter straight—before he reads another line in his local newspaper. We are witnessing the first great upsurge of labor's strength under the banner of industrial unionism. Its demands are just. Its leaders are able and sincere. If it wins this first major skirmish, the victory will send new confidence and fresh energy streaming into every union in the country. It will strengthen the hand of the democratic rank and file; it will speed the organization of the unorganized. In a word, it will hasten the establishment of a strong mass labor movement which is the best defense against reaction and the only solid or enduring basis for a political party whose "liberalism" is dictated by principle and not by pressure.

It is because the industrial monopoly knows its implications that the automobile, steel, and coal owners will fight this strike to the bitter end. Mr. Roosevelt and his Administration know its implications. The President must also know that the workers who helped elect him are watching his every move with a new-found political awareness. They are able to recognize strike-breaking in any form; moreover, they have learned from Roosevelt himself that Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., is an economic royalist—to be resisted in the name of American democracy.

Some time ago we wrote in these columns that "history may record that in 1936 the giant of American labor cast off the tight but puny bonds of craft unionism and started going places." On New Year's Day, 1937, the giant was shouldering his way into the open-shop paradise of Detroit.

Pro-Fascist Neutrality

A MAJOR sensation was created this past week by the "discovery" that the Neutrality Act had no bearing on the Spanish conflict. Although this fact was pointed out last August by the State Department itself, some of the sensational newspapers have sought to give the impression that the crafty Robert Cuse—alleged to be a Soviet agent because he once made sales to Russia—had ferreted out a "loophole" in the existing neutrality legislation and through it was planning to dispatch a lot of airplane parts to the Spanish government. The result has been a veritable clamor from the reactionary papers, supported we regret to say by Mr. Roosevelt himself, for a broadening of the act to include civil conflicts. Suggestions have also been made that all Americans who participate in the Spanish struggle be deprived of their citizenship, and that the law be strengthened to include raw materials and other potential war supplies.

To much in the argument of the neutrality advocates we can give unqualified support. We agree, of course, that America's commercial and financial relationships led it into the last war and are likely to lead it into the next one. We agree as to the necessity for adding raw materials and other war supplies to the list of articles to be embargoed in the event of war. We would give full support to Senator Vandenberg's contention that the rules of neutrality must be laid down in advance of a war because "the exercise of discretion after a war has started inevitably invites an unneutral interpretation by any belligerent which is curtailed or offended by the decision."

Unfortunately, neither the President nor Senator Vandenberg appears to have noted the pertinence to the Spanish situation of this last argument. Here is a war already in existence. Under international law American citizens are prohibited from aiding the military clique which has risen up against the duly elected government of Spain. In the past the United States has never challenged this law. On the contrary, we were insistent, at the time of our own Civil War, on the scrupulous observance of the rule; and have repeatedly hidden behind it when supporting puppet Latin American dictatorships of our own choosing. To take action now in denying supplies to the Spanish government in its hour of need would be a deliberately unfriendly act. It would be worse than merely to accord the rebels belligerent rights to which they are not entitled. With Hitler openly aiding the insurgents, a general embargo by the United States, like the European non-intervention agreement, would be denying the government the resources of which the rebels are actually availing themselves. An embargo against Spain and Germany would be as bad, since no munitions are normally shipped to the Reich. The United States would in effect be taking sides in the Spanish conflict, and taking the side of the Spanish militarists, Hitler, and Mussolini against the government chosen by the Spanish people. Nor could there be any pretext that Congress was merely enforcing a principle agreed upon in pre-war days. There was never any intention of applying the Neutrality Act to civil war. In acting in the midst of the battle Congress is responding to the passions of the moment. And we need not look very far to find what interests in America are anxious for a fascist victory in Spain.

Much the same indictment can be made of the movement to enact neutrality legislation which would be mandatory in its application. We have already moved past the point where neutrality can be considered in terms of a hypothetical next war. The next war is upon us, and it is almost certain that it will be a war of aggression precipitated by Hitler with or without the aid of Mussolini. Ranged against the fascist powers will be France, the Soviet Union, and almost as surely England. It happens that England and France are much more dependent on supplies from the United States than Germany. Any announcement by the United States that it will not under any circumstances furnish the belligerent countries with the sinews of war is an open invitation to Hitler to launch his attack. Supplies that are denied the democratic countries would be just as useful to Hitler as the same amount of supplies sealed and delivered to Nazi Germany. Neutrality regulations which could be lifted in case the League found a certain country to be the innocent victim of aggression would not be open to this objection. If this country is to depart from traditional neutrality, let it at least be sure that it is not actively supporting fascism.

Birth Control Today

THE birth-control movement has passed out of the first long phase of its development into a new and more respectable one. It is no longer primarily a struggle, a social and moral revolution productive of heroes and martyrs, police raids, recriminations, and hysterics. It has won through to what might be called a safe period—though the phrase must not be taken in its common or Roman Catholic sense. On the contrary, never did the cause of birth control show fewer signs of even temporary sterility. Its newly won security has given it an opportunity to do the work that it was founded to make possible. Actual education in birth-control methods, the control and standardization of contraceptive appliances, scientific experiment and the development of safer techniques—these are the functions it will concentrate on in the coming years.

The roots of this change are imbedded partly in the long struggle itself, culminating in the successful fight conducted by Morris L. Ernst to establish by court decision the legal right of a physician to prescribe contraceptive measures and to transmit or receive contraceptive materials. But the change stems also from the evil years through which the country has just passed. Out of the lower depths of the depression arose a demand from sources that could not be ignored—public-health authorities, social workers, relief officials—that simple, safe, cheap methods of birth control be made available especially for the benefit of those on relief and the unemployed generally, and to all whose economic security was threatened. In some cities contraceptive advice was actually provided by the authorities. Even the Catholic church, sensitive to the pressures of the times, promoted the "safe period" theory and, by so doing, not only yielded an important doctrinal point but encouraged some fruitful research into the actual uses and limitations of the sterile segment of the menstrual cycle.

A third reason for the emergence of the movement from its period of civil war and revolution is the steady work through thirteen years of the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau—a record of persistent experimentation coupled with service to more than 56,000 patients. This work has gone on almost literally under fire. The material amassed will form an invaluable basis for the scientific and social work that remains to be done. For this, credit must go first to Margaret Sanger, whose valiant and stubborn fight made the whole development possible, and second to Dr. Hannah M. Stone, who has headed the bureau and directed its work. Now it is in a position to call and conduct such meetings as that just concluded in New York, the Conference on Contraceptive Research and Clinical Practice, at which reports were made by a group of some 200 leading biologists and physicians working in this field. Next week we plan to print an article by Dr. Stone analyzing the chief scientific achievements of the year. Meanwhile we note with satisfaction the emergence of the movement into the bright light of scientific acceptance and friendly publicity.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, January 4

JUST as Congress is about to make its opening bid for the center of the national stage, the Committee for Industrial Organization has preempted that spot, and as a result the major question in Washington suddenly has ceased to be: What legislation will the Congressional mills grind out in the next few months? Instead, it is: What will the government—and Roosevelt, in particular—do about the strike that under C. I. O. leadership is rapidly spreading paralysis throughout the automobile industry and threatening to bring the whole structure of industrial recovery tumbling down?

It is too early to formulate an answer to that question. At the moment Washington knows very little about the situation beyond the fact that this promises to be the toughest and most crucial labor dispute any President has had to face, and that if the struggle is not quickly terminated, its militancy may infect the Congress and drastically reshape the legislative program. We know that the shutting down of the automobile plants will cripple whole sectors of American industry supplying and transporting raw materials and semi-manufactured and finished parts to the motor makers. We know, too, that if the strike itself does not spread through those same sectors of industry, including the nation's steel mills, its eventual solution will form a pattern that quickly will be forced on labor relations in all those sectors.

We think we know, in addition, that the automobile magnates will fight to the last ditch against unionization, that they will bring to that fight a vicious resourcefulness fully equal to that which their feudal progenitors in steel have always displayed, and that, if their wiles fail them, they will not be above taking refuge in the Supreme Court's bosom and from that vantage point defying Roosevelt, Lewis, and the public through the people's representatives in Congress assembled. But we cannot be sure of this until we know whether Henry Ford will fight shoulder to shoulder with his rivals. It is barely possible that the two groups, distrusting each other, will angle for preferential position in the labor struggle and thus play into the C. I. O.'s hands. Reports have been received here from Detroit to the effect that it was Ford himself who forced the Kelsey-Hayes Wheel Company to capitulate to the union week before last.

Ford's position in the fight is only one of its vital uncertainties. It is already apparent that the strike has been beautifully timed even to the inauguration of Michigan's new Governor, Frank Murphy, who is counted on to see that the state police forces do not become shock troops for the manufacturers and that the judiciary conducts itself with a minimum of indecency. It also is apparent that the strategy chosen—the attack through key manufacturers of parts—makes for maximum economy in effort. But we do not know how far the barons of the A. F. of L. can or will go in desperate self-defense to sabotage the C. I. O. by lending aid to the manufacturers, just as we do not at this time know the answer to that much more vital question: How long can John L. Lewis and his chiefs of staff hold in line the green recruits to unionism who are their followers in this automobile strike? It must be granted that because of their semi-monopolistic position and financial resources, the motor magnates can withstand even a completely effective strike for many weeks.

We may expect that when, as, and if a stalemate is reached, Roosevelt will intervene with a compromise proposal that will be weighted in favor of whichever side seems at that moment to be the stronger. In 1934, faced with a strike threat in the same industry, he imposed upon labor a peace formula so heavily weighted in the manufacturers' favor that the International Harvester Company later adopted it in place of its old time-tested company-union plan, as the NLRB recently found in a decision that indirectly denounced Roosevelt's formula as a fraud upon the workers. But in 1934 the automobile strike was merely a threat and not an accomplished fact, and instead of Lewis the Bold, Roosevelt had Green the Pusillanimous to deal with. Roosevelt this time will have to find a better formula.

There are, of course, dozens at hand, or will be when the New Deal's lawyers finish digging them up for him, for contrary to popular impression the history of federal intervention in labor disputes is a long and rich one. The lawyers need search no farther than Edward Berman's "Labor Disputes and the President" (Columbia University Press, 1924), or they may turn to the record of the NLRB vs. Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation (Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, No. 8088, 1936) for an exhaustive review of precedents in federal intervention. The NLRB, which prepared the review, prefaces it with this summary of three sentences, the final one of which has ominous significance in the present situation: "Governmental intervention of some kind has been the rule in major labor disputes for more than half a century. Some of it has been without precedent or legislative authorization, much of it without preliminary planning or research. It has been most effective in those cases in which the government acted prior to the outbreak of the strike to remove its causes."

Not the least valuable aspect of the NLRB's review is that it forces recognition that court injunctions in strikes are also a form of intervention. There is strong likelihood that courts in the motor-strike areas will so splatter the scene with restraining orders as to make it almost impossible for the Administration to extract a peace formula from the resulting muddle and bitterness. The federal government itself has sought ten—and obtained eight—anti-labor writs under the Sherman Act, and more than 500 injunctions have been issued by the federal courts in labor disputes.

Executive intervention has divided itself into three categories. In the first of these is indirect intervention, which includes the investigation of strike issues under the direction of the White House or some federal department, the writing of letters to either or both sides urging settlement, conferences with the employers and union leaders, personal mediation or conciliation by the President, and, finally, the making of definite proposals for settlement or legislation. A classic example is Wilson's handling of the situation in 1912, when negotiations between the railroads and the conductors and trainmen broke down and the unions voted to strike. President Wilson called the disputants together to propose arbitration, found the railroads unwilling to accept the machinery of the Erdman Act of 1898, arranged a conference of the disputants and Congressional leaders, and evolved and pressed to enactment the Newlands Act, which provided the requisite arbitration machinery. In 1916, when another railroad strike threatened, Wilson, after the dispute had narrowed down to the issue of a basic eight-hour day, personally appeared before Congress and obtained enactment of the Adamson Act, which established an eight-hour day for rail workers.

The second category of executive intervention is a midway step between friendly indirect intervention and coercion. It consists of the use of publicity such as the publication of the results of the President's mediation efforts and the findings of his investigators—all with the purpose of hastening settlement of the strike. The third category, which takes in the coercive forms of executive intervention, has several subdivisions. One of these is the securing of legislation granting to the strikers at least some of the working conditions which their employers had refused them and for which they had struck. A more common stratagem in the field of coercive intervention is the threat of a federal investigation of the industry or one of its key members, with particular reference to prices and profits; it is aimed at obtaining concessions from the employers to avoid the threatened probe. Another form of executive intervention is the obtaining of injunctions to avert or end strikes, a practice first resorted to in the Pullman strike of 1894, when Cleveland obligingly appointed as special United States Attorney a management man, who in turn obtained the necessary injunctions and some 5,000 federal marshals to enforce them. Executive resort to the injunction device was had again in the railway shopmen's strikes of 1919 and 1922 and in the bituminous coal strike of 1919.

The use of federal troops is another coercive form of executive intervention. Cleveland called them out in the Pullman strike in 1894, Roosevelt sent them into Arizona and Colorado in 1903-4, Wilson sent them to Colorado in 1914, to Gary in 1919, and in the same year to West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Washington. Harding sent them to West Virginia in 1921. The wholesale use of federal marshals in lieu of troops has already been noted in the case of the Pullman strike.

Every President from Cleveland's time to date has been confronted with major labor disputes, and few of them have been satisfied with the weapons they had at hand. Even Coolidge complained of this when, in connection with the 1925 anthracite strike, he told Congress that "authority should be lodged with the President and the Departments of Commerce and Labor, giving them power to deal with an emergency. They should be able to appoint temporary boards with authority to call for witnesses and documents, conciliate differences, encourage arbitration, and, in case of threatened scarcity, exercise control over distribution."

Spain's "Red" Foreign Legion

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Alicante, December 7

THROUGHOUT the centuries men have left their homes to fight on foreign soil for liberty. Byron, Lafayette, Kosciusko, and, in more recent times, John Reed—the list is long and illustrious.

Spanish democracy has been attacked. It has issued no call for foreign friends, but Europe's anti-fascists have volunteered in thousands to serve in the army of the Spanish republic. Approximately 60 per cent are French and Belgians, factory workers for the most part. There are also Poles, Germans, Czechs, Swiss, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Italians, Serbs, several score white Russian émigrés who thus want to document a change of mind, a Mexican artillery officer, a New York Jew, an Egyptian, some Algerian Arabs, two Turkish officers; and recently Britishers have commenced to arrive. Enlistment of women is discouraged, yet they slip into groups and are content to lend a hand wherever it is needed, either in ministering to the wounded or in peeling potatoes.

Usually governments have set no difficulties in the path of these volunteers. Foreign offices may adopt any attitude toward the Spanish conflict, but free nations do not obstruct the expression of the individual citizen's idealism. Not a few of these soldiers of freedom, however, have had to steal across the frontiers of dictatorships and walk many miles, footsore and penniless, always evading the eyes of the police, before they reached hospitable soil.

Linguistically the International Column of the Spanish loyalist army is a Babel. Yet no greater unanimity of sentiment ever animated a modern fighting force. General Franco is a symbol of feudal backwardness, the tool of the interests which have kept the Spanish millions in cruel poverty. Nevertheless, the volunteers, when they march to the Madrid trenches, think less of Franco and Spain than of Hitler and Mussolini, and of the little Hitlers and Mussolinis of Europe. The members of the international brigades in Spain are not newcomers in the battle with fascism. As Socialists, Communists, pacifists, radicals, and liberals they have contended against fascism at home. "We are merely transferring our activities," a prominent intellectual in the brigade said to me, "to the most threatened sector of the world anti-fascist front, for if this sector crumbles the other sectors will be less secure."

The German, Yugoslav, Hungarian, Italian, and Polish émigrés, deprived of the possibility of attacking their national regimes directly, do so in Spain. The French feel that they strike a blow for their own Front Populaire. August Wach, a dealer in electrical appliances, left Germany in 1933, opened a store in an Alsatian town, and prospered. In October he closed his shop and put up a sign: "Gone for an indefinite stay in Spain." Since then eight men in the same city have followed his example. A young German named Kroge, finding it trying to continue the underground struggle against Hitler in Bremen, went to Montevideo. He returned to Europe as soon as the Spanish civil war began and enlisted in the International Brigade. "To me," a French Socialist declared when I interviewed him behind his machine-gun on the Madrid front, "this is chiefly target practice for Colonel de la Rocque's aristocrats."

To facilitate instruction and command, the foreigners are divided into units according to national origin. Thus there exists a Franco-Belgian battalion, an Italian battalion, a Balkan company, and so on. But in the barracks the men mix to share their experiences, military and civil. I went out to Madrigeras, a village near Albacete, where the Italians were billeted. A sham battle was scheduled for the storming of a castle. In a conversation between Captain Galliani, late of New York, who led one of the attacking parties, and Lukac, a Hungarian author, now commander of the second brigade at the front, it developed that they had fought against each other in the World War, Galliani in the Italian army, Lukac in that of the Dual Monarchy. Ludwig Renn, the German writer, recently released from a Nazi prison, was with us. He chatted with Major Vidal, commander of the base at Albacete. They had faced each other across no man's land at the Somme. Men once poised to kill one another are now bound together by a live community of interest.

Not all the men are World War veterans. Many received their military training as conscripts in various European armies. Experience in sports for some and the self-discipline of others make up for their lack of soldiering. All of them have fought bravely in Spain. In a month they won a reputation which thrills the Spanish republican army and causes the enemy to pause—this though their number is surprisingly small.

The figures have been exaggerated out of ignorance but also in malice. The first International Brigade reached the front in the early days of November with a full complement of 1,900 men. The second brigade got to the front on November 14. Its strength then was 1,550. To date these are the only foreign units which have borne arms in the cause of Spanish democracy—3,450 soldiers. Yet they have appreciably influenced the military situation.

The Spaniards are brave and temperamental but not martial. The last time Spain engaged in war was against Napoleon, over a hundred years ago. Ninety per cent of the regular Spanish army remained with Franco and Mola when they raised the standard of revolt. Great masses immediately entered the ranks of the government militia. But they were green, untutored, unofficered, unaccustomed to the whistle of bullets or the sight of an advancing foe.

The republic's "Foreign Legion," seeking unselfish political gains rather than loot, was originally conceived as a shock corps. On November 6, however, the rebels stood at the gates of Madrid; the militia had retreated headlong before the onslaughts of the Moors, who were rescuing Christian Spain from the will of its workers, peasants, and intellectuals. The idea of the great smashing offensive was therefore abandoned, and the International Column was thrown into the breach to save Madrid. It saved Madrid. Not alone, of course. With their backs to the walls of the capital, the government troops, aided now by newly arrived airplanes and inspired by the contagious example of the foreigners, likewise fought better. Franco encountered unexpected resistance. Since then the two international brigades have created a legend. They never retreat. They are not afraid to die—and that is a soldier's highest asset. Given an objective, they take it. The Moors were intrenched in a building of University City. They had machine-guns and hand grenades. The Hungarians were ordered to storm the building. They had only rifles and bayonets. They stormed it and captured it. They suffered 200 casualties out of a total strength of 300. A heavy loss, but the victory electrified thousands of men.

On other occasions the experienced internationalists stood firm when whole brigades melted away before the well-directed fire of the Moors. The Spaniards then realized that more might be killed in flight than in resistance. Formerly, when the Moors came on the scene, fright had seized the militia. Now the militia began to see Moorish heels high in the air. Moroccan daggers were shown in Madrid, trophies of successful skirmishes with the once-dreaded North Africans.

Spanish units lying next to the foreigners started to display finer fighting qualities. This spread down the line. Brigades competed for positions at the front. Could they not be on the left flank of the International Column? Might they not occupy the second-line trenches behind Kleber's brigade? Meanwhile the foreigners remained in the thick of battle. They refused to leave the trenches until absolutely certain that their sectors would be held. They were lousy; they had not bathed for fifteen days. At night, wrapped in one woolen blanket apiece contributed by French trade unions, they slept on ground covered with hoar frost. But of their own free will they stayed.

I was present in a cold staff dining-room when the arrangements were made for the relief of the first International Brigade by Colonel Gallo's excellent Spanish brigade. Commander Hans and Chief of Staff Ludwig Renn discussed all the details of the change. The enemy must not know that a new force was lying opposite. How achieve this? The Moors sometimes fired at night. Loyal Spanish troops always replied. The foreigners never did. Their nerves permitted them to refrain until and if their antagonists advanced. Gallo undertook to give strict orders against useless waste of ammunition to keep up courage. Everything was settled.

That evening I sat by General Kleber's fireside. Colonel Gallo entered. He was taking over from Hans, he reported, and all was proceeding well. But could not the internationalists be held at a convenient distance behind his trenches to be on hand in case of trouble?

When I visited the second International Brigade, it was in the second-line trenches on the northern Madrid front. The Spaniards felt secure in the first line with the foreigners just in the rear.

The Spanish army units take pride in cooperating with the International Corps. Immediately after they went into action on the Madrid front, the foreigners bore the brunt of many a hot battle, and their losses in the first fortnight were enormous. The first brigade went forward with 1,900 men early in November and counted 1,000 effectives a month later. The second brigade had 750 killed and wounded in three weeks of fighting. Today the rate of casualties is much lower. But the two brigades had to be reinforced. In the beginning new foreign soldiers were sent up from the base. But this interfered to some extent with the formation of a third international brigade. Moreover, it was held desirable from all points of view—military, political, and moral—to mix Spaniards with foreigners. The authorities accordingly ruled that the international units were to be reconstituted so as to consist of three foreign and two Spanish battalions. Rivalry immediately arose among the Spaniards. They all wanted to join the International Column. In the end two battalions of brave and hardened Asturias miners were chosen for the first International Brigade. The selection for the second brigade has yet to be made.

Behind the lines, far away in the eastern provinces, approximately 3,200 more foreigners are being trained, organized, and equipped for the struggle. Reports of 60,000 foreigners in the service of the Spanish government are therefore fantastic. Spanish republicans regret that the figures of Ambassador Ribbentrop and the Berlin Börsen Zeitung are untrue, and they will take measures, undoubtedly, to augment the size of the International

Column. For the moment, however, these 3,200 in the hinterland plus the 1,800 survivors of the first two brigades represent the entire strength of the International column in Spain. The government expects to add some 2,000 good Spanish soldiers to the 3,200 foreigners not yet engaged in the Madrid battle—a reserve for a future offensive. Meanwhile, contingents continue to arrive from various foreign lands.

The relations between the foreigners and the Spaniards, needless to say, are most cordial. The women of Albacete have volunteered to wash the laundry of the men of the column stationed in that town. The Spanish Ministry of Education has given the column a college building near the coast for use as a 400-bed hospital for its wounded. The same ministry donated a thousand bottles of cognac for the men in the cold trenches, and writing material, foreign books, radios, and gramophones for the men in barracks. Villages near Valencia supply the column with oranges, pomegranates, rice, lentils, onions, and other vegetables—free of charge. Martinez Barrio, president of the Cortes and civil governor of Albacete, is always ready to listen to the needs of the brigades and to assist in meeting them. Prime Minister Largo Caballero told me that when he received arms—they are still very scarce in republican Spain—his first thought would be of the International Column. The railway workers of Albacete built a huge armored car on their own initiative, fitted it with a machine-gun, and presented it to the third brigade at a public ceremony marked by wildly enthusiastic scenes.

I was sitting in the headquarters of one of the brigades at the front when a delegation from the shoemakers' union entered with a beautiful pair of boots and tremendous rolls of leather. They had instructions, they said, to make made-to-measure boots for the commander and anybody else designated. This, one of the delegates declared, was merely a token of their fraternal sentiments toward the foreigners.

I saw the second brigade go off to Madrid. Old Spanish men and women moved for an hour among the soldiers shaking hands individually with hundreds of them and saying "Salud" and "Victory." Meanwhile young boys would attract the notice of the foreigners by exclaiming "Eh, Franco," and then drawing a horizontal finger across their throats. As the train pulled out of the station, the soldiers stood at the windows with clenched fists raised, the Spaniards stood at attention with clenched fists raised, and all sang the International in a dozen languages. Women wept. Between the Spanish united front and the European united front as represented by the brigades there exists a powerful bond of friendship and common purpose. If the Spanish revolution wins, the left movements of the world will of course feel the stimulating influence. But even the process of helping Spanish democracy must have an encouraging and inspiring effect on parties depressed by the recent apparently irresistible encroachments of fascism. The International Column is therefore regarded by its sponsors as at least as necessary and beneficial to the outside proletariat as it is to the Spanish republic.

Farm Tenancy: A Program

BY LAWRENCE WESTBROOK

THIS is the age of the laboratory method, by which experiments are tested and principles are formulated before large-scale operations are launched. One of the most important large-scale operations for the social future of the United States will begin when legislation is passed to cope with the problem of farm tenancy. In this field the experimenting has already been done, and done well. The underlying causes of the farm-tenancy problem are known. The principles of a solution are also known, having been developed in experimental laboratories. But there is grave doubt whether these realistic conceptions will eventually prevail. There is danger that the new legislation will ignore the exploratory work already done and turn over the administration of the act to some agency or government department not equipped to carry on the manifold activities involved in it.

Laboratories for the study of the problem were operated first under the Rural Rehabilitation Division of the FERA and then under the Resettlement Administration. The specific experiments bearing most directly on it are the rural communities at Dyess (Arkansas), Pine Mountain Valley (Georgia), and Cherry Lake (Florida). These were originally established by the writer under the direction of Harry L. Hopkins as part of the general program of rural rehabilitation. When the Resettlement Administration took over the rural-rehabilitation activities of the FERA, these three communities were given complete autonomy, and they have since functioned as independent rural foundations devoting their resources to the development of patterns of living for the share-croppers and farm workers without capital, who would otherwise be indefinitely on relief. They have been testing and proving grounds for the principles to be applied to a large-scale program. In all of them the findings are the same: tenancy is not a cause but an effect, and the evils associated with tenancy are not to be eradicated except by dealing with causes.

Men fail in the South not because they do not own land but because they are not competent farmers. They are incompetent because they are not physically well—a fact which presents immediate problems of hygiene and medical care. They are incompetent because they are ignorant, because they do not know how to farm or how to dispose of farm products—a fact which presents immediate problems in education, training, and organization. They are incompetent for other reasons, which I shall enumerate presently. To try to solve the problem without providing the necessary physical health, knowledge, and organization would not only accomplish nothing but might make a solution impossible.

The new legislation must not be so framed as to apply only to those relatively few persons who are already fitted for profitable ownership, but must cope with the problem of training and upbuilding the vast majority for whom it is intended. It must do much more than provide facilities for the easy purchase of land by needy individuals on credit at low interest. Its aim, in short, must not be solely the abolition of tenancy. You cannot change an unsuccessful tenant into a successful farmer by a mere change of his title to the land he works. Farm tenancy is not so much undesirable in itself as an effect of undesirable conditions. Under some circumstances it can be regarded as a desirable system. In France, Denmark, Sweden, and in our laboratory communities in America it may benefit the tenant. Some form of tenancy in this country will certainly be needed for the vast number of land workers who cannot qualify for land ownership or who do not want it.

Although the fundamental principles of a solution have become clear, legislation will not be effective unless the administration of the act is vested in a body capable of establishing and maintaining these principles. Legislation should be drafted with the lessons of the laboratory in mind, and since it will deal with the future of a group of citizens, these citizens, in so far as they have any articulate organization, should be consulted. The Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, given only a small part in the preliminary consultation, cannot in reason or justice be continuously ignored. After all, the legislation is supposed to be in behalf of those whom this organization represents. At a recent meeting of the committee of forty formed to suggest a program, the one and only tenant representative, W. L. Blackstone, who really is a farm tenant and a member of the union, somewhat apologetically expressed disappointment that actual conditions among share-croppers did not receive more consideration. To the amazement of those who have contended that all the share-croppers and farm laborers want is a hand-out from government, he said, "You could give forty acres and a mule and supplies to a lot of farm tenants tomorrow, and they would not have any of it at the end of a year."

No single government agency can cure the evils of tenancy. There is required the concerted effort of the many agencies already in existence, with their well-trained personnels. In farm supervision, farm credit, rural sanitation, hygiene, diet, education, recreation, and work relief, these agencies have developed services which can be made available at no very great additional expense. They need only be coordinated and directed.

The most important reason, I should say, why share-croppers and farm laborers cannot at once become successful farmers is to be found in their lack of training in farm management. They have always had their work laid out for them, with someone to tell them what to do and when to do it. They have been one-crop specialists, almost as limited in their activities as industrial workers in a modern automobile factory. They know little or nothing of the gardening, poultry-raising, and dairying essential for self-sufficing farming. If they are to become independent farmers, they must receive expert supervision and guidance, which can best be supplied by the Department of Agriculture.

A second reason why share-croppers and destitute farm workers cannot operate successfully at once is their generally bad physical condition. In the South they have lived for generations in mosquito-infested and unsanitary surroundings, on an improper diet, and with totally inadequate medical care. A large proportion of them are afflicted with insidious, energy-sapping diseases. The prevalence of malaria, pellagra, hernia, bad teeth, and diseased tonsils is without question a major cause of the shiftlessness and indolence with which these people are so often reproached. At the clinic established by the government at the Dyess colony in Arkansas it was discovered that practically every family examined for admission to the colony had one or more of these afflictions. After a few months' treatment the Dyess settlers were so improved in appearance and morale that they did not seem to be the same people. Their capacity and desire for work were noticeably increased. Their children, when sent to nearby public schools and placed in classes with children from local non-colony families, led their classes. It would be hard to find more convincing evidence both of the fundamentally worth-while stock of these people and of the deterrent effects of poor health. The malaria mosquito can be eradicated as effectively and perhaps as cheaply as the tick which causes Texas fever among cattle. The government has spent millions in successfully fighting the cattle tick. An attack on the malaria mosquito would now be a good investment. The broad experience and trained personnel of the Public Health Service should be utilized in the application of remedial measures to all of these prevalent diseases.

A third requisite for successful farming, with or without tenancy, is adequate credit. Tenants and share-croppers, particularly in the South, can obtain credit for production and credit for consumption only at rates so high as to make successful farming impossible. By being forced to trade at commissaries and by similar subterfuges share-croppers are usually made to pay exorbitant interest rates. The Farm Credit Administration is fully equipped to meet this problem and should be utilized.

The small farmer must necessarily produce, purchase, and sell in small quantities. This is a fourth obstacle to his success. He is permanently at a disadvantage which can only be overcome by the introduction of cooperatively owned marketing and storage facilities. The Department of Agriculture and the Farm Credit Administration have both had long experience in the establishment and development of cooperative marketing organizations. This experience should be drawn upon.

Small farmers are not able to benefit from mechanized equipment. They could substantially increase production by the use of modern machinery, which they cannot afford to buy but which might be made available through cooperative ownership or be rented from state corporations. Farm-to-market roads constitute one of the most pressing needs of our rural economy. They can be obtained through the cooperation of the WPA in localities where rural development is undertaken. Schools, hospitals, and recreational facilities are also badly needed in many localities, and can be obtained through the WPA.

Inadequate and unsanitary housing is a major handicap. Living quarters available for farm workers in the South are far worse than in the worst slums of the cities. It is practically impossible to maintain good health, to say nothing of decent living standards and self-respect, in the ramshackle hovels used as homes by the share-croppers and farm laborers who make our cotton crop. A sound program of rural development must include extensive modernization and new building, using any feasible pre-fabrication techniques which have been developed and engaging the cooperation of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Speculation in land values due to changes in commodity price levels has been a spectacular cause of the loss of farms in the past, and will be again if adequate restrictions against mortgaging and resale are not incorporated in the new legislation. It is certain that a program of rural development must contain provisions for such restrictions.

Since the causes of the evils associated with farm tenancy are many and since there are many existing government agencies fitted to help eradicate these evils, the problem should not be handled by any agency of government acting alone. In the laboratory communities which have already been referred to, it has been found that the various existing agencies can function most effectively when they are under the direction of a separate coordinating and directing organization. Virtually all that is needed to get the entire problem in hand is a federal policy-making and refinancing body, with separate operating bodies in each state. These might well be in the form of self-liquidating, non-profit state corporations.

The federal agency might well be a federal corporation charged with complete and unified responsibility for all land acquisition and disposition and for the formulation of rural-development policies. Purchases of land could be made with long-term bonds of the corporation, bearing guaranteed interest. Disposition of land could be made to the branch of government best fitted to use the land. Areas suitable for reforestation would go to the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture. Areas suitable for parks, grazing, game preserves, and the like would go to the Department of the Interior. Land which is really suitable for farming would be sold to the state corporations.

The state corporations would be the real operating units of the program. Suitable state corporations are already in existence and have already been adapted to this type of work. In 1934-35 they were set up in each state by Mr. Hopkins under the name of Rural Rehabilitation

Corporations, and were, in fact, private, non-profit, self-liquidating bodies. Their stock would be held in continuous trust by the directors of the federal corporation in order to insure effective execution of the policies determined by the latter. Their function would be to direct and coordinate the specialized services of existing government agencies and to supplement these activities with new services only when so directed by the federal corporation. To insure complete and understanding cooperation the Board of Directors of the federal corporation could consist of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Surgeon General, the governor of the Farm Credit Administration, the administrator of the Works Progress Administration, and probably also the Secretary of Commerce. Many of the directors of the state corporations might well be the local administrative officers of these same federal departments.

If we conceive of this program as being designed to cure the evils commonly associated with farm tenancy, the policy to be followed by the directors of the federal corporation becomes clear. It should be to set up a system of tenancy designed to benefit the tenant. Under that system tenants fitted to succeed as owners should be enabled in due time to become owners. Others who might succeed better as tenants should be eligible to receive the same benefits as landowners but under continued supervision. The purpose should be to develop each group under conditions enabling its members to rise as far as they can. The state corporations should, in effect, take the place of existing landowners, but in addition they should provide those necessary facilities and opportunities which have been outlined here and which are, of course, beyond the capacity and the province of private enterprise.

Blum and the Communists

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, December 11

AS IT has turned out, the abstention of the seventy-two Communists on December 5 from approving the foreign policy of the Front Populaire government did not, after all, produce a ministerial crisis in France. All the rumors and alarums to the contrary notwithstanding, I make bold to assert that Thorez and his followers would have voted with the majority and would have found a way of justifying their course to the masses afterward if they had not known in advance (a) that a sufficient number of deputies in the center and right center would more than make up the deficiency, and (b) that despite Blum's warnings the Cabinet would not resign. The Communist leaders have accustomed the rank and file these past two years to the almost limitless elasticity of their line. They have taught them to swallow without gagging the unity of action with their "brother" Socialists, whom till 1934 they attacked as the best reliance of the bourgeoisie, the united front with their Radical "friends," whom they had helped to drive out of office a few months earlier, and almost if not quite the "French front" of all anti-Germans, which is but another name for the anathematized national union. They have not been afraid to preach to them moderation in economics, patriotism in home politics, and a healthy militarism in foreign relations. They have had no difficulty in explaining their reversal on the war budget, on strikes, on the middle classes, on the conscientious objectors, and quite recently on devaluation; and they would have been at no loss to justify an about-face on Spain in the interest of world peace—as did the Socialists—or domestic solidarity, or revolutionary discipline, or what you will. But what would have taken tough explaining—at the present moment anyhow—and what they only too well knew would strain the workers'—let alone the middle classes'—good-will would have been their upsetting the Front Populaire government, their disruption of the Front Populaire itself, and the mighty chaos both in France and in the outside world which such a step would have provoked.

The rumors and alarums were as varied as they were fantastic. The solitary grain of truth in the heap was that the Cachin-Thorez team was after the Blum-Delbos scalp. Why? For a score of reasons, among which the Blum-Delbos Spanish policy held a conspicuous place and the essence of which can be summed up in the government's thesis that a general war may yet by wise diplomacy be averted and that therefore the time is still unripe for transforming the Franco-Soviet pact into an offensive and defensive military alliance. True it is, also, that the Communists are impatient to see the Front Populaire swell into something broad enough to neutralize the Socialists' predominance. But wanting a thing is not synonymous with getting it, or even with seriously going after it. Blum out, the question would be with whom to replace him. The last thing the Communists have in view, whatever the red-baiters may say, is to take the succession themselves, or even to take part in any conceivable combination that might do so. Thorez, to be sure, at a meeting at Vichy launched a trial balloon by declaring that "the life of the Front Populaire hung upon no particular ministry"; but the storm that that statement stirred up was so violent that the Humanité deemed it prudent to omit the sentence from its report of the speech, and the Populaire roundly served notice that the only leader having the confidence of the Socialist Party was Léon Blum. Moreover, both Chautemps and the Premier had warned their allies on the extreme left weeks ago—when the first signs of the new Communist tactics manifested themselves—that there was no "loose-part ministry" lying about, so that the disintegration of the present majority would be the signal for dissolution of parliament and new elections. No one knows better than Thorez and his friends that they have little to hope for from a free-for-all electoral battle at this time. And a few days before the Chamber debate on foreign policy Blum took care, at a meeting at which both Cachin and Thorez were present, to announce that he had not changed his mind: "No government, he said, is more difficult to defeat from the outside, and none is easier to disrupt from within. For let but one of the constituent parties withdraw and the Front Populaire will cease to exist."

The Communists thus knew what to expect. But even if a ministère de rechange was to succeed the Blum Cabinet, where was the nucleus round which a majority could be assembled and which would be acceptable at once to the Communists, to the workers who follow them, and to the country? Two or three months ago Daladier seemed a possible candidate. Quite aside from the extreme unlikelihood that the Minister of War, if he became Premier, would "lift the blockade" against the Spanish republic—which is ostensibly what has sent the Communists on the warpath against Blum—his stock has lately fallen to zero or below on a much graver issue. As a matter of fact, it is well known that with the exception of Pierre Cot all the Radical-Socialist ministers favored the so-called non-intervention pact, while the Socialists with Blum at their head subscribed to it with the greatest reluctance. What has definitely and hopelessly eliminated Daladier is that in a recent speech he alluded to the Soviet Union—without naming it—as "a barbarous Asiatic country."

It was the avalanche of "loose-part" ministries that ruined the Socialist-Radical cartels of 1924 and 1932. The Communists surely have not forgotten that. They know as well as anyone, too, that were the present bloc to crack up, the slide toward counter-revolution would become irresistible. They are much too astute to imagine that the process would this time terminate with the immediate successors of the Blum Cabinet, whoever they might be.

CHIANG KAI-BLUM VERSUS CHANG HSUEH-THOREZ
Playing the Game of Who Is More Chinese?

The resignation of Herriot over the war debts in December, 1932, was the prelude to the five-act tragi-comedy of which the climax was the hounding of Daladier out of office by the mob for nothing at all, and the sequel the advent of Doumergue, the heaven-sent would-be Brüning of France. The chief difference between the cartels and the Front Populaire is that the latter has laid up a store of hatred and bitterness among its enemies so hot and furious that, were it to be tripped up, it would take rather less than five acts to touch off the inevitable catastrophe. Goaded to madness by the succession of strikes and plant occupations, social legislation and press laws, nationalization and devaluation and tampering with business generally, the motley crew of the opposition would give a dukedom, now that the Senate and the right Radicals in the Chamber have let them down, if the Communists would start something. I do not think Thorez and Cachin are disposed to oblige them. I have reason to believe they are under no illusion about what political party and what social class would be the first to be crushed by the avalanche were they mad enough to loose it again, or about the direction which the change of policy toward republican Spain and Soviet Russia would take. And that is one of the many reasons why I do not hesitate to say that Duclos's somewhat truculent speech in the Chamber and his seventy-one colleagues' folded arms during the voting were meant to be nothing more than a broad reminder to Blum-Delbos that communism in France was a force to be reckoned with.

At the bottom of it all is, of course, the open secret of the strains and frictions within the Marxist family. But that is an old story—a very old story which unhappily has not improved with either age or cohabitation. The Communists, after quarreling with the Socialists over their gradualness, embourgeoisement, and cooperation with the middle classes, now reproach them with inflexibility, un-

CARMEN
Thorezador, prends gaaaaarde
Thorezador
Thorezador

Drawings from Le Petit Bleu, Paris

realism, "leftism," and pacifism. It was the Communists who, in the Front Populaire program committee last year, stood with the Radicals against the Socialists in opposition to the nationalization of monopolies. It was they, again, who with the Radicals would have nothing to do with the Socialist proposal to exact a pledge from all candidates standing for election on the Front Populaire ticket. And it was only after an incipient revolt among their followers and a menacing growth of "Trotskyism" among the Communist workers that Cachin and Thorez yielded to the pressure of the Socialists last September and abandoned the phrase—though not the agitation for—"the French front."

But what the Communists hold chiefly against Blum and his comrades is their pacifism. It is interesting to note in this connection that a violent quarrel between the Communists and the Intellectuals' Anti-Fascist Committee, a non-political group having members in all left parties, arose after the committee had issued a pamphlet entitled "War Is Not Inevitable." The Communists are persuaded—they are not the only ones—that war with Germany is bound to come, that therefore "conversations" with Hitler are a snare, that the everlasting concessions to the fascist powers' threats and blackmail can only weaken France and endanger the peace of the world, and that the only safety consists in meeting bluster with bluster and force with force. That, in few words, is the Communists' casus belli with the Blum-Delbos foreign policy as a whole and its application in Spain specifically. They maintain—rightly, in my opinion—that if France had stood on international law and kept up normal trade relations with the Spanish republic, not only would the insurrection have been repressed months ago but Germany and Italy would have backed down; and they point out, quite justly, that when the Soviet Union in October called the fascist bluff, nothing very grave resulted and the war did not pass the confines of the Spanish peninsula. This Communist position, it is well to note, is shared by a preponderant section of French left opinion—by the Trade Union Confederation, by the anti-fascist Women's Committee, by the League of the Rights of Man, and by a large wing of Blum's own party. But there is an important difference. Whereas the Communists openly and violently attack the government, the others support Blum on the theory that the government alone is in a position to judge of the international ramifications of the problem. The Communists are aware—as I am, on the best authority, in a position to affirm—that France is unofficially helping Spain nearly, perhaps quite, as much as is the U. S. S. R. Nevertheless, they go on yelling their slogans of "Blum à l'action" and "Airplanes for Spain."

The left Socialists and the others, moreover, though they view the government's inaction in Spain with the keenest apprehension, hold that the rapprochement with England more than compensates for its inconveniences and dangers. But it is precisely this cooperation with Britain that the Communists most mistrust; not that they fail to appreciate the value of an eventual reconstitution of the old Triple Entente—they would welcome an alliance with the very devil against Hitler—but that they have not the least confidence in the present British rulers or their aims and motives. They fear, not without reason, that the newly patched-up Franco-British understanding is less a solid alliance between equals for mutual defense than a paralyzing embrace designed to neutralize French independence (witness the non-intervention pact); that it is an accord de passivité, and that a too influential section of the London government is irrevocably wedded to the famous Occidental pact, with all the dangers which that scheme implies for the safety of France, the peace of the world, and the Soviet Union; that, in short,—and I am not prepared to say they are wrong—it is British chicanery that has prevented the Franco-Soviet pact from being followed to its logical conclusion.

The flurry of December 5 in the Palais Bourbon has blown over. Neither side has come out of the affair with added credit. To be sure, the announced storm has been averted; but I have a suspicion that the Front Populaire has been shaken to its roots. After mutual warnings and recriminations, Socialists and Communists sat down in their newly revamped Entente (ex-Coordination) Committee to assess the damage. They have declared the incident closed, and Vaillant-Couturier in Humanité informs us that the "Front Populaire is in the best of health." Perhaps it is. But the rumpus has bared to the public view a family skeleton which the well-informed suspected to exist and which is likely to disturb the public life of France again and again.

Senator Norris's Legislature

BY ROSCOE FLEMING

Lincoln, Nebraska, December 29

SENATOR George William Norris, Nebraska's grand old man, will be present in the modernistic mahogany-paneled chamber of the state capitol on January 5 when the nation's first unicameral state legislature opens—and one of the major government reforms long advocated by Senator Norris is realized in his home state. Forty-three men who have already been elected on a non-partisan basis, will be sworn into office. They will take the place of 133 men—100 in the House and 33 in the Senate—who two years ago functioned as Democrats and Republicans in Nebraska's last bicameral legislature. Nebraska awaits the results of this departure with mingled hope and fear. The constitutional amendment sponsored by Senator Norris was fought bitterly by all except two of the larger newspapers. Virtually all the leading politicians of both parties opposed it, and hostility in these quarters has not lessened.

The members of the legislature, elected by district, were both nominated and elected without party designation—a provision for which Senator Norris stood firm despite fears that it would defeat the constitutional amendment. Thirty-two of the forty-three members have had previous legislative experience, some of them being veterans of many years. There are ten lawyers—a higher proportion than in the bicameral legislature. One member is former Congressman John H. Norton, of Polk, Nebraska, who was working for the inauguration of the unicameral legislature in Nebraska as early as 1913, and who never stopped working for it until its triumph in 1934. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1920 in which a tie vote was cast on the amendment, the chairman voting against it.

Another member is young John Adams, a Negro from Omaha, who was a representative in the last two-house legislature. Adams then represented a comparatively small district with a majority of Negroes. When the unicameral district was created, it was much larger and more populous, and the Negro population was swamped by whites. Adams filed with little hope of winning. The Democratic machine in Omaha put up against him a man generally regarded as a professional politician, and Adams won.

The non-partisan feature has already had healthy effects. Two years ago the Democrats, with a majority of 18,000 in the state, had approximately a two-to-one majority in the Nebraska House and Senate. In 1936 their majority for Governor Cochran was 77,000 and for President Roosevelt 100,000. Yet the unicameral's forty-three members, elected at the same time, consist "in private life," as Nebraskans charmingly say, of twenty-two Democrats and twenty-one Republicans. This would indicate that the people voted for the man and not the label, as Senator Norris contended they would. Unless partisan feelings mount higher than they have so far, some persons do not expect the parties to organize and caucus within the legislature, even informally.

Efforts are now being made to devise a set of rules and a type of organization that will insure orderly consideration of bills, without the jams and slack periods characteristic of two-house legislatures. Constitutionally the amendment left the members pretty free. Aside from the one-house feature, the amendment's most important stipulations are election by single districts, with no mass election of large delegations from the cities; the non-partisan election; the provision that the unicameral may by law meet oftener than once every two years (without disturbing the governor's power to call special sessions, however); the removal of any time limit on introduction of bills (the old legislature could receive bills only during the first twenty days except by request of the governor); the provision that no bill can pass and become law in less than five days, and must be on file for final reading and passage for at least one day; and finally that any one member may demand and receive a record roll call on any matter. There is no constitutional limit on length of sessions. The veto power remains undisturbed, three-fifths being necessary to override the governor.

To the rules thus laid down in the constitution, members and others are working to add rules that will (1) enlarge the function of the committees and cause them to act with more thoroughness, and (2) make it well-nigh impossible for any but the most urgent matters to be acted upon out of their order in the legislative routine. Possibly the rules will provide that one member, or at most not more than three, may prevent consideration of any bill out of order.

Instead of the usual thirty or forty committees, there may be no more than nine; each will embrace a whole function of state government and all the legislation in this general field. Thus a finance committee will handle the state's fiscal affairs and all legislation relating to banks, insurance companies, building and loan companies, and the like.

It is possible that the legislature will take advantage of its power to meet oftener than biennially and will meet yearly, considering at one session only appropriation bills and the budget, and at the other general legislation. It may also decide to build up a legislative council or an expanded legislative reference bureau—Nebraska now has a small but efficient one—for continuous research that will provide it with a continuous flow of information upon suggested legislation and needed legislation. This would be the strongest single weapon against the ubiquitous corporate and pressure lobbies. The legislature may keep its calendar of business alive for the entire two years of its existence, as the United States Congress now does—something rare or altogether lacking in state legislatures.

Professor John P. Senning, professor of political science at the University of Nebraska and a strong advocate of the unicameral system, expects the legislature to move slowly at first. He believes it would have been better had the terms of members been set at four years instead of two. Senator Norris wanted a limit of thirty members but accepted a limitation between thirty and fifty. The legislature, in passing the enabling act, wanted fifty members but could not form, as the amendment provided, fifty districts approximately equal in population, compact and contiguous. In large industrial states, Professor Senning thinks, the upper limit of membership should be as high as sixty to insure adequate representation of diverse interests. He points out that where the election is not non-partisan as it is in Nebraska proportional representation should prevail in order to protect minorities.

The amendment did not raise salaries. Members will get $1,774 for two years' work, plus actual cost of transportation for one trip each session. They will get no extra compensation for special sessions. The lieutenant governor is the presiding officer. He has no vote except in case of a tie.

Professor Senning points to the fact that all cities of more than 25,000 in the United States have unicameral councils, and that eight out of nine Canadian provinces, one Australian commonwealth, and the new Philippine government have unicameral legislatures. Pennsylvania, Georgia, and Vermont once had what were called unicameral legislative bodies. They were abandoned, but this is not to be taken as a bad omen for the Nebraska experiment. Those early bodies had a companion body which could not pass bills but could wear down the law-making body by resubmitting legislation until it was accepted.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE funeral of Arthur Brisbane was, according to the newspapers, a very remarkable occasion. Five thousand persons were said to have attended, in and out of the church, and the list of pallbearers was quite astounding. This may be in part explained by the fact that when you get a telegram asking you to be a pallbearer you are under very strong obligations to accept. I hope that accounts for the presence of Mayor LaGuardia, Governor Lehman, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Gerard Swope, Vincent Astor, and numerous others. I do not suppose that there has been such an outpouring for a journalist in many years. One might be tempted to conclude from it that the journalist so celebrated had been a great moral power in the community, that he had championed high ideals all his life, that he had always written exactly what he believed, that he had raised the standards of American journalism.

Unfortunately none of these things are true. He was a man with an extraordinary range of knowledge, with unquestioned writing ability. He was a natural-born journalist, and when he let himself go could do a remarkable piece of descriptive writing. His style was, however, deliberately cultivated to appeal to the simplest mind—he wrote down to the mass mind. He made the widest possible appeal by reducing things to their simplest form. It would be unfair to judge his column by what it has contained during recent years, when it has usually been a rewrite of late dispatches which appeared in the news columns near by, coupled with some superficial or banal comment. There has been nothing inspiring, nothing uplifting, and for many years no championing of the cause of the plain people, of whom he and his employer were the self-appointed protagonists in the early years of the Hearst experiment. He will be forgotten promptly, or remembered only as an easy writer whom one might read for months without the quickening of a pulse.

This was a hired man who bartered his beliefs and rejoiced in his shame because thereby he made great sums of money. For many years, perhaps even at his death, he was the highest-paid American journalist, and his love of money, as Westbrook Pegler has pointed out, was what kept him from being a great man. For that he sold his soul when he took service with Mr. Hearst; for that he abandoned his opportunity to be a great national leader. He piled up millions, being one of the shrewdest and most successful real-estate speculators in New York City, profiting greatly by what the single-taxers call the "unearned increment." He was a remarkably skilful money-maker, but in becoming that he threw away his opportunity to be a really great and noble journalist. For decade after decade he took orders from his employer. He even went so low at one time as to write page puffs of theatrical performances, for which Mr. Hearst received $1,000 the page. He was always ready to glorify Mr. Hearst's friend, Marion Davies, or to back Mr. Hearst's political ambitions, although he knew perfectly well that Mr. Hearst was not fit to hold public office. In other words, Mr. Brisbane was without principle. It is known that of late years the two men had drifted apart and that Mr. Brisbane's own political views, notably in the last campaign, were quite different than those of his employer. But Hearst's debt to Mr. Brisbane remains incalculable. That skilled pen built him up, made him out a statesman—when it could—and was even ready to help Hearst in his aspirations for the Presidency, so fortunately thwarted by the publication of some plain facts.

I have heard many newspapermen discuss the question which of the two men was the more censurable. I have always felt that Mr. Brisbane was because he came of good family, fine stock, and therefore knew better. Mr. Brisbane's father was one of that group of New England idealists and early socialists who tried at Brook Farm to live up to their principles. He died, not a rich man, but a highly esteemed one who rejoiced in the friendship of Emerson and Lowell and Thomas Wentworth Higginson and Theodore Parker—all that clan which played such a great part in the literary and intellectual development of New England, in the fifties especially. It was with that background that Arthur Brisbane entered journalism and abased his unquestioned talent. I suppose I am out of date and old-fashioned, but even at my age I cannot worship material success at the cost of the finest spiritual qualities and of intellectual integrity. I am well aware that the former course wins the more pallbearers and the longer obituaries. Did we not see similar outpourings at the funeral of Chauncey Depew, the man who did so much to corrupt the political life of New York State over many years, and at that of the elder J. P. Morgan? I have not forgotten that when the highest-minded, most ceaselessly patriotic of modern journalists, Edwin L. Godkin, died in England, there was not sufficient recollection of what he had done over many years in combating the evils of American political life, and especially of what he had accomplished in improving the civic life of New York City, to bring about the holding of a single memorial meeting in the city in which he had so long labored. In his incredibly omnivorous reading Mr. Brisbane must have memorized Shakespeare's lines: "The evil that men do lives after them, the good is oft interred with their bones." There was a cynicism which must have appealed to him, for he was a self-made cynic who suppressed his finest instincts solely for the sake of the power that comes with wealth.

BROUN'S PAGE

Without Trumpets

SOME bitter things are being said about William Green. And many of the charges hurled at him are wholly without foundation. Possibly I am not the best person to defend him since he is the president of a federation to which I belong. Indeed, I am a double member through holding two union cards. Of late I have not been very active in Equity because I have been without theatrical offers for the past couple of seasons. Oh, and I forgot, I'm an honorary member of the sceneshifters' local in Washington, D. C.

But it is about time to get back to Mr. Green and speak my short piece in his defense. The preamble was merely to identify myself and explain my labor background. I wouldn't want to have anybody speak up and say, "You're for Green simply because you're a union man. That explains your enthusiasm for him."

Of course, I'm a union man, but I believe I would praise Bill Green in precisely the same way if I were not. William Green is wholly sincere and honest. He is devoted to the cause of labor. He has given a lifetime of service to it. The man has only two faults. He is a fool and he is a weakling. Aside from this William Green has everything a labor leader needs.

I hate to drag in the religious issue, but it is impossible to understand Mr. Green completely without revealing one incident in his Biblical background. William Green is a Baptist. There is nothing wrong with that. Some of the younger Baptists are among the most liberal leaders in America. Unfortunately, in a way, William Green is no longer young. He came into a branch of the church which was pretty dogmatic and fundamentalist. Baptism, of course, was by total immersion, and the local preacher was not only earnest but muscular. He was wont to thrust his converts deep below the surface of the creek. When William Green was taken into the fold, the preacher made one slight error. He pushed Bill under the surface and then forgot to bring him up again. Accordingly, labor in America has been led by a man who sees the world imperfectly and through muddy waters.

But in these days of sharpening strife, labor cannot afford to be led by any well-meaning person who is not quite bright. William Green doesn't retain. The movement for organization must be along broad lines, and the captains of the enterprise are now matching their wits with industrialists who have the edge in the matter of resources. To be sure the ultimate power lies with labor, but that power cannot be exercised without organization. There's the rub. The situation is not unlike that in which the butterscotch soldier found himself in "Davey and the Goblin." The butterscotch soldier couldn't run until he got hot, and he couldn't get hot until he ran. I believe the psychiatrists call this a vicious circle.

Labor must find leaders energetic enough to break through the ring. The policy of the A. F. of L. under its present commanders has been simply to stand its ground and form a hollow square. Moreover, it has been rather more hollow than square.

In contrast to the stagnation of the Green troops is the magnificent progress of the C. I. O. It seems to me that the strategy of John L. Lewis is proving its worth. If Mr. Lewis had gone to Tampa or thereabouts, it would have made magnificent copy for the newspapers but it would have been less than artful. John L. is beginning to extricate himself from a dangerous position. He knows as well as anybody, and in fact better than any other labor leader, the value of publicity. But he is also wise enough to appreciate the fact that there can be too much publicity. For a time John L. Lewis was making the front page every day. This did not imply friendliness on the part of the papers. They wanted to take John up on the high battlements merely in order to push him off so that he might conveniently break his neck.

Part of the plot was the commotion raised in many quarters that Lewis was consumed with a passion to be President. Now there is nothing improper or disgraceful in such an ambition. In school we were all told that we might make it if only we were good little boys and did what the teacher told us. But in the case of Lewis the whole intent was to convince workers that his efforts in organization were only moves for his own advancement.

Fortunately, John L. Lewis understands newspapers and their ways extremely well. With the possible exception of President Roosevelt, he is the most skilful man in Washington at handling a press conference. He realized that while a certain number of headlines were useful, the fight could not be won on paper. In the last few weeks he has gone into the silences and sawed wood.

Without much tumult great gains have been made in both steel and motors. I'm inclined to believe that victory may be won in the automobile plants earlier than in the steel mills. The strike of the flat-glass workers has already driven a wedge into the ranks of the motor barons. Lewis has the imagination to understand the tie-up which exists between steel and motors and glass. It is a war against an empire. From this point of view the craft theory is worse than absurd. It is tragic. It is like attacking Gibraltar with a bean shooter. It is an attempt to break a front-line fortress by sending out cops in squads of ten or twelve. There has been a great deal of discussion as to the real issue between the C. I. O. and the American Federation of Labor. William Green has said repeatedly that the industrial union is not the issue. He may be right, because as a matter of fact the issue is even more fundamental. It boils down to this—in fighting for its rights is labor going to use its head or have it broken?

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

ON BEING MODERN-MINDED

BY BERTRAND RUSSELL

OUR age is the most parochial since Homer. I speak not of any geographical parish: the inhabitants of Mudcombe-in-the-Meers are more aware than at any former time of what is being done and thought at Praha, at Gorki, or at Peiping. It is in the chronological sense that we are parochial: as the new names conceal the historic cities of Prague, Nijni-Novgorod, and Pekin, so new catchwords hide from us the thoughts and feelings of our ancestors, even when they differed little from our own. We imagine ourselves at the apex of intelligence, and cannot believe that the quaint clothes and cumbrous phrases of former times can have invested people and thoughts that are still worthy of our attention. If "Hamlet" is to be interesting to a really modern reader, it must first be translated into the language of Marx or of Freud, or, better still, into a jargon insistently compounded of both. I read lately a contemptuous review of a book by Santayana, mentioning an essay on Hamlet "dated, in every sense, 1908"—as if what has been discovered since then made any earlier appreciation of Shakespeare irrelevant and comparatively superficial. It did not occur to the reviewer that his review was "dated, in every sense, 1936." Or perhaps this thought did occur to him, and filled him with satisfaction. He was writing for the moment, not for all time; next year he will have adopted the new fashion in opinions, whatever it may be, and he no doubt hopes to remain up to date as long as he continues to write. Any other ideal for a writer would seem absurd and old-fashioned to the modern-minded man.

The desire to be contemporary is of course new only in degree; it has existed to some extent in all previous periods that believed themselves to be progressive. The Renaissance had a contempt for the Gothic centuries that had preceded it; the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries covered priceless mosaics with whitewash; the Romantic movement despised the age of the heroic couplet. Sixty-five years ago Lecky reproached my mother for being led by intellectual fashion to oppose fox-hunting: "I am sure," he wrote, "you are not really at all sentimental about foxes or at all shocked at the prettiest of all the assertions of women's rights, riding across country. But you always look upon politics and intellect as a fierce race and are so dreadfully afraid of not being sufficiently advanced or intellectual." But in none of these former times was the contempt for the past nearly as complete as it is now. From the Renaissance to the end of the eighteenth century men admired Roman antiquity; the Romantic movement revived the Middle Ages; my mother, for all her belief in nineteenth-century progress, constantly read Shakespeare and Milton. It is only since the war that it has been fashionable to ignore the past en bloc.

The belief that fashion alone should dominate opinion has great advantages. It makes thought unnecessary and puts the highest intelligence within the reach of everyone. It is not difficult to learn the correct use of such words as "complex," "sadism," "Oedipus," "bourgeois," "deviation," "left"; and nothing more is needed to make a brilliant writer or talker. Some, at least, of such words represented much thought on the part of their inventors; like paper money they were originally convertible into gold. But they have become for most people inconvertible, and in depreciating have increased nominal wealth in ideas. And so we are enabled to despise the paltry intellectual fortunes of former times.

The modern-minded man, although he believes profoundly in the wisdom of his period, must be presumed to be very modest about his personal powers. His highest hope is to think first what is about to be thought, to say what is about to be said, and to feel what is about to be felt; he has no wish to think better thoughts than his neighbors, to say things showing more insight, or to have emotions which are not those of some fashionable group, but only to be slightly ahead of others in point of time. Quite deliberately he suppresses what is individual in himself for the sake of the admiration of the herd. A mentally solitary life, such as that of Copernicus, or Spinoza, or Milton after the Restoration, seems pointless according to modern standards. Copernicus should have delayed his advocacy of the Copernican system until it could be made fashionable; Spinoza should have been either a good Jew or a good Christian; Milton should have moved with the times, like Cromwell's widow, who asked Charles II for a pension on the ground that she did not agree with her husband's politics. Why should an individual set himself up as an independent judge? Is it not clear that wisdom resides in the blood of the Nordic race or, alternatively, in the proletariat? And in any case what is the use of an eccentric opinion, which never can hope to conquer the great agencies of publicity?

The money rewards and widespread though ephemeral fame which those agencies have made possible places temptations in the way of able men which are difficult to resist. To be pointed out, admired, mentioned constantly in the press, and offered easy ways of earning much money is highly agreeable; and when all this is open to a man, he finds it difficult to go on doing the work that he himself thinks best and is inclined to subordinate his judgment to the general opinion.

Various other factors contribute to this result. One of these is the rapidity of progress which has made it difficult to do work which will not soon be superseded. Newton lasted till Einstein; Einstein is already regarded by many as antiquated. Hardly any man of science, nowadays, sits down to write a great work, because he knows that, while he is writing it, others will discover new things that will make it obsolete before it appears. The emotional tone of the world changes with equal rapidity, as wars, depressions, and revolutions chase each other across the stage. And public events impinge upon private lives more forcibly than in former days. Spinoza, in spite of his heretical opinions, could continue to sell spectacles and meditate, even when his country was invaded by foreign enemies; if he had lived now, he would in all likelihood have been conscripted or put in prison. For these reasons a greater energy of personal conviction is required to lead a man to stand out against the current of his time than would have been necessary in any previous period since the Renaissance.

The change has, however, a deeper cause. In former days men wished to serve God. When Milton wanted to exercise "that one talent which is death to hide," he felt that his soul was "bent to serve therewith my Maker." Every religiously minded artist was convinced that God's aesthetic judgments coincided with his own; he had therefore a reason, independent of popular applause, for doing what he considered his best, even if his style was out of fashion. The man of science in pursuing truth, even if he came into conflict with current superstition, was still setting forth the wonders of Creation and bringing men's imperfect beliefs more nearly into harmony with God's perfect knowledge. Every serious worker, whether artist, philosopher, or astronomer, believed that in following his own convictions he was serving God's purposes. When with the progress of enlightenment this belief began to grow dim, there still remained the True, the Good, and the Beautiful. Non-human standards were still laid up in heaven, even if heaven had no topographical existence.

Throughout the nineteenth century the True, the Good, and the Beautiful preserved their precarious existence in the minds of earnest atheists. But their very earnestness was their undoing, since it made it impossible for them to stop at a halfway house. Pragmatists explained that Truth is what it pays to believe. Historians of morals reduced the Good to a matter of tribal custom. Beauty was abolished by the artists in a revolt against the sugary insipidities of a philistine epoch and in a mood of fury in which satisfaction is to be derived only from what hurts. And so the world was swept clear not only of God as a person but of God's essence as an ideal to which man owed an ideal allegiance; while the individual, as a result of a crude and uncritical interpretation of sound doctrines, was left without any inner defense against social pressure.

All movements go too far, and this is certainly true of the movement toward subjectivity, which began with Luther and Descartes as an assertion of the individual and has culminated by an inherent logic in his complete subjection. The subjectivity of truth is a hasty doctrine not validly deducible from the premises which have been thought to imply it; and the habits of centuries have made many things seem dependent upon theological belief which in fact are not so. Men lived with one kind of illusion, and when they lost it they fell into another. But it is not by old error that new error can be combated. Detachment and objectivity, both in thought and in feeling, have been historically but not logically associated with certain traditional beliefs; to preserve them without these beliefs is both possible and important. A certain degree of isolation both in space and time is essential to generate the independence required for the most important work; there must be something which is felt to be of more importance than the admiration of the contemporary crowd. We are suffering not from the decay of theological beliefs but from the loss of solitude.

BOOKS

James Harvey Robinson

THE HUMAN COMEDY. By James Harvey Robinson. With an Introduction by Harry Elmer Barnes. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IN 1898 I enrolled in James Harvey Robinson's seminar in eighteenth-century thought, which met one evening a week in the old Columbia library. The professor talked so informally and entertainingly that taking notes seemed out of place. He had wit, a dry, mordant humor, and a fund of striking, unacademic bits of information which I had not found in textbooks or formal histories; and there was a sadness in the countenance, a quality, half plaintiveness half resignation, in the voice that made even simple statements of fact amusing or illuminating, or both. "Arthur Young was an English gentleman farmer who rode around France on a horse." It sounded funny, and was illuminating: Arthur Young ceased to be a book of travels and became a live person. I recall little else, except that I wrote one paper on the Physiocrats and another on the Memoirs of Bachaumont, and acquired an abiding interest in learning why people think as they do think.

At that time Robinson was halfway through his historical tour: had traveled from classical times through the Middle Ages, stopping off at the Renaissance, to the French Revolution. He would presently say, "I know all I want to know about the French Revolution," and move on to the contemporary scene, to modern science, and from science back to pre-history, and from pre-history to the modern scene again. The long journey made him thoroughly familiar with the general history of Europe, and gave him a first-hand knowledge of the blest documentary sources. One day, in the first buildings of the New School, he picked up a dusty Latin folio, leaved through it to some amusing passage which he read with great relish, and then remarked, with a certain wistful nostalgia: "Becker, I love these old books, and I used to know them pretty well." He always knew them very well.

He carried his learning so lightly that few people suspected that he was an erudite scholar. When he became dissatisfied with the conventional way of writing history, impatient with the effort he and others had spent in settling Hoti's business, in determining "whether Charles the Fat was at Ingelheim or Lustnau on July 1, 887," I felt that he had earned the right to criticize the guild because he was a master-craftsman, had earned the right to say what history was good for because he knew history. I never felt that the same could be said of those many imitators who know little about history or historians except that they are subjects to be merry about à la Robinson.

William James once said, apropos of the famous "third manner" of his brother: "There is no third manner; poor Harry has only changed his secretaries, and the last one has included all of his hesitations and ellipses." Many people think that Robinson had a second manner, that he went sour on history and gave it up for something else. On the contrary, he never ceased to study history, never ceased to think, and to say, that history, studied intelligently for the purpose of understanding how man has become what he is, is the most important of all subjects to know about. His quarrel with historians was that whereas they know much about what man has done they know singularly little about man himself. There are, he says, "two quite different questions" which can be asked of the past. One is, "What has happened here and there from time to time?" The other is, "How is it that we now do as we do, feel as we feel, and know what we know?" He thought historians were commonly satisfied to ask and answer the first question, whereas it is the second that is important. Historians tell us that the Edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685, and that the great majority of Frenchmen applauded that act. In itself that is not important, but if we can understand why the majority of Frenchmen applauded the persecution of the Huguenots, we can understand better why the majority of Americans applauded the persecution of German-Americans in our own day. Robinson's quarrel with historians was not that they took history seriously but that they took it without discrimination, studied it "objectively," that is to say without an object. He insisted that it should be studied "with an object." The object should be to throw some light on the nature of man and thereby enable him to understand better what he is doing and should do. His simple creed was that what is needed for salvation is chiefly enlightenment, and that the study of history should aim to make men more enlightened.

To urge historians to be as intelligent as possible and to make their learning useful to men in their present predicaments was surely not too much. But to keep on urging it for twenty-five years, even in a variety of ways and with an engaging humor—was this perhaps too much? Essentially everything that Robinson had to say on the subject was contained in "The New History" (1911) and "The Mind in the Making" (1921). The present volume is not a new work, as the title page seems to suggest, but Harry Elmer Barnes's compilation (an excellent one) from articles already published and long selections taken from previous books, notably "The Mind in the Making." Many of us would gladly exchange much repetitious comment about the "new history" for a substantial example of the new history itself. Such an example Robinson could have given us by preparing for publication the admirable lectures on the intellectual history of Europe which he gave in Columbia University, and for many years the rumor persisted that he intended to do that. I wish he could have done it.

By As Little As 3/100,000 Inch

A MEASUREMENT that is finer than the one-hundredth part of a human hair. This man measures the expansion, by heating, of a piece of metal. If this expansion deviates by as little as 3/100,000 inch from the expansion of the material it is to match, only failure can result. Such precise measurements made possible the new all-metal radio tube.

Measurements of equal precision, in General Electric laboratories, are fundamental to the further development of quality in design and manufacture of all General Electric products. Careful measurements made possible the hermetically sealed G-E refrigerator, with its lifetime dependability and its low-cost operation. Precise measurements, by G-E scientists, of electric currents in vacuum tubes have led the way to present high standards of radio reception.

These are but a few examples of the contributions of scientific research and engineering in General Electric laboratories in Schenectady—contributions which have stimulated new industries, increased employment, and provided greater comforts of living.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

However, a man does what he can and must. Robinson would no doubt have said that another well-documented history, however excellent, would have been less useful in the present circumstances than popular books and articles designed to startle the conventional mind out of its torpid complacency. Perhaps he was right. At all events he was one of the ablest and most thought-provoking teachers of history in our time, and it is not for one of his admiring and grateful pupils to cavil at the performance of a man who in fact exerted a profound and beneficial influence upon the thought of his generation.

CARL BECKER

The Wingless Life

THE STREET OF THE FISHING CAT. By Jolán Földes.

Translated from the Hungarian by Elizabeth Jacobi.

Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THIS winner of the All-Nations Prize Novel Competition is possessed, perhaps merely by coincidence, of an international background. It is the chronicle of a Hungarian family in Paris between 1920 and the present; the international background being that capital of France which no Frenchman knows but which innumerable émigrés know too drearily well. Mr. and Mrs. Barabás and their three children, Anna, Klári, and Jani, move exclusively in the circle of exiles where a perfect if artificial democracy throws classes and nationalities together without regard for anything save the homesickness common to them all. Mr. Barabás is a furrier and his wife is a laundress; and Anna, the heroine of the family if it has one, is a dressmaker; but in the cafes where they like occasionally to sit there may be Russian bankers and Spanish noblemen and Italian intellectuals who will be glad to discuss with them the one endless subject of the future—the future meaning the time when they can fly back to their native cities and once more hop among the boughs of a remembered past. Most of them never make the flight. Their powers of locomotion are gone. "Here they are living, fugitives, their life but a wingless semblance of the life for which they had been born. Every year the construction of another empire collapses around them, and buries a few thousand or a few hundred thousand, buries them and condemns to this shadowy form of death-in-life existence." They simply continue to exist until "they slowly vanish and leave no trace."

The author of "The Street of the Fishing Cat," who herself came to Paris as a student from Hungary and stayed on at jobs somewhat resembling Anna's, has attempted to rescue the circle of exiles from their natural oblivion. She has tried to leave traces for them so that we shall know that they existed. She has dignified the Barabás family by making each member of it typical, and she has done it the honor of avoiding anything in its career that would look like melodrama. A good many things happen, and yet the general effect is one of eventlessness; there is a monotony of minor disappointments and small joys. This effect is of course intended, and from a more distinguished source could have been a fine one. Jolán Földes, however, is not a distinguished novelist. There is nothing of permanent importance about the commonplaces with which she has strewn the pathway of her people. The wisdom they acquire is not very interesting, nor do they appear to represent the timeless human family with which all great novels are concerned. The predicament of the Barabás family has only temporary meaning.

Here again it might have been possible for a first-rate novelist to make the people of the tale representative in some fashion of all ephemerids, so that the name Barabás would remain through a long future the symbol of homeless men. I am quite sure that this has not happened. The book tells me things I did not know; it is readable; and it is not as a matter of fact unintelligent. But it will be replaced in time by other documents that are truer to the passing moment. "The Street of the Fishing Cat" is a document first and last. Perhaps that made it especially eligible for a prize, since documents can be publicized more easily than works of art, and can more readily be recognized as "important." On the other hand it is likely that no such thought occurred to the judges in this case, who had after all to decide which manuscript among those submitted was best on any basis. The question could not have been whether "The Street of the Fishing Cat" was worth $19,000. Either a novel is worth the paper it is printed on or it is priceless. The question could only have been whether any other manuscript was more deserving of the prize. I should have supposed that "Steps Going Down," the American runner-up by John T. McIntyre, was more deserving. Mr. McIntyre's people are decidedly of our time, being the riffraff of post-war Philadelphia, and many of the things they say will some day be unintelligible. But at any rate they are talking to each other rather than to the reader; they seem to have no idea that they mean anything, or represent anything; and two of them, Pete and Thelma, give us the illusion that what they say was never said this way before. They are documents, but they are also persons; which the figures of Jolán Földes scarcely are.

MARK VAN DOREN

An Ideal for Literature or Life

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMANTIC IDEAL.

By F. L. Lucas. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THERE is no use protesting; the terms romanticism and classicism will continue to be used, and here indeed is another book about them by a critic "over the water," a set of rather wandering lectures whose index, if there were one, would satisfy the most omnivorous tastes. This book has small pages and large type. But from page 223 to the top of page 225 are to be found the following names in the following order: Keats, Einstein, Michelangelo, the Pope, the Aran Islands, Dr. Johnson, Sainte-Beuve, Taine, Coleridge, Montaigne, Dryden, Johnson, Goethe, Matthew Arnold, Keats, Virginia Woolf, Desmond McCarthy, Gilbert Murray, Mackail, and Walter Pater. Page 227, not untypical, contains among others Dante, Milton, Wordsworth, Byron, the Emperor Honorius, Alaric, and Gerard de Nerval. I cannot make out whether Mr. Lucas is "classical" or "romantic." Perhaps considering his widespread allusiveness he might be defined as eclectic. The book includes a not unpleasant account of a journey to Iceland—for most critics stick, Mr. Lucas thinks, too closely to libraries—and a long attack on Coleridge and a shorter one on surrealism and Ezra Pound. It is a little difficult to find one's way intellectually through all these riches, and the author is apparently aware of the fact. For he provides "an epilogue for reviewers and others who may find the book too long." This thoughtfulness helps, in part, to clear matters up:

In these pages it has been suggested that the fundamental quality of romanticism is not mere anti-classicism, nor medievalism, nor aspiration, nor wonder . . . but rather a liberation of the less conscious levels of the mind. Health both in life and literature lies between excess of self-consciousness and excess of impulsiveness, between too much self-control and too little.

... About our infancy, it seems, lies Caliban ■ well as Ariel. ... So the romantic, I suggest, wandering in the woods of Dream has often wandered too far, and got lost like the neurotic who takes refuge from reality among the moldered lodges of his childish years. ...

The reader is advised to hold firmly to these quotations in wandering with Mr. Lucas through his own palace of dreams, for else he might get lost in Chapter II on The Crocodiles of Alachua or The Past of Romanticism, or in Chapter III on Fairies and Fungi or The Future of Romanticism. As a matter of fact, whatever may be said in deprecation of Mr. Lucas as ■ historian of literature, he has a philosophy of its history. One may quarrel with his tastes, but his tastes are definite. It is ■ pity he lets his desire for inclusiveness obscure the lines of his thought or the qualities of his appreciations. There is one characteristic passage in which he says that just as his book was going to press he got hold of a book on surrealism, which is worked into his text as the last infantile gasp of romantic decadence.

One may, indeed one must, waive the justice of Mr. Lucas's historical use of terms and start with his use of them. There are for him two kinds of romanticism, healthy and diseased. The healthy sort is legitimate day-dreaming; it has its own vigors, which are exemplified in Malory or Homer. "Romanticism" is the dream gift of Dionysius, who brings release for the soul in chains, but for those who follow him too far heavier chains still. "Diseased romanticism specializes in 'fungi rather than fairies,' in 'ordure rather than ideals.'"

There are also two kinds of classicism, controlled spontaneity and the formality that is death. Somewhere between the two lies Mr. Lucas's ideal for literature or life, vitality master of itself, passion finding a pattern, in short that sanity whose other name is Greece; which he finds—singular juxtaposition—in the Sagas of Iceland (in which land he must have had a wonderful time), in Hardy, in eighteenth-century France, in William Morris, and in A. E. Housman. Lest the reader think I am being frivolous or inaccurate, I refer him to the last page of the Epilogue, where the author assures us that if and when the next fatuity of Europe lets loose the next deluge, it is to these he shall turn for consolation, for he knows none "nearer the truth of things." He tried them once after leaving Cambridge, in no man's land during the last war. There is, we are told, no severer critical test.

Mr. Lucas's book is an interesting symptom of the atmosphere in which discussions of classicism and romanticism are repeatedly carried on. The issue is seldom treated in purely aesthetic or in purely logical terms; it is indeed part of Mr. Lucas's contention that any thorough consideration of poetry must involve a consideration of life, and the good life. It is not so many years ago that Irving Babbitt was calling the literary world to order and chasing Rousseau out from under his bed. The élan vital was to be mastered by the inner check. Mr. Lucas is ■ good deal more genial and catholic, though like so many writers bred on Greece he displays occasionally a woeful lack of that serenity and "sense of the fitting" which all lovers of the classics agree has gone out of the contemporary world. He grows petulant because Coleridge didn't know more Greek or French. It may not be beside the point to argue that he himself might have known a little more about Plato and about German metaphysics, or even Coleridge, before dismissing so categorically Coleridge's theory of the imagination. It is never quite clear whether Mr. Lucas is berating Coleridge or I. A. Richards's book about Coleridge.

Wish for it... and you can hear it when you own VICTOR RECORDS!

"How I'd like to hear it right now..." How often you have said that to yourself! You felt emotionally in tune with the provocative musical dreaming of Debussy... Or you were fascinated by the disturbing impact of Bartok's modern music, and wanted to hear more... Perhaps only Mozart could just match your mood... But whatever musical wish you have, or will have, the answer can always be found in Victor Records... they bring you thrillingly life-like performance by all the world's great living musicians and musical organizations. Hear one of the new RCA Victor Phonograph-Radios, or the RCA Victor Record Player, $16.50.

New Victor Releases

14161—Italians in Algiers—Arturo Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra

14162—Danse Macabre—Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra

14181—Dich Teure Halle (from Tannhauser)
Elsas Traum (from Lohengrin)
Kirsten Flagstad

RCA presents the Metropolitan Opera every Saturday afternoon.
Also "The Magic Key" every Sunday, 2 to 3 P. M., E. S. T.
Both on NBC Blue Network.

VICTOR

RECORDS AND
PHONOGRAPH-RADIOS

A service of the Radio Corporation of America

THEATRES—DANCE

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
The Pulitzer Prize Play

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

by Robert E. Sherwood

with ALFRED LUNT
and LYNN FONTANNESHUBERT THEA., 44 St. W. of B'way, 300 seats $1.10
Mats.: Thurs. and Sat. 2:45. Evns. 8:45

PRELUDE TO EXILE

by William McNally with

WILFRED EVA LUCILE
LAWSON LE GALLIENNE WATSONGUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of Broadway, Evns., 8:40
Matinees THURSDAY and SATURDAY, 2:40

HIPPODROME—FRIDAY EVE., JAN. 15—8:45

NEW YORK PREMIERE—ONLY PRESENTATION

DORIS HUMPHREY CHARLES WEIDMAN

And their augmented groups in two new full-length ballets

"WITH MY RED FIRES"—"QUEST"

Tickets Now at HIPPODROME BOX OFFICE: 55c to $2.50
Columbia Book Shop, N. Y. U. Book Shop
Rand Book Shop, Workers Book Shop

LECTURES—DEBATE

LEWIS COREY, Economist

LYND WARD, Artist

WALTER POLAKOV, Technician

Will Speak on

AMERICA'S CAPACITY FOR ABUNDANCE . . . WHY POVERTY?

Tuesday, January 12th, 8:00 P. M.

INTER-PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATION FORUM

155 East 11th Street

Admission 25c

SECOND LECTURE IN THE SERIES

DECADENCE OF CULTURE UNDER NAZISM

SUNDAY, JANUARY 10th, 8:30 P. M.

at Mecca Temple Building, Blackstone Room, 130 West 56th Street, N. Y. C.

DEBASEMENT OF WOMAN IN

ENSLAVEMENT OF LABOR IN

NAZI GERMANY

NAZI GERMANY

ALICE HAMILTON

ELINORE M. HERRICK

Member of Advisory Staff to U. S.

Prominent labor authority: Director,

Secretary of Labor

Regional Labor Board

NAZI CONCEPTION OF JUSTICE

DOROTHY KENYON

Prominent attorney; First Deputy Commissioner of Licenses of the City of N. Y.

Admission 50c

Auspices: American Committee for Anti-Nazi Literature

Room 21, 63 Fifth Avenue

ALgonquin 4-4771

DEBATE: CAN JEWS AND ARABS LIVE PEACEFULLY
TOGETHER IN PALESTINE?Between Dr. Faud I. Shatara, President, Arabian National Congress
Rabbi Louis I. Newman, Temple Rodolph Shalom

Sunday Evening, January 17th, 8:30 P. M. Sharp

Julia Richman High School Auditorium, 67th Street and Second Avenue
Crosstown bus brings you to door—All seats 50c

Auspices of the Society for the Aid of Crippled in Palestine

SCHOOL

WORKERS SCHOOL

Winter Term Registration

COURSES IN:

Science and Dialectics
Economics
Historical Materialism
Marxism-Leninism
Literature
American HistoryLabor History
Current Events
Research Methods
Psychology
Labor Journalism
Russian
And many other

For Descriptive Catalogue D write to the School Office, 35 E. 12th St., N. Y. C.

RESORT

The "Your Winter Home"

Vendome

MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.

Private Baths—Private Sun Porches—Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.

M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood 555.

He condescends, of all things, to Dryden, who is most of the time a "great journalist," much of the time "a greater orator," "occasionally a great poet." Shelley comes out rather a fool alongside of Hardy. He is kind enough to say, "nor need writers like Swift or Baudelaire be denied greatness because there was so much about them neither sane nor sound."

There is something rotten in the state of life, of politics, and of literature Mr. Lucas feels. He looks to the science of psychology and to the poets to save us. But good poetry, he tells us, is that of a good poet. With Longinus he holds that "great poetry is the echo of a great soul." And now we are at last ready to begin. What is greatness; what is goodness? Mr. Lucas found them in Iceland, a journey which he recommends to the reader. But the secret he has kept to himself, and also the secret of classicism and romanticism. The discussion cannot be considered closed or, as broached in this book, very clear. There are lots of romantic insights in the book; a little "classical" order might have rendered them more coherent.

IRWIN EDMAN

A Baedeker of Jew-Baiting

SOME OF MY BEST FRIENDS ARE JEWS. By Robert Gessner. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

THIS book will be widely and loudly damned. Not because it brilliantly restates the Marxist thesis that anti-Semitism is an economic phenomenon, or the corollary that it can be ended only through basic social surgery. That might have been overlooked as an academic indiscretion. What the nihilists—Jewish and Gentile—will not forgive is the author's audacity in planning to eliminate what they are content to deplore. Organized resistance by Jews to fascism, open alliance of Jews with other minority groups, active Jewish participation in creating a Socialist state—these are his specifics.

There will be—there have already been—polite apologies for Mr. Gessner's impolitesse, nationalist gnashing of teeth over his "international" point of view. Fortunately these will not cancel the book. For the author has so thoroughly marshaled his evidence, documented his facts so fully, and presented his case so cogently as to make powerful appeal to the reason and courage of American Jewry. He is in a sense its paradigm. Like most of its younger generation he has been more kicked than catechized into Jewish consciousness. Like theirs, his Jewishness is primarily a reaction and a defense rather than a positive. Unlike them, however, he has looked closely into himself, his relationship with his fellow-Jews, and the Jewish status throughout the world.

Geographically his inquiry began on a Michigan Main Street and ended at the Crimean steppes. It carried Mr. Gessner from the assimilated Jewries of England and France, through the new Ghetto of Germany and the unspeakable Polish pale, to the nascent nationalism of Palestine. It taught him that Jew-baiting survives wherever it is lucrative; that—whether in Detroit or Nürnberg or Tel Aviv—the fires of race hatred are alternately stoked and banked for profit; that where—as in the Soviet Union—a socialized society is in the making, prejudice ceases to pay and atrophies.

Especially provocative are the chapters which deal with Zionism. Despite Mr. Gessner's laudatory recognition of the achievements of the Jewish pioneers in rebuilding a desolate land, they will provoke denunciation from ultra-nationalists. Yet the author has not been unsympathetic in his treatment of the conflicts inherent in the Labor-Zionist attempt to reconcile socialism and nationalism in a capitalist economy. Moreover, his emphasis on the recurrent problem of Arab-Jewish relationship and his insistence on the necessity of bringing about a rapprochement in terms of absolute equality between the two peoples should provoke a careful review of the entire question.

Mr. Gessner deals finally with the dynamics of the situation he decries. He makes clear that Jewish unity is a fictitious concept so long as Honorary Aryanism is conferred on Jewish bankers in Germany and wealthy American Jews contribute to organizations whose program reeks of anti-Semitism. He insists that the concept of such "unity" be replaced by that of union between the Jewish and non-Jewish masses in resisting their common fascist foes. And, in this reviewer's judgment, his book constitutes a significant advance toward that end.

JAMES WATERMAN WISE

DRAMA

More Matter and Less Art

MAXWELL ANDERSON continues to exhibit ■ talent that is rich and varied and copious. For sheer romantic dash there is, indeed, no one else writing for our theater who can even approach him, and there are occasions when he seems to have, besides, nearly everything ■ first-rate dramatist needs. The fact remains, nevertheless, that he reaches this best less frequently than he seems about to reach it and that he can slip from the powerful into the pretentious or from the beautiful into the showy without seeming to realize himself what a falling off is there. Thus "The Wingless Victory," which Katharine Cornell is acting at the Empire, is both astonishingly good and astonishingly bad since it begins with a first act remarkable for vividness and crispness and color only to end with a third so pretentiously empty and conventional as to seem hardly ■ part of the same play.

Most critics of the piece have commented more or less severely on the staleness of the subject. The story of an adventurous sea captain who brings home an exotic princess to hide-bound Salem suggests Mr. Hergesheimer's "Java Head," as well as, more generally, the whole Madame Butterfly tradition, and it seems as though Mr. Anderson, becoming progressively more aware of the conventionality of the theme, found it more and more difficult to avoid the clichés it calls to mind. He begins, as I have already remarked, with genuine brilliance. The family to which the captain is returning is vividly presented, and the dialogue is, for a while, not only as fine as any Mr. Anderson has written but a triumphant example of a style he himself has invented—elevated almost to poetry, but sufficiently flexible and free to be accepted very much as normal speech. Yet from the moment the central character enters, the play starts its downward course and grows less interesting as well as less convincing from moment to moment.

The fault is certainly not Miss Cornell's. She makes ■ striking figure and comes as near, I believe, ■ anyone could to vitalizing the character; but there is another defect in the piece perhaps more important, even, than the familiarity of the theme: the fact, namely, that the princess herself is the one completely unconvincing person in the play. I say "unconvincing" rather than "unreal" because I have no idea what

ON YOUR GUARD
The PREVENTION and TREATMENT of SEX DISEASES

By CARL WARREN, B.A., B.S., M.S.J.
Foreword by M. J. EXNER, M.D.
Consulting Physician to the American Social Hygiene Assn.

PART OF CONTENTS

ARE YOU THE ONE IN SEVEN?
Men First, but also Women—Youth, the Dangerous Age—Regarding Race and Riche—The Professional Prostitute—The Amateur Promiscuous Girl—Prevalence among Races—Venereal Diseases and Crime. PREVENTIVE METHODS AT A GLANCE Prophylactics for Women—Doctors, Clinics and Hospitals—Disease, Dollars and Cents—The Innocent and the Indiscreet—Love Rites of Venus—Civilization and Syphilization—The 606th Compound—Ehrlich—Syphilis, the Great Masquerader—The Other Sex Maladies.

SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT OF SYPHILIS
How to Tell If You Are Infected and What the Doctor Will Do—How Syphilis May Be Caught—First Signs of Infection—The Second Stage—The Third Stage.

SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT OF GONORRHEA

How to Tell If You Are Infected and What the Doctor Will Do—The Causes of Infection—Dangers of the Disease—The Fallacy of "No Worse Than a Bad Cold"—First Signs of Infection—Complications in Men—Complications in Women—How the Doctor Can Tell—Modern Methods of Treatment—Advice to the Patient—Length of Treatment—Protecting the Baby—Gonorrhea in Children—Gonorrhea Fallacies.

SAFETY FIRST AND FIRST AID
First Army and Navy Experiments—Prophylaxis Proved a Success—The Swing to Pocket Tubes—Popularity of the Condom—How the Doctor Can Tell—Treatment with Drugs—Artificial Fever Therapy—Advice to the Patient—Length of Treatment—A Message to Women—Syphilis in Babies—Fallacies about Syphilis.

ARE DRUG STORE PROPHYLACTICS THE ANSWER?

The Rubber Prophylactic—How to Buy and Use It—Proper Ways to Obtain, Test and Handle Mechanical Preventive Devices—What Is the Sheath?—The Most Popular Prophylactic—Advantages and Disadvantages—Sales Outside of Drug Stores—The Chemical Tube—How to Buy and Use It—Proper Ways to Obtain, Test and Handle the Prophylactic Packet—What Is the Chemical Tube?—Prophylaxis for Gonorrhea—Tried and Found Effective—The Ointment Tube—Advantages and Disadvantages—The Danger of Delay—What Price Safety?—The Sheath or the Tube, Which?

THE HIGHWAY TO HEALTH

How to Avoid the Perils of Quacks and Nostrums—How to Protect Yourself—Tricks of the Trade—Doctors and Drug Stores—What's in the bottle—Dangers of Self-Treatment—How to Find a Good Doctor—Paying the Doctor Bill—For Those Not Ill.

NOTE

To assure widest possible distribution, for "On Your Guard," the price has been fixed at only one dollar.

Free Offer

RETURN COUPON

DR. H. N. BUNDESEN, President, Board of Health, City of Chicago, says:

"A book of tremendous personal importance to every individual in the United States—should be placed in the hands of every young man and every young woman of college age."

DR. J. L. RICE, Commissioner of Health, City of New York, says:

"I am in favor of tactfully telling the public the truth about all communicable diseases, including syphilis and gonorrhea."

DR. MAX J. EXNER, Consulting Physician to the American Social Hygiene Association, says:

"If . . . the knowledge and means for the control of syphilis were fully applied . . . the disease could be stamped out in a short time. . . . Many people who have syphilis do not know it. . . ."

DR. WALTER CLARKE, Director, Bureau of Social Hygiene, City of New York, says:

"'On Your Guard' describes in simple, dignified language the prevention and the control of syphilis and gonorrhea."

LIBERALLY ILLUSTRATED

160 Pages • Cloth Bound

Mail This Coupon to Your Bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 721-N, 251 West 19th St., New York City.

Please send me . . . copies of "On Your Guard." I will pay postman $1.00 plus few cents postage on each book. If not entirely satisfied I may return book(s) within 14 days and purchase price WILL BE REFUNDED.

Name

Address

☐ Check here if you want to save postage charges. Enclose only $1.00 for each book and we will prepay postage. Same money-back guarantee, of course.

such a woman would be like. But I do know that the figure Mr. Anderson has created—she seems a vague blend of the genuinely primitive with some sort of ideal humanity—is never any more than an abstraction modeled in wax. She might have been kept in the background. She might have been made merely the occasion of the conflicts, which might have remained, as they seemed in the beginning to be, the real subject of the play. But Mr. Anderson has chosen instead to make her tragedy the central subject without succeeding in his attempt to give her enough life or enough character of her own to engage our emotions. The result is that the whole last act dealing with her laments and her suicide seems merely pretentious and dull.

Of all Mr. Anderson's recent plays only "Winterset" seems to me to have been original enough really to challenge the author's powers. It is not, I hope, necessary to explain that I do not single this play out because its theme happens to have sociological significance. I single it out because what Mr. Anderson had to say there was as original as his manner of saying it. In "The Wingless Victory" not only the plot but the theme as well—Puritan pride and Christian inhumanity—is familiar, and at best the author merely restates it with force rather than with originality. Perhaps he is to some extent a victim of his own talent, too gifted with the powers of expression to question his subjects as carefully as he should. Like several previous plays "The Wingless Victory" seems even at its best too much like a brilliantly executed exercise. Mr. Anderson needs no more practice. He has learned his craft. Is it too much to ask that he should employ it again as usefully as he did in "Winterset"?

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ENTIRELY NEW TO MEET ALL QUICK-REFERENCE NEEDS OF TODAY

This new Fifth Edition of WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE is abridged from WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY, Second Edition, and is characterized by the same outstanding scholarship and accuracy. The Best Handy-Sized Dictionary. 110,000 entries; 1,800 illustrations; 1,300 pages. Thin-Paper Style, Indexed: Cloth, $3.50; Fabrikoid, $5.00; Leather, $7.00; Limp Pigskin (dark blue or natural), $8.50. Purchase of your bookseller, or send order and remittance direct to the publishers. Write for New Quiz Picture Game—FREE. G. & C. Merriam Co., 711 Bway., Springfield, Mass.

The New
WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE
FIFTH EDITION

Why men insist on virgin brides

Does Modern Man Suffer from a Virginity Complex?

The Meaning of Your Inhibitions

By Sigmund Freud

The Latest Article by the Founder of Psychoanalysis

You Hate Yourself—No Wonder

By Louis Bischof

Curing Self-Consciousness

By A. A. Roback

Premature Ejaculation

By Edwin W. Hirsch

Psychologic Approach to Pregnancy

By Samuel A. Sandler

—and many other psychological articles and case histories in the December issue of THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST

Single copies 25c on sale at all newsstands, or send $1.00 for 4 issues to

THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST, 152 West 42nd Street, New York, N. Y.

RECORDS

THERE is nothing for you to do but to get refunds on your Christmas presents and buy the records of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" that were made originally for subscribers in England and are now released here by Victor (three albums with excellent accompanying booklets, $33). These records acquire additional importance from the fact that they record a performance by the company of the Glyndebourne Mozart Opera Festival, where Mozart is given in a way that demonstrates the perfection that is to be achieved in operatic performance with imperfect elements. For the singers vary in quality, as even singers chosen for a festival are bound to do; but they fit themselves completely into an ensemble and its single style—the perfect style for Mozart of Fritz Busch, who conducts.

The orchestra is not recorded as well as we know it can be; but the deficiency is slight, and nothing is obscured. On the contrary, it is a peculiarity of records to present music to the ear in more sharply defined detail than living performance does, and these records of "Figaro" have made me aware of details which enable me to understand the contention that Mozart's finest music is in his operas, and that they contain the finest dramatic music ever written. The reason is not only the miracles of expressiveness, of characterization, of wit, in themselves, but their subtlety, the economy with which they are produced. To those who require the luxuriance of Wagner and Strauss, Mozart is simple prattle; but "Figaro" is superior to "Meistersinger" and "Rosenkavalier" precisely because of a quality analogous to what mathematicians call elegance.

Victor also has issued a volume of Debussy's songs: "Fêtes Galantes," "Le Promenoir des deux Amants," "Trois Chansons de Bilitis," the "Ballade des Femmes de Paris," and "De Grève" from "Proses Lyriques" (seven records, $10.50). They are sung by Maggie Teyte, an authoritative interpreter of Debussy, with fine accompaniments by Alfred Cortot; and there is an excellent booklet containing the texts in French and English and short introductions by the artists and Emile Vuillermoz. In other words, a very careful job has been done for any who are interested in these examples of a formula applied without much regard for the meanings of the texts, or even for their rhythms and accents, which we are told are the basis of the attenuated declamation that I find very tiresome.

Almost as tiresome is the succession of pretty effects in Columbia's volume of songs by Erich Wolff (five records, $5); and Ernst Wolff's singing adds to the monotony by being all in one color. On a Columbia single ($1) are two fine Händel items, beautifully sung: "Silent Worship" from "Ptolemy," sung by Dennis Noble, and "O Ruddier Than the Cherry" from "Acis and Galatea," sung by Malcolm McEachern. On a Victor single ($1.50) are two ancient liturgical melodies in orchestral arrangements by Stokowski which go beyond anything Stokowski has done thus far in artistic defacement.

Having neglected jazz recently, I will mention that one of the finest jazz records ever made, "Blues of Israel," available only on English Parlophone, is to be had at the Commodore Music Shop, 144 East Forty-second Street, New York, where you will find other good things in that field that cannot be obtained elsewhere.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Censorship, Chicago Style

Dear Sirs: In reply to the prayer of D. J. Rolfs for a decent newspaper in Chicago, printed in your letter columns some weeks ago, I wish to point out three facts, probably known to newspaper publishers but not to readers, in general.

First, there is a city ordinance in Chicago limiting the size of newsstands. The purpose of this ordinance is to keep newspapers that are not wanted off the stands. It does not interfere with the sale of foreign-language papers or racing-information sheets, but the moment an attempt was made to put a new paper on the stands the law would be enforced. The ordinance also limits the sale of papers at a newsstand to those published in Chicago.

Second, the newsboys of Chicago are organized into an association. The association is controlled by the newspapers, and its members would therefore refuse to handle an additional newspaper although it would mean more revenue to the newsboys themselves. This would seriously restrict the distribution of a new paper.

Third, a new paper would have to cope with gang warfare and terrorism if it would establish itself. Gangsters were imported into Chicago for the first time in the circulation wars of the Tribune and Herald and Examiner, and there is no warrant for the belief that the morals of newspaper owners have undergone a change for the better since that day.

Is it any wonder that Chicago journalism is what it is?
F. L.
Chicago, December 20

The "Sitdown" and the I.W.W.

Dear Sirs: Louis Adamic, in writing of the sitdown, refers to the I. W. W. in a manner which I resent. "It probably is a sort of development," he says, "of the I. W. W. 'folded-arm strike' and of 'striking on the job'; only it is better, manlier than the latter, which required men to pretend they were working, and to accomplish as little as possible without being discharged, which was more fatiguing than to work according to one's capacity, as well as contrary to the natural inclinations of the best class of workers [italics mine]."

The I. W. W. during the war years and those that followed the war (I have no direct knowledge of the after years, having been "retired from circulation") were not restricted as to the method to gain their ends. The "sitdown strike" would have accomplished nothing in the areas in which the I. W. W. were particularly active during the war, such as the logging industry, where if you had "sat down" the bosses would have let you sit and starve; or a large construction outfit such as Stone and Webster, where the work was often several miles from camp; or railroad work, where the same conditions applied. As for manliness, I maintain that one had to be very much of a man to belong to the I.W.W. What does Adamic mean by the best class of workers? Doesn't he know that the roughnecks in the woods, in the iron mines, in the coal mines are absolutely essential, or the "sitters" would have nothing to "sit" at?

Incidentally I think it was the roughnecks that led the way in the matter when a number of transients, of which I had the honor to be one, took possession of the committee room of the FERA office here at Madison in March, 1935, in order to enforce their demands, and also ordered a steak dinner and charged it to the officials of the FERA. We "sat and sang" until the officials consented to see us. It ill becomes the writer of "Dynamite" to cast aspersions on those who afforded him so much material for that book.

JOHN ANDERSON
Madison, Wis., December 18

The Soviet Constitution

Dear Sirs: Few things are more amazing in this amazing time of ours than the misinterpretation of the new constitution of the Soviet Union in a large part of the English-speaking world—particularly in its liberal part.

When one discusses the matter with honest and sincere Communists, everything is clear and intelligible from the beginning. Of course they are proud of the achievements of the nineteen years of the Bolshevik Revolution, and they regard the new constitution as a proof of these achievements. Of course they will talk to you for hours about "Soviet democracy," which they maintain to be "a million times more democratic than any bourgeois democracy"; for this is their honest and sincere belief, learned from Lenin himself, though as a matter of fact it does not become less doubtful by his high authority. But of course they only laugh, and very heartily, at the idea that this "Soviet democracy" even in the new constitution diminishes in any way the cleavage between the Soviet Union and the Western world, or that the dictatorship of the proletariat, which in reality is the dictatorship of their party, will be weakened to any extent by this new constitution. Of course this dictatorship will last under the new constitution just as it has lasted under the old ones. There is no doubt whatever about that. This fact is expressed with all possible clearness in the document itself. It is only some liberal, social-democratic interpreters who attempt to deny it.

A mention of the two points most frequently misinterpreted will suffice here to make this evident:

1. The new constitution (Article 134) enlarges the electoral rights, grants universal, equal, and direct suffrage by secret ballot. Isn't this the true realization of the old, venerated democratic ideal? It is not! For while the suffrage is given to the citizens—just as it has remained unchanged, on paper, in the Italian and German dictatorships—the right to nominate candidates is (Article 141) reserved to the Communist Party or to organizations under its control. It is not necessary to quote all the other passages of the new constitution which also secure the predominance of the dictatorial party. This one device of controlling the nomination of the candidates for the universal, equal, direct, and secret franchise is sufficient. It is exactly the device used by the fascist dictatorships in Italy (see the law of 1928) and in Germany. It makes a mockery of the democratic franchise.

2. Sidney Webb, in The Nation of November 21, quoted, as other liberals are always doing, Article 125, which—without the unfortunately usual omissions—reads as follows: "In conformity with the interests of the toilers, and in order to strengthen the socialist system, the citizens of the U. S. S. R. are guaran-

WHO IS PAYING FOR AMERICAN FASCISM?

GEORGE SELDES, crack reporter and author, gives you inside facts never before revealed. Where does the money come from? Who are the Fascists? Who pulls the strings? How much is spent? And what is it spent for?

HARRY F. WARD, National Chairman of The American League Against War and Fascism, gives the real story behind the German-Japanese treaty. Is there now a Fascist International? Is it bent on War? When? Where?

GET THE FACTS IN The Fight

JANUARY ISSUE

America's Anti-War, Anti-Fascist Magazine That Prints All the Facts

THE two remarkable articles described above are not special features, though they would be in almost any other magazine. They are typical of the contents you will find in THE FIGHT every month.

The most important, best informed writers and newspaper men publish in THE FIGHT the articles that other papers or magazines refuse to print. In the last issues these names appeared over specially written articles:

George Seldes, Sherwood Anderson, John L. Lewis, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Mauritz A. Hallgren, Sylvia Townsend Warner, Heywood Broun, Dr. George A. Coe, Emily Green Balch, Matthew Josephson, H. C. Engelbrecht, Marion Cuthbert, Robert Morss Lovett, Agnes Smedley, Oscar Ameringer, Rose M. Stein, Martin Anderson Nexø.

THE FIGHT is a large, beautifully illustrated five-color magazine. It brings you the best work of top notch writers and the finest illustrators. It tells you what the Fascists and warmongers are doing here and abroad . . . and it tells you what is being done to stop them.

It appears monthly. Thirty pages or more. And nearly forty thousand readers get it every month. Yet it does not cost five dollars a year . . . nor three dollars a year. The coupon below will bring you a full year of THE FIGHT for a single dollar! Almost four hundred giant pages for a dollar! Act now!

NOT $5. NOT $3. BUT $1

THE FIGHT

268 Fourth Avenue, Room 701, New York City

I enclose $1.00 for a year's subscription to THE FIGHT.

Name

Address

City State.....

NI

teed freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and of holding mass-meetings, freedom of street processions and demonstrations. These rights of the citizens are insured by placing at the disposal of the toilers and their organizations printing presses, supplies of paper, public buildings, the streets, means of communication, and other material requisites for the exercise of these rights." And to this Mr. Webb adds, "Truly a unique and unprecedented conception of public freedom."

Truly, it is neither unique nor unprecedented—nor is it freedom. For exactly the same provisions, only more lengthily worded, are already to be found in the first Russian constitution of July 10, 1918, in Lenin's famous "Declaration of the rights of the toiling and exploited peoples" (Section 1, Article 2, No. 14 and 15). There is nothing new in the new constitution in this respect. And therefore there will be after the acceptance of the new constitution no greater freedom of speech, of the press, and of assembly than there has been until now. That is to say, there will be no freedom at all except under the strict control of the dictatorial party and its dictatorial rulers.

I could easily quote a dozen or more similar frequent misinterpretations—all of them to be disproved in exactly the same way by simply referring to the uncontested documents and to the uncontested facts that ought to be known to everyone who speaks publicly about these matters. No honest and sincere Communist will disagree. But the amazing question remains: Why are liberal writers, more than others, so anxious to prove that the Bolsheviks are what they neither want nor claim to be, namely, democrats in the old Western sense of the word?

ARTHUR FEILER

New York, December 20

Age of Innocence

Dear Sirs: Mr. Edman's poem on the perverted use of such innocent word as left and right, red and white, and his sigh for the past impels me to a friendly indorsement:

I sigh for the days when many a word
Was linked to all we had always heard,
When "fairy" spelt charm and "pansy"
a plant

And "Fanny" was only the name of your aunt.

HELEN SALZ

San Francisco, December 16

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, whose mysterious silence for three weeks caused his many readers in this country considerable anxiety, is still on the job and very much alive, as his article indicates. At present he is on a brief visit to Geneva, but expects shortly to return to Spain.

LAWRENCE WESTBROOK, formerly assistant administrator of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, is now chairman of the Advisory Board of the WPA.

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's Paris correspondent, has lived abroad, principally in France, for the past eight years. His articles on European politics and on current events in the French capital have made him familiar to readers of The Nation and other periodicals.

ROSCOE FLEMING, a reporter for the Denver Rocky Mountain News, recently went to Lincoln to make a first-hand study of Nebraska politics and of the problems involved in setting up this country's first unicameral, non-partisan legislature.

BERTRAND RUSSELL defies labeling and is so well known he hardly needs it. An Englishman, a philosopher, a mathematician, a physicist, he has written books on many diverse subjects, including marriage, relativity, China, the conquest of happiness, and American history.

CARL BECKER, professor of history at Cornell University and former president of the American Historical Association, is the distinguished author of many works on American and European history, among them "The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers," "The Declaration of Independence," and "Progress and Power."

JAMES WATERMAN WISE, formerly editor of Opinion, is the author of "Nazism: An Assault on Civilization." He has just returned from Brazil, which he visited as a delegate of the Joint Committee for the Defense of the Brazilian People.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 16, 1937

NUMBER 3

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

PEACE WITHOUT VICTORY

MOROCCO FRONT

A PROGRAM FOR RELIEF

CAN MADRID HOLD ON? by Louis Fischer

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

DETROIT DIGS IN by Edward Levinson

THE PACIFIST'S DILEMMA by Norman Thomas

THE GUILD INVADES CHICAGO

by Milton S. Mayer

BIRTH CONTROL WINS by Hannah M. Stone

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

BROUN'S PAGE

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

A MODEST PROPOSAL by Joseph Wood Krutch

LEGEND AND REALITY by Raymond Weaver

MAN'S WORLDLY GOODS by Walton H. Hamilton

TWO SMALL BOOKS by William Troy

THE MAKING OF A BOSTON BRAHMAN

by Dorothy Van Doren

THE END OF NIJINSKY by Ruth Pickering

DRAMA: OTHELLO by Joseph Wood Krutch

FILMS: MUSCLE MOVIES by Mark Van Doren

The Shape of Things

★

THE REVIVAL OF THE BRITISH FOREIGN Enlistment Act of 1870 is a clear example of unneutral behavior under the guise of "neutrality." As the act stands it apparently applies only to persons seeking to enlist for military service with the rebels. Penalties are imposed on anyone who accepts or who agrees to accept "any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any foreign state at peace with His Majesty." The fascist forces in Spain are clearly a "foreign state" within the meaning of the act, but since they have not been recognized by London they cannot be described as a state at peace with His Majesty. Thus the government apparently stretched a point in applying the law to volunteers supporting Madrid. Incidentally, the same law exists in the Irish Free State, and it will be extremely interesting to see whether De Valera makes an effort to curb the activities of General O'Duffy and the recruiting of Irish fascists for service with Mola's armies in the northern part of Spain. It happens that several of these Irish contingents set sail from Liverpool and as British "subjects" could have been detained if the government had so desired. The British precedent is especially disheartening in view of the pressure being brought in this country to prevent Americans from going to the support of Spain. No protest has ever been made when Americans enrolled themselves in the service of petty dictators in any part of the world; it is scarcely credible that anyone should propose restrictions at a moment when democracy is endangered by the illegal intervention of Hitler and Mussolini.

★

GENERAL MOTORS IS NOW STANDING PAT, "awaiting developments" in the automobile strike and counting, among other things, on public support. What the company means is that it is waiting for the United Automobile Workers and the Committee for Industrial Organization to exhaust their resources against the financial stone wall of General Motors, a corporation dominated by the du Ponts and J. P. Morgan. Meanwhile it is busy rousing public opinion by accusing the workers of "trying to run the business" and refusing to negotiate until the sitdown strikers leave the plants. At the same time it self-righteously refuses to promise that certain essential machinery will not be moved if the sitdown strikers evacuate, although, as Mr. Levinson points out

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

elsewhere in this issue, the union has every reason to insist on such a promise in writing. Behind the scenes the giant corporation is stirring up anti-union sentiment among all those innocent bystanders in the automobile towns whose pocket-books are affected. Behind the scenes General Motors is also conspiring with its brother giants in coal and steel and glass to engage the C. I. O. in a series of nation-wide strikes to sap its energy.

*

AT ANY MOMENT THE COLLAPSE OF PEACE negotiations in Detroit will send the automobile controversy to the White House. Then public opinion will become even more important than it is now. If only for selfish reasons it should be thrown to the side of labor. General Motors could still make large profits and at the same time help to stabilize recovery, especially for the little man, by increasing the purchasing power of its employees 25 per cent. Weekly earnings in the automobile industry for November, a big production month, are given as $36.16, with an hourly average of 79.3 cents. These figures, however, disguise the true picture. In 1934, when the hourly rate was 70 cents an hour, the average annual wage was less than $900, or $17.50 a week. Only one-third of the workers in the industry worked throughout the year. The hourly wage is higher at present and production has been spread over a longer period, but the automobile worker's annual earnings are far below the amount necessary for a decent standard of living. They are also far below the industry's capacity to pay.

*

MR. ROOSEVELT'S ASSURANCES THAT NONE of the needy would be dropped from the relief rolls seem hardly to be borne out in his letter on relief asking $790,000,000 for relief during the remainder of the fiscal year and suggesting a maximum of $1,853,000,000 to cover all expenses for recovery and relief in 1938. The Conference of Mayors had set $877,500,000 as the minimum needed by the WPA until the end of June. Since part of the $790,000,000 will presumably go to the Resettlement Administration, it is estimated that the WPA will get about $500,000,000, which will mean dropping some 800,000 persons. In his budget message the President asked for 1938 only about 65 per cent of the amount required during the past year for recovery and relief—a "saving" of approximately a billion dollars. But at the same time he requested an additional $100,000,000 for armaments, an increase of $60,000,000 for civil departments and agencies, and a somewhat larger sum for his agricultural program. The theory that reduced unemployment will bring a corresponding decrease in relief requirements has proved entirely unsound so far. In a protracted depression the resources of the unemployed become increasingly depleted, and any effort to force a sudden curtailment in relief rolls would leave the jobless in a more serious plight than they were in back in 1932. WPA workers have no alternative but to organize and bring such mass pressure as they can command on the Administration.

LEON TROTSKY'S ARRIVAL IN MEXICO HAS brought a troublesome problem to a country that is more accustomed to trouble than was his last place of refuge. The Mexican government will find it easier than did Norway to withstand pressure from Moscow to drive Trotsky out, first because Mexico is comfortably remote from the Soviet Union and second because it has no diplomatic relations with the Soviet government to guard against upset. Even so, the privilege of serving as asylum for Russia's most famous exile may well prove an exacting one. The Mexican government has announced that it intends to put no curbs on Trotsky's freedom of movement; and he, in turn, has promised to engage in no political activities. But even assuming complete sincerity and good-will on both sides, a peaceful sojourn is hardly to be expected. Mexico's Communists and certain labor groups which bitterly opposed Trotsky's admission to the country will do their best to make his stay a casus belli, although they have been ordered to refrain from demonstrations, while his own partisans are not to be counted upon to smooth his path.

*

WILL 1937 FINALLY SEE RATIFICATION OF THE federal child-labor amendment? President Roosevelt's direct appeal to the governors of non-ratifying states, echoed by the voice from Palo Alto, spurs on the drive to get the assent of the twelve more states necessary to make the amendment law. More than 100,000 children were withdrawn from industry and sent back to school under the NRA. But in the first five months of 1936, as compared with the same period in 1935, child labor increased 150 per cent. A poll taken by the American Institute of Public Opinion came out 61 per cent in favor of the amendment and showed that in all but three of the states where ratification has been defeated the people are opposed to the action of their legislatures. Objection to the amendment is due partly to the fear that "limit, regulate, and prohibit" gives Congress too sweeping a power and means an invasion of states' rights. But most of it comes from manufacturers who employ children.

*

THE BULLY OF BERLIN TOOK A LITTLE TIME off from his hilarious game of scaring the daylights out of France and Great Britain to annoy the doughty Queen of the Netherlands, Wilhelmina, whose daughter Juliana has just married a German prince. This German prince, Bernhard zu Lippe-Biesterfeld, says he "feels Hollandish" and has shown all too plainly that he prefers the well-kept, butter-fed household of Wilhelmina and the sunny disposition of Juliana to the madhouse of Adolf, where the national slogan is "Let 'em eat cannon" and the obscene "Horst Wessel" song rings incessantly through the fascist darkness. For this sin the Nazi press conducted a journalistic pogrom against the Prince and his adopted country, complaining because the Nazi flag was not flown during the festivities and because the prince felt that no "foreign [i.e., German] national anthem" should be played in his honor. The Gestapo entered the game and held up the passports of four innocent German princesses who had been chosen as bridesmaids. Under pressure passports were issued to three of the princesses who presently found themselves stranded on the border with only four dollars apiece. Queen Wilhelmina rescued the princesses. After that she rolled up her sleeves and wrote a note to the Nazi government. The wedding came off in all its anticipated splendor; and Queen Wilhelmina received the congratulations of Hitler even though an orchestra conductor had refused to play the "Horst Wessel" song.

★

WE CANNOT MOURN GLENN FRANK'S PASSING as president of the University of Wisconsin, nor can we join the new alliance of Hearst and the respectable press in deploring the action of the Board of Regents. The whole episode has been instructive in revealing the tie-up between the press and the business interests and the way this tie-up ramifies into American higher education. There can be no doubt that the regents exercised their legitimate powers. What still remains unclear is Governor La Follette's role in the affair. It is difficult to see how he could have hoped to gain politically by engineering, as it is charged, an anti-Frank movement among the regents. If he was part of such a movement, it could have been only at the risk of his own political fortunes and in pursuance of the ideas of progressivism with which the La Follettes have been associated. Whether or not the case had its origin in politics, it is clear that it is now being used as a means of sideswiping the whole farmer-labor progressive movement. The present talk in Madison about a joint move by Democrats and Republicans in the state legislature to put the Governor on the spot is part of a wider campaign to smear a national progressive movement by attacking the La Follette leadership. The campaign will fail, but it is a foretaste of what Progressives may expect when the issue involved is more than a teapot.

★

AN ITALIAN HOLLYWOOD WILL BE THE NEXT goldfish bowl to come out of the hat of Europe's chief prestidigitator. Not content with making an empire grow where a kingdom stood before, Mussolini intends to make a cinema city sprout on the arid plains of Quadraro, on the road to Frascati, just south of Rome. Already, we learn from the Swedish journal, Stockholms Tidningen, thousands of workmen are laying the foundations of ten huge studios, two lakes for marine scenes, and streets, houses, public squares, even villages, which will be built in imitation of everything from New York to Novosibirsk. Meanwhile Roncoroni, a well-known Italian movie star, has gone to Hollywood to recruit talent among directors, actors, and writers, and Walter Wanger, an American director who has demonstrated his love for fascism, is in Italy drawing up studio plans under the expert supervision of Il Duce himself. By the end of 1937 Italy will have the most Complete, Tremendous, Colossal, Super-Film Center in Europe.

Peace Without Victory

THREE conclusions emerge from Mr. Roosevelt's message to Congress. One is that, despite his overwhelming victory in the election, he does not intend in the next four years to follow up the gains made in the past four years. Another is that the New Deal has evolved no new points of view, has not clarified its economic thinking, has produced no new techniques for improving or controlling the social system. We may pretty much expect the Administration to go back to its earlier program, that which prevailed in the period before the Supreme Court began its career of devastation. The third conclusion is that on the most important issue before the country today—that of the Supreme Court and the Constitution—Mr. Roosevelt intends to select, of the courses open, the most conservative.

To be sure, there was still a hazy liberalism hovering about the message, as in the old days. But as Harold Laski has shown in "The Rise of Liberalism," there has never been any incompatibility between the capitalist position and the so-called liberal outlook. Mr. Roosevelt, with his program of large professions for the welfare of the common man and the smallest possible concessions by the rulers of industry, is the crowning proof of Mr. Laski's thesis. It is no accident that the reactionary and conservative press now joins with the Administration papers in hailing Mr. Roosevelt's message.

What does the message actually say? It says we must have some sort of labor legislation, a farm-tenancy law, some amendments to the Social Security Act, and some control of the speculative market. It says, more vaguely, that the government must still find a remedy for unemployment, that federal rather than state action is required for labor and agricultural legislation, that oligarchies breed militarism and democracies peace. It says, above all, that the Supreme Court must behave itself and not upset the apple-cart of liberal legislation.

The way in which Mr. Roosevelt handled the issue of the Supreme Court and the Constitution is the final proof of the trend of his policy. To many he will appear courageous for daring to read a lecture to the justices at all. But considering the temper of Congress and the country on this issue, considering the avalanche of bills ready to be introduced that would do almost everything to the justices short of deporting them to General Franco's army, Mr. Roosevelt's words were calculated not to channel this energy into political results but to dampen the ardor of what the newspaper editors like to call "the Congressional hotheads." There were four courses of action open on this issue. One, the most conservative, was to wait for the court to pass on the important cases to come, meanwhile warn it of the need for a liberal and human construction of the Constitution, and ultimately hope for a chance to fill court vacancies with liberals. A second was to conclude from the record of the last eighteen months that the present court would continue to prove an obstruction to any sensible social program, and proceed to enlarge it with new appointments. A third was to conclude that any group of nine former corporation lawyers is likely to contain a majority of fossils and therefore to give Congress in one way or another power to override the court's veto. A fourth was to leave the court alone, but clarify Congressional power by a constitutional amendment.

Mr. Roosevelt has chosen the first and most conservative approach. That he has done so should occasion little surprise. Mr. Roosevelt is the Great Equilibrator. His idea of the function of government is to effect an equilibrium between the contending social pressures so as to preserve in a healthy state the broad outlines of the existing system. To do this he is not averse to playing one side against the other. In his first administration he used the left to frighten the industrialists into making concessions. But now he is himself a bit frightened at the swing of opinion to the left, and not a little overcome by the extent of his own electoral victory. He does not want to push his social program any farther. He wants to go back to the old NRA—stripped of some of its faults—and the old AAA. He wants to finish such unfinished business as housing and farm tenancy. But there he wants to stop. He wants the Supreme Court to grow less relentless, so that the old program can be restored. But he does not want to curb the judicial power as such. He knows that for the Supreme Court to learn how to behave will be a long and tedious process, dragging out perhaps through his whole second administration, and serving to control its pace. If the judicial power were curbed, or if there were a clear constitutional amendment, the barriers would be down, and a genuine program of socialization of industry might be enacted. At this prospect Mr. Roosevelt shrinks back in horror. Hence he asks the justices to become enlightened, thereby leaving the essential power of the court untouched—ready to be used whenever necessary to block radical advance.

This is the meaning of Mr. Roosevelt's message. This is why the ruling groups in America are rejoicing over it. Mr. Roosevelt has chosen to make with them a peace without victory.

Morocco Front

FROM this distance it is difficult to pass judgment on the French reports of Nazi engineers and technicians at Melilla, Tetuan, and Ceuta in Spanish Morocco. There is a strong possibility that the accusations are exaggerated. They may even be deliberately concocted to prepare the public for a shift in French policy which has been found necessary for other reasons. But genuine or not, they are of great political significance. The mere rumor of German activity in Morocco will do more to arouse France and England to the significance of fascist control in Spain than any amount of direct assistance to the rebels on the Continent. The French defense program is based on the assumption that a substantial number of colonial troops can be rushed to the mother country in the event of a German attack. It is probable that British military commitments to France also rest on that assumption. Thus a strong German base in Spanish Morocco which would delay French African reinforcements for several days might prove a decisive factor in the conflict now believed to be inevitable. While there is no confirmation of the report that the Germans have begun to fortify Ceuta, across the straits from Gibraltar, the British have every reason to be frightened at the possibility since a battery of heavy guns at this point could close the Mediterranean to British shipping. The chances are that both France and Britain would risk war rather than see the Germans established at the gateway to the Mediterranean.

In the meantime, the possibility of a joint blockade of the Iberian peninsula is once more being seriously proposed. While the suggestion smacks of the old-fashioned custom of bolting the garage door after the family car has been stolen, it might not yet be too late if prompt and energetic action were taken. The chances are that neither Hitler nor Mussolini is any more anxious for a general war on the Spanish issue than they were two weeks ago, when it appeared for a fleeting instant as if they were backing down. But they apparently have decided to stake everything on a desperate assault on Madrid, in the belief that the city may be captured before French and British pressure can become effective. At present their judgment appears dubious despite the fact that the German and Italian troops landed in the last two weeks outnumber Madrid's international column at least two to one and possess far superior equipment. At this writing the ferocious push of the rebels, assisted by thousands of "blond Moors," seems to have been repulsed.

Germany and Italy will undoubtedly seek to attach impossible conditions to any proposal to enforce a blockade, with a view to drawing out negotiations as long as possible. In fact, the chances are overwhelmingly against an effective blockade ever being arranged. This does not necessarily mean, however, that the fascists will triumph by default as they have in every major issue in recent years. There are at least two rays of hope on an otherwise black horizon. One is the possibility that Germany has overreached itself in Morocco, in which case France may be aroused to the point of challenging Hitler. A complete break-down of the non-intervention agreement, with open support for the Spanish government from all non-fascist countries, would undoubtedly be the quickest way to liquidate Hitler's adventure in Spain. There is also hope that the loyalists may be able to hold out, with or without Madrid, despite the enormous reinforcements sent by Hitler and Mussolini. After all, the Spaniards are an intensely patriotic people, and the presence of the Germans has evidently done more to unify the populace on the side of the government than any development since the beginning of the war. In the long run it may be found that 30,000 or even 100,000 foreign troops are not enough to conquer Spain. It is said that history never repeats itself. But the present generation has witnessed a second retreat from Moscow; and it may live to see a second Baylen if Hitler, like Napoleon, continues to look upon the Spanish people as mere pawns to further his political ambitions.

A Program for Relief

WE ARE pleased that the President has given definite assurance that no individuals in need of relief will be dropped from the rolls of the WPA during the present fiscal year. At the very least, this indicates that the Administration is aware that relief is still a desperate problem. While unemployment is considerable lower than at any time in the past five years, between nine and ten million men and women are still without work. A large proportion of these persons have been out of a job so long that they have completely exhausted their resources. Many have become unemployable for physical or psychological reasons. Others have lost their skill and are not likely to be absorbed in private industry unless they can be rehabilitated or fitted to perform other types of work.

It is true that the emergency period for relief has passed. The situation confronting the President today contrasts sharply with that of March 4, 1933. Then it was a matter of somehow getting food to the hungry, and of devising means of safeguarding self-respect in the process. Efficiency and economy were distinctly of secondary importance. Today, at the threshold of the President's second term, the time has arrived for the shaping of a permanent policy. After an economic dislocation as severe as that which the country has just passed through, there is bound to be an abnormal demand for relief for many years. The states are not equipped to deal with the problem. It must be met by federal action.

While the WPA is in many ways more satisfactory than any of its predecessors, it should be evident that no organization of this type can have a place in a permanent federal program. It is tremendously costly for the amount of actual assistance given. Much of the work carried out by the WPA would be indefensible except as a relief measure. If the projects are defensible, there is no reason why the workers should not have full-time jobs at standard wages. Nor does the WPA represent a satisfactory technique of relief. Its "security wage" involves an actual hardship on large families. Moreover, there are hundreds of thousands of men fully entitled to WPA jobs who, because of the recentness of their unemployment or for other reasons, have been thrown upon the mercies of state or local relief. This varies from an average of approximately $36 a month per family in New York to well under $10 in many Southern states.

Any form of relief is distasteful as a permanent policy, since of necessity it carries with it the stigma of charity. Far more satisfactory, obviously, would be a system of social insurance that provided adequate and regular benefits. But neither the Social Security Act nor any legislation that is likely to be enacted by the present Congress even approaches that goal.

The 3,000 hunger marchers now converging on Washington will do much good if they merely dramatize the size of the problem of relief.

There is nothing more pernicious than the tradition that the local community should look after its own unfortunates. The fact is that many states and local communities are financially unable to do so. In many communities there are serious legal and constitutional obstacles to obtaining the necessary funds. The federal government, on the other hand, has several sources of income which are practically untapped.

The first consideration of a long-range relief program should be adequate assistance for all the needy, regardless of what caused their distress or where they live. This might be achieved either by a straight federal program or a joint federal-state plan under which the federal government could aid states unable to carry their burden. Experience has shown that standards must be fixed, as far as possible, by the federal government, while administration is often best carried out locally. Government employment projects should be continued only if their utility is beyond question. This should not mean a reduction in the so-called white-collar projects. On the contrary, the federal theater and art projects are undoubtedly among the most desirable of all WPA undertakings. But eligibility should be based, as in private industry, on ability rather than need. Wages, conditions of work, and the right of organization should be precisely the same as for private employment.

Simultaneously, there should be built up a truly adequate public employment service such as already exists in many of the leading industrial countries of the world. This would imply, at the outset, a complete census of unemployment and the establishment of an extensive program of training and rehabilitation. Such a program would undoubtedly be costly, although probably no more so than the present uneconomic WPA. It is necessary if a large section of American manhood is not to be permanently robbed of the right to earn a living.

OUR RELIEF PROGRAM

1. Relief must be adequate for all the needy regardless of the cause of their distress.
2. In order to provide this, the federal and state governments should assume joint responsibility.
3. Work projects should be continued only when socially and economically defensible, and should provide full-time work at standard wages and conditions.
4. The federal government should establish an employment service, undertake a census of the unemployed, and initiate a program of vocational rehabilitation.

LIBRARY
PUBLIC
LIT.

Can Madrid Hold On?

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Valencia, January 10

I LEFT Madrid on December 7 and Spain on December 9 to fly to Geneva for the special Spanish session of the League Council. Thereafter I spent a week in Paris and eight days in Moscow and then flew back to Barcelona, where I arrived January 6. I have now been in the Spanish capital four days, in which time I have interviewed Prime Minister Caballero, four members of the federal Cabinet, a number of party leaders, and several well-informed generals.

Having thus obtained a bird's-eye view of the international situation which I can today coordinate with my information on Spanish internal politics and the military position, I feel that the Republican outlook holds no cause for alarm. The general sentiment of my informants is that the loyalists will win, though estimates of the duration of the civil war run as high as two years.

Around Madrid these last ten days the enemy concentrated all his forces. Every available man, machine-gun, and cannon was brought to the Madrid front with the quick mobility which distinguishes Franco's excellent army. Practically all the rebel airplanes—and in number they far exceed those of the government—could be seen in the skies above sadly riddled Madrid. Nevertheless, the progress made was incommensurate with the effort. Madrid itself is not imperiled even by this gigantic, carefully prepared offensive which is sapping Franco's strength. Experts doubt whether he will in the near future essay the herculean task of attacking the city itself, where he must take barricade after barricade.

On the other hand, the Republican army is considerably improved. Its new units have given a good account of themselves under fire, and it is hoped that those which follow will imitate their example. The Republicans find comfort, too, in international developments. Germany's act in sending troops—nobody knows how many—and Italy's violation of the spirit if not the letter of its gentlemen's agreement with England by likewise landing military units at Cadiz appear to have had a disquieting effect on France and England. But something else is disturbing the British and the French even more than these grave events. Caballero told me today that the Germans have placed guns of forty-two-centimeter caliber in Ceuta in Morocco, and that they are fortifying Melilla. The high command at Gibraltar has received orders to stand by, and French and British naval units are held in readiness to steam into the Mediterranean danger zone. Morocco, as in the pre-war period, is again the apple of discord, and the same powers are maneuvering for advantage. London and Paris are apparently convinced at last that Germany is not merely aiding its fellow-fascist, Franco, but playing for much higher stakes, which, if won, will partly determine the outcome of the next Armageddon. France has indicated a slightly more favorable attitude toward loyalist Spain by allowing airplanes recently purchased in America to pass through its territory. But greater assistance must be granted if the balance is to be weighted against the fascist constellation. What is required is a blockade of the Iberian peninsula—not of Spain alone. If Spain and Portugal were hermetically sealed today against all war materials and men, the Spanish government would be victorious within six months. I believe Paris would look with favor on such a blockade, but hitherto England and France have had a working agreement to do nothing in Spain, and because of Blum's weak political position the initiative must come from England. Perhaps a threat to Gibraltar will produce that initiative. Germany is too weak to fight. If Great Britain called "Halt!" Hitler would mend his behavior unwillingly and Mussolini happily.

Essentially, however, the Spanish Republic must trust only its own strength and Russia's friendship. If the Western democracies help, that will be fine, like an unexpected gift, but England and France are split personalities. From the class standpoint these two countries should be opposed to the Spanish Republic, from the nationalistic standpoint they should be for it. Heretofore class interests have been predominant, and we have witnessed the example of the bourgeoisie being unready to defend empires. The capitalist bias makes them objectively unpatriotic. This attitude may be changed by the crudity of German-Italian procedure, but I would not be surprised to see a move to eliminate Hitler and Mussolini followed by an attempt to democratize Franco similar to that made in the summer of 1919, when the big five in Paris endeavored to dress up Admiral Kolchak in democratic clothes.

The republic's resources in the form of Russian aid and domestic supplies are far from exhausted. Indeed, both sources are just being scratched. Moscow is now sending cotton for Barcelona's textile factories and grain for the queue-ridden cities—these are supplementary to other materials. Industrially and financially the republic is infinitely more powerful than the rebels, whose territory is eaten up with disaffection; entire brigades of loyalists exist like islands in Franco's land. The government's greatest element of strength is the hearty support of the population, which it is to be hoped will not be undermined by foolish, premature economic experiments by so-called revolutionists afflicted with infantile leftism at a time when the country requires a government policy which will antagonize no one. Moreover, added energy could be obtained by eliminating friction between the parties of the popular front.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, January 10

THE week past has produced forceful proofs that the Supreme Court is not the least democratic of our government's three branches and that both the executive and the legislative are its peers if not its superiors in distrusting the people who support them. President Roosevelt's message to Congress was filled with undemocratic adoration of the democratic process; he bespoke his love of the common people and his trust in their ability to choose wisely the nation's proper course of action on all issues. But he did not trust them enough to lay before them a clear statement of his own intentions, nor did he respect them enough to submit himself to the discipline of having to prepare a complete and rounded program for their benefit. Furthermore, he followed up his message on the state of the nation with a budget message that was insolent in its attempted deceptions; what he presented as a budget that "only captious accountants" would say was not balanced was a budget actually no more in balance than the last. The pretense of equilibrium between income and outgo was achieved by a cruel whittling of proposed relief appropriations and the omission of other appropriations that Congress is almost certain to vote. A group of progressives led by Senator Bone has served notice that they will fight to increase appropriations for relief. The record peacetime appropriation for munitions and armaments that Roosevelt proposed offers them a talking-point of which they have not availed themselves as yet.

Congress's exhibition of no faith in the electorate was less obvious than the President's. It made its appearance in some forty bills and resolutions aimed ostensibly at hampering or stopping the Supreme Court in performing the duty intrusted to it by the Founding Fathers, the duty of standing as the last indomitable bulwark against attempts by the people to govern themselves as they, the people, think best. But none of these bills or resolutions was designed to achieve complete freedom for the democratic process. Their authors, while prating of their respect for the will of the masses, apparently feared either to give that will free rein or to trust the electorate to know its own mind.

The measures themselves were merely the froth on the ferment of constitutional reform now brewing noisily in Washington. Two meetings on this theme were sponsored here in the last few days by Richard W. Hogue and his Independent Legislative Research Bureau. They were heavily attended by federal officials and members of Congress. The presence at both of that lethargic conservative, Senator Bulkley, and the impassioned speech in behalf of constitutional amendment made at one by that tory Democrat, Senator Adams, were impressive evidence of the depth and breadth of the interest in the theme.

The major product of these meetings, however, was overwhelming proof that the Congress now organizing for business here is ready to take any step toward constitutional reform the White House will permit, that there is tremendous confusion and disagreement as to the precise nature of the step or steps that should be taken, and that leadership, plus crystallization of a definite plan of action, is all that is needed. In the near future an attempt to achieve such crystallization and to provide the necessary impetus and leadership is to be made here by the calling of a national conference to which all persons who might conceivably be interested or helpful will be invited. The group of laymen and lawyers who for months have been laying plans for the conference are, for strategical reasons, keeping their identities hidden for the present. For weeks and weeks they have been angling in roundabout diplomatic fashion to get Senator Norris to take the chairmanship of the conference. Approached by a forthright and undiplomatic reporter here yesterday, Senator Norris said he would be glad to take the job.

Among those who have added their voices publicly in the last few days to the clamor over constitutional reform are Senator Ashurst, who promised that his Senate Judiciary Committee will hold hearings on his proposed amendment giving Congress "power to make laws to regulate agriculture, commerce, industry, and labor"; John L. Lewis, who announced his willingness to back any "sound" program and added that he deduced from the President's message that the White House is against constitutional amendment and is considering other remedies; Senator Black, who proposed that every conceivable remedy including amendment be tried at one and the same time; Merle Vincent, former NRA official and unsuccessful candidate for Senator Costigan's seat, who proposed as an essential beginning the conference route with Senator Norris as chairman; Senator O'Mahoney, who proposed his own bill with its four-point attempt to fool the Supreme Court; Representative Lewis of Maryland, the House's "Old Integrity," who suggested defying the court by repassing measures it holds unconstitutional; and Senator Norris, who, directing his fire at judicial tenure and limitation of appellate jurisdiction, reminded his hearers that, even if the Supreme Court be tamed, the minor judiciary will remain in position to do incalculable harm and therefore must be tamed along with the rest.

The talk wanders over an enormous variety of proposals, which have for their lowest common denominator an implicit if unspoken belief on the part of nearly all the foes of judicial usurpation of the legislative power that a clear and sweeping amendment of the Constitution would not meet with the approval of the electorate. Those who do not take that view seem to be mired in the belief that there is such a thing as giving the people too much power. They believe the majority should rule but only if the majority rules as they—and they include radicals and conservatives, plutocrats and intelligentsia—think best. They do not want the majority left free to pass a Tydings-McCormack military-disaffection bill if it wants to, or to decree that all professing Communists shall be guillotined; and quite plainly they fear that the majority, unchained, would do just that sort of thing. They love and trust the masses, but with limitations, and these limitations differ only in degree from those that animated the Founding Fathers.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The closest approach thus far made to a truly democratic remedy is a proposal that Morris Ernst put forward at the second of Mr. Hogue's meetings. The principal speaker at the gathering at which John Lewis and Senator Norris also spoke, Ernst prefaced his proposal with a brilliant autopsy of the Constitution and the Supreme Court, in the course of which he demonstrated the inanity of nearly all proposals save his own. He went back to James Madison and John Marshall for his own suggestion. He recalled that Marshall, dickering to save Chase from impeachment, suggested that Congress might give force to any law held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court by reenacting it. He recalled, too, that Madison in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 had proposed that Congress be given power to repass a bill by a two-thirds' vote over a judicial veto. Ernst combined the two suggestions into a proposal that Congress be given power to override a Supreme Court decision on constitutionality by repassing the measure by a two-thirds' vote, with the further privilege, if the President then vetoed the measure, of passing it over his veto by a three-fourths' vote. This, as Ernst pointed out, would provide all the various checks and balances necessary to allay the qualms arising in the breasts of those who fear to give the basic element of democracy—majority rule—full play. It would place the supreme power in the hands of the people's elected representatives on all questions of public policy, and hence represents the closest approach yet made to a truly democratic solution of the most pressing problem before the nation. It falls short of being a completely democratic solution only in its mathematics. Ernst defends them only on grounds of strategy. He believes that an amendment embodying them would appeal to the American public's sense of fair play and not be as confusing as others proposed. For his own part, he is quick to confess, he would gladly omit the "two-thirds" and "three-fourths" and take his chance on the electorate's knowing what to do with the power bequeathed it by the Declaration of Independence and burgled from it by the Constitution.

Ernst made two other suggestions which need circulation, for they were aimed at dramatizing the issue and thus helping the fight along. One was that the members of the Supreme Court be summoned, not merely invited, to appear before the Senate and House Judiciary Committees and submit to public cross-examination when hearings are held on any of the proposed amendments or other remedial measures. He bulwarked that suggestion by pointing out that members of the court have made such appearances in the past and, in the past, have not hesitated to take an active part in the legislative process as lobbyists. His other suggestion was that the impending Supreme Court test of the Wagner Labor Relations Act be dramatized by having John L. Lewis in the flesh inject himself into the proceedings and join personally in the pleadings with a layman's statement of the issue.

Detroit Digs In

BY EDWARD LEVINSON

Detroit, January 10

THE future of the Committee for Industrial Organization, most hopeful development in the history of the American labor movement, lies in the hands of the sitdown strikers who have occupied Fisher Body Plant No. 1 at Flint, Michigan.

The sitdowners tell the story in the simple verses of their homespun "Song of the Fisher Body Strike." The dies, key to most of General Motors production, had been loaded on a railroad car in the plant yard. They were to be shipped to some less strong union center, possibly Pontiac. "When the dies they started moving, the union men they had a meeting to decide right then and there what must be done," says the song, chanted in nasal tones to the tune of "The Martins and the Coys." And, "When they loaded up a box-car full of dies, the union boys they stopped them, and the railroad workers backed them. . . ."

Now they really started out to strike in earnest,

They took possession of the gates and buildings too.

They placed a guard in either clockhouse,

Just to keep the non-union men out,

And they took the keys and locked the gates up, too.

The attempt to move the dies was regarded by the International union, the United Automobile Workers of America, as a breach of faith. The plant was occupied on December 30. On the previous Tuesday a union committee had submitted demands and asked for a reply by the following Monday. The management's answer was to load the dies on the box-car. Although strikes were already in effect in Atlanta, Kansas City, and Cleveland, the International union had not intended as yet to force the issue on a national scale. But General Motors in Fisher Body No. 1 at Flint provided the spark. Fisher Body No. 2 at Flint followed No. 1 on strike, and walk-outs, sitdowns, or both followed in Norwood (Ohio), Anderson (Indiana), Janesville (Wisconsin), Kansas City, Toledo, and Detroit. Helpless, General Motors was forced to shut down additional plants in Anderson, Atlanta, Bay City, Dayton, Flint, Kansas City, Muncie, Saginaw, and Detroit. Today 88,000 General Motors employees are out.

Attention has been shifted from the scattered front-line trenches to union and corporation general headquarters in Detroit. The first week of the strike has been marked by the total failure of peace efforts; the negotiations have served chiefly to clarify the issues in the conflict and to reveal the determination of both sides. The union is ready now to sit down and bargain for an agreement. The corporation insists, however, that the five occupied plants—in Flint, Cleveland, Detroit, and Anderson—must first be evacuated. In other words, they are asking the union to surrender its arms and then resume the war.

The union does not take time to make any theoretical defense of its right to hold the factories. They say they will not surrender to the corporation the dies and sixty-day supply of glass now in Fisher Body No. 1 at Flint, and that they will not march out of the plants so that professional strike-breakers and thug guards may walk in. Homer Martin, president of the union, declares the sitdowners have found a heavy supply of tear gas and other equipment of war in the plants. Under the circumstances the union feels that law and peace are in its keeping. It is taking scrupulous care of the machinery.

That General Motors wants evacuation of the plants only to gain an advantage in a resumption of the war is obvious. The corporation insists it will grant none of the union demands. It says it will "recognize" the union—along with company unions—for collective-bargaining purposes, but will not grant recognition of the union as the sole bargaining agency. For the sake of getting down to peace talks, the union has agreed to waive its demand for exclusive recognition before a conference, but it is asking for other guaranties before it will withdraw the sitdowners. The workers ask that no dies be moved, that vigilante movements and circulation of synthetic employee "loyalty" pledges be ended, that the Flint injunction—obtained from a judge who had 1,000 shares of General Motors stock tucked away in his judicial robes—be vacated, and that negotiations be started on a national basis. To this, William S. Knudsen, executive vice-president of General Motors, has given a flat no. According to its memorandum to Governor Frank Murphy, dogged but unsuccessful seeker of peace, the corporation will not even agree to bargain for a national agreement.

General Motors must have known it was making an offer which the union could not consider without inviting a repetition of the collapse of the 1934 strike. While talking peace to Governor Murphy it has thrown up breastworks for a fight to the end.

First-line attacks of the corporation have taken the form of sponsoring vigilante movements. These have come to the surface in both Flint and Saginaw. In Flint an "Alliance for Security of Our Jobs, Our Homes, and Our Community" has come into existence. It is headed by a former paymaster at the Buick plant and a former mayor of Flint, George E. Boysen. This gentleman insists he is financing the "alliance" from his own pocket. Its strategy has been to enrol as members automobile workers who wish to return to work. Mr. Boysen has variously estimated the membership of the "alliance" at 2,000, 5,000, and 12,000, but he called off a parade planned for Saturday night rather than display the weakness of the movement. The headquarters of the alliance on the main Flint thoroughfare were dark and closed early Saturday evening, while hundreds of citizens patrolled the street. The reporters who have flocked to Flint find Mr. Boysen something of a crackpot.

But all this does not mean that the Flint Alliance has folded up. The technique of these "spontaneous" movements of loyal home folk has always been to depend on outside thugs as ringleaders. The strategy has been outlined by the ebullient Pearl L. Bergoff, who planned it to combat the Akron rubber strike that threatened in 1935. "It was going to be a new idea," said the Red Demon. "No more imported strike-breakers, just local people doing the job." But the nucleus of the "local people," he added, was to be four or five hundred imported mercenaries. To meet the threat of the Flint Alliance, several hundred automobile strikers from other cities are camped in Flint, and hundreds more are available on a few hours' call. The discipline of the strikers is remarkable. Company agents tried to incite a riot Thursday night, when they smashed a strikers' loud-speaker and a meeting near union headquarters, but the riots they hoped to stage did not develop. The sitdown strike leaders tell of other provocation. They have a strict rule that no liquor is to be brought into the occupied plant, and the only time the rule was violated, they say, was on New Year's Eve when they permitted some company foremen to enter the plant. Since then there has been no drinking and no foreman has been allowed "to snoop around" among the men.

The other leading practice of the corporation has been to stir up resentment against the union and intimidate its employees by circulation of "loyalty" pledges. Many of these are distributed by mail with return post cards inclosed. The entire method is devised to frighten strikers with threats of a black list. Some workers who have refused to sign have been discharged outright. By now the petitions have become worthless, except to provide headlines for the kept press. Union leaders have told the workers to go ahead and sign them and then forget about them.

To buttress these pressures, the Flint Journal, which is virtually a company organ, displays on its first page a three-column picture of police armed with clubs, tear-gas guns, gas masks, bullet-proof vests, ammunition, and clubs. The papers of the smaller cities, such as the Flint Journal and the Saginaw News, are abject in their crawling before the corporation. The metropolitan press is less crude. Detroit's papers pathetically feature unsubstantiated peace reports, hoping against hope that there will not be a long conflict in which they may be forced to take sides. The Detroit News did not print the impeachment demand filed against Judge Black of Flint or the union's revelations of his ownership of General Motors stock until these things were no longer news. The Detroit Free Press refers to the alleged imminent return to work of employees as "hopeful news." The Cleveland Press headlines Wyndham Mortimer, vice-president of the union and resident of Cleveland for twenty-six years, as an "outside agitator." On the whole, the fault is not with the correspondents on the scene. There are distinctive examples of impartiality and an understanding of the forces at work on both sides. One of these, it is pleasant to report, is the Chicago Daily News. Another fine piece of reporting was the account of the Flint Fisher Body No. 1 sitdown published in New York's Daily News.

Passing from the lofty stability of the General Motors building in Detroit to the tense but calm offices of the baby union which has tied up the giant corporation, one thinks constantly of the men in Flint's Fisher Body Plant No. 1. Police and kitchen committees, runners to the union headquarters, strike and executive committees, and a general assembly every afternoon at four have placed the destiny of the strike in the hands of the rank and file.

Leaders are verbally slow but mentally clear. Rank-and-file cooperation has made the "chief of police" the best loved man in the plant. There is no grumbling, although the men have been in the plant for eleven days and nights. Wives come to the windows to pass in laundry and food, which goes immediately into the general commissary. Women may not enter, but children may be passed through the windows for brief visits with their fathers. Every night at eight the strikers' band of three guitars, a violin, a mouth organ, and a squeeze box broadcast over a loud-speaker for the strikers and the women and children outside. Spirituals and hill-billy songs fill out the program, which closes with "Solidarity Forever."

P. S. I forgot to mention the American Federation of Labor, an easy thing to do these days. It has no members to speak of in the automobile plants, although John P. Frey undertook to order his followers back to work. The craft unions have no contracts with General Motors. Their leaders' telegrams supporting the corporation against the strikers was a piece of work worthy of a feeble-minded Judas. The move has turned out to be a boomerang. The strikers are comforted by the fact that the A. F. of L. is openly against them and not among their supposed friends, where it would be in a position to attempt a more damaging betrayal, as in 1934.

The Pacifist's Dilemma

BY NORMAN THOMAS

NEW YEAR'S bells rang in the definite and open beginning of a naval race which is immediately of staggering cost and potentially far more likely to prepare the way for new war than for peace. But as the old year closed, the great American protagonist of that race, President Roosevelt, fresh from a considerable triumph for international good-will on the Western Hemisphere, waxed caustic in condemning the sale of certain implements of war to the recognized Spanish government. Those who defended that sale were for the most part bitter opponents of the naval race and long-time foes of the international trade in armaments. This is but one example of the inconsistencies, or seeming inconsistencies, in a mad world. Rarely, if ever, has the struggle for peace been so complicated, or have the lovers of peace been more sharply divided. They are caught in the confusion of a world more keenly aware than ever before of the suicidal costs of world war, yet more inclined to accept it as inevitable.

The whole issue has been immensely complicated by the triumph of fascism in Italy and more especially in Germany. Fascism glorifies both militarism and war. It is as surely a menace to the peace as to the liberty of mankind. One may be against both war and fascism, and yet find in every dispatch from Spain grim proof that practically, under conditions all too likely to occur again and again, resolute and effective opposition to fascism means war. Is it any wonder that in this kind of world consistency among peace lovers is not a common virtue?

Among the enemies of both war and fascism are two groups which at first sight seem more consistent than the rest of us. There are on the one hand those pacifists who hold that the great commandment can be summed up in this: "Thou shalt take no part in any kind of war." On the other hand there are those advocates of collective security who proclaim a holy crusade of democratic nations against fascist aggressors. Both groups are more successful in criticizing their extreme opponents than in supporting their own positions. For neither group have we invented an accurate name. To the first I shall apply the word "pacifist," pausing only to remind my readers that there are pacifists and pacifists. The best pacifists are not passivists, individuals concerned only with their own soul's salvation or believers in divine intervention in behalf of the martyrs of peace. The pacifists can point out that history furnishes melancholy justification for their successive contentions: (1) that the right sort of America could have used its immense social and moral power to bring about a negotiated peace instead of entering the World War; (2) that the peace of Versailles was a peace to end peace; and (3) that reasonable concessions in the days when Stresemann and the Social Democrats were still strong in Germany would have greatly increased the chances of victory for the republic against militarism and fascism. Today these pacifists can make no equally practical suggestion in the struggle against fascist aggression, but at least we owe them something for their constant challenge to the method of war and their constant reminder of its bitter cost.

Nevertheless, the pacifism which makes mere abstention from war the supreme command will not deliver mankind from new cycles of war and new dark ages of oppression. It is unrealistic and mad to say that it does not matter who wins in Spain if only the guns are stilled. It matters profoundly not only for Spain but for mankind that the fascist aggression of which Franco is the nominal and brutal leader be defeated. Persons who believe this must support the gallant resistance of the workers and other loyalists.

Those who cannot accept pacifism as the first and last commandment are not therefore the foes of peace. Indeed, the advocates of one form or another of "collective security" speak as its champions. Originally they sought to unite the world against the aggressor nation or nations. They reasoned that if the certainty of united action were great enough, a would-be aggressor would shrink from putting his fortunes to the test of war or even from facing those economic sanctions which the more optimistic believed might serve as a substitute for war. Now—and the change in itself signifies the historical failure of collective security through the League of Nations—those who consider themselves "realists" in contradistinction to the "pacifists" pin their hopes on an alliance of "democratic" states against realms ruled by dictators.

In a powerful and eloquent little book "We or They," an American citizen sees two worlds in conflict—the world of democracy and the world of dictatorship. In the second he places the Soviet Union. Hamilton Fish Armstrong is, to be sure, aware of differences as well as resemblances between fascism and communism. In my judgment he understates the differences, but certainly in terms of practical politics an organization of the democracies against the dictators which must begin with bitter controversy concerning the place of mighty Russia scarcely solves any major problem of world peace. Nevertheless, Mr. Armstrong and the school for which he is a persuasive spokesman make us face a dilemma which Americans cannot escape by mere opposition to war or any feasible degree of isolation.

What then? Shall intelligent Americans seek to build a league of non-fascist states with the definite object of checking fascist aggression, if necessary by preventive war, before German rearmament has gone farther and the continuous advance of science has made war even more deadly? There would be logic in that, but advocates of collective security usually reject it. It is a tribute to Mr. Armstrong's candor that he goes farther and doubts whether liberalism can stand the compulsions which war would put upon it. Yet he favors a form of "international insurance" which, if it means anything, means military alliance, actual or tacit, among the democratic nations.

Objections to this course of action fairly leap to one's mind. Why should such an alliance, especially if it tentatively places Russia outside its fold, succeed where the League of Nations has egregiously failed? The conduct of all nations, our own included, proves that such an alliance would not diminish the weight of competitive armament but would cause each nation to arm the more frantically, not only against fascism but to guarantee its position in the councils of its allies. Even without war this race in militarism would jeopardize whatever democracy we had left. The minute war was declared, America would become a fascist state or a military despotism. This is the calm assumption underlying the War Department's plans for military mobilization. Moreover, a declaration of war in capitalist America would not initiate a new struggle to make the world safe for democracy any more truly than when Congress declared war on April 6, 1917. Ideals would have their place in inducing the American people to accept a new war, but the primary motive would not be, as the Communists hope, a desire to protect Soviet Russia or, as Mr. Armstrong hopes, a desire to preserve democracy. It would be a desire, intelligent or futile, to further national economic interests.

The whole theory of an effective alliance of capitalist states in behalf of democracy is discredited by each day's news. It is not likely that any clearer case for joint action against fascism will ever present itself than the fascist rebellion in Spain. Yet Blum was afraid to act, partly because he feared a fascist rising at home and partly because he could get no support from the British Foreign Office. To this day that great "democracy" over which Stanley Baldwin presides has no clear policy. British mining interests in Spain were original supporters of Franco's revolt. The instinctive sentiment of the ruling class was on the side of the fascists. No abstract love of democracy moves the British government in its growing fear of fascism in Spain but rather reflection on the danger that would threaten the Empire and its precious life line through the Mediterranean should Italy or Germany, or both, gain a commanding position in Spain.

It is facts like these, added to the long and melancholy story of the failures of the League of Nations, which make us challenge the assumption of "two worlds in conflict." There is, indeed, a conflict between dictatorship and democracy—even the bourgeois democracy with which we are familiar. But fascism itself is not basically a conspiracy of wicked dictators against democracy. It is a logical stage of development of the ideals and institutions of capitalism and nationalism. They made the first world war. They made the peace of Versailles. They plowed the soil in which Hitler sowed the seeds of his tribal fascism. Loyalty to democracy, even bourgeois democracy, may well be invoked in the struggle against fascism. But at best it can only win a temporary victory. The essential struggle is still socialism against capitalism, not democracy against fascism. Power-driven machinery has forced a high degree of collectivism upon us. The great problem for workers throughout the world is whether they can make that collectivism cooperative and achieve the genuine democracy of socialism, or whether they must ultimately accept the rule of a dictator.

It is preposterous to think that the workers in the United States, in the supreme emergency of war, can maneuver the capitalist state and its military organization to gain their own ends. They may conceivably act as a brake on the state and mobilize effectively against war; they cannot utilize an international war to achieve a workers' victory unless first their country's military machine has met crushing defeat. But the practical conclusion from these considerations is not that the United States should seek ostrich-like isolation. It is that in capitalist America it is mad utopianism to believe that the government can be armed for international war against fascist aggression or can enter such a war at a price tolerable to the American people or to mankind. It is far more feasible for the workers and all lovers of peace to try to keep America out of the pursuit of war profits and hence out of war, and in the comparative sanity of this condition to see that it uses its influence for peace. This is the case for making neutrality and an embargo on the export of war supplies the American rule in all international struggles. It is the case against American participation in the new naval race.

The action of sincere and qualified volunteers who are willing to risk their own lives in the struggle in Spain is a different matter. They are investing their own lives, not conscripting others or involving the government. They are of a long line of men who have said with Tom Paine: "Where liberty is not, there is my fatherland." Those sanctions and economic pressures which can be applied by unofficial groups do not fall under the condemnation of the attempt to make capitalist America an armed guarantor of peace.

Moreover, a belief in the wisdom of neutrality as the fixed policy of the United States in international war—with exceptions to be made by Congress, not by the President—does not mean that a friendly, democratically elected government, such as that of Spain, must be denied access to supplies necessary to put down armed fascist rebellion. It is an ugly world in which anti-fascist forces must pay tribute to private profiteers for the arms of defense. Yet the one outstanding chance of changing that world lies for the moment in preserving for the Spanish government the right to those forms of help which under international law governments extend to one another. To preserve it does not compel the United States to use its navy directly or indirectly to guarantee shipments, nor does it involve this nation in risk of war. To deny it is not only a discriminatory act, deliberate support of the rebel cause; it is also a reversal of accepted American practice. The United States has not prevented the sale of arms to the Nanking government for use in the slaughter of workers and in civil war against the Chinese red army, or to Latin American dictators engaged in suppressing rebellions. It has invoked this policy for the first time in a civil war to keep arms from the government of Spain—a tragic misapplication of the principle of neutrality.

Not a method of keeping out of war but the establishment of a warless world must be our goal.

[In an early issue we shall print an article by Vera Micheles Dean asserting the need of a united democratic front against fascist aggression in Europe.]

The Guild Invades Chicago

BY MILTON S. MAYER

Chicago, December 31

ON OCTOBER 20 of this year seven Chicago newspapermen showed up for the regular monthly meeting of the Chicago Newspaper Guild, with their hats pulled down and their coat collars turned up. There were thirty-eight dues-paying members altogether, but the other thirty-one had a feeling that they were being followed. That was the Guild in Chicago, after three hard and hopeless years.

Today, a little more than two months later, there are 240 dues-paying members, and that figure will be too low by twenty-five or fifty by the time this is printed. The revolution has reached Chicago at last. The publishers are pale in their ivory towers. Freedom of the press—the freedom of first-class editorial workers to sing the song of black reaction at $40 a week—faces ruin at the hands of a mob of city-room serfs drunk on Broun and Marx.

Chicago is the toughest publishing town in America. Hearst, McCormick, and Knox own it. Join the Guild?

Why not just cut your throat and save the initiation fee? This is Chicago, the town that gave the world the Volunteers, the social-security dog tag, and the University of Chicago red scare. And the Annenbergs. Here's a metropolitan area of 4,500,000 people with only five newspapers. When it had half its present population it had nine papers. If you've got a job, hang on to it. If the boss says Landon is magnetic, Landon is magnetic. The saloons are full of good newspapermen. If they cut you to $35 a week, remember—you're an artist. You're not a common working stiff like the square heads out in the composing room getting $60 or $70. You're the cream of the crop. "The Front Page" was written about you. How about a buck till Monday?

Thus the Chicago tradition. But a few weeks before the Presidential election Hearst capitulated to the Guild in Milwaukee, ninety miles away. Then came Roosevelt's October visit to Chicago, when 150,000 men and women marched past the newspaper offices hooting and booing.

Then the landslide, which cost the publishers not the respect of their men—they never had that—but the last vestige of their fear. Then, on the day after, with Mr. Hearst's discovery that Roosevelt was a modern Andrew Jackson, the News's announcement that it was going to give the President just one more chance, and the Tribune's revelation that 26,000,000 reds had stolen the election, Chicago's editorial workers came to life.

On October 7 Don Stevens, A. F. of L. organizer attached to the Newspaper Guild, came to town. He was the third Guild organizer to try Chicago in three years. But this time the cards were stacked for the Guild. Hard on the election there followed a nation-wide succession of Guild victories, topped off by the "Chief's" collapse in Seattle and the signing of a Guild contract by the New York Daily News—accompanied by its publisher's little speech about "the spirit of the times." By December 1, Stevens was ready to shoot. The local mailing list had been increased from 250 names—most of them dead—to 750—all of them alive but unaware of it.

The first shop to discover that war is hell was the tabloid daily Times, youngest, smallest, poorest, but lustiest paper in town. With a straight New Deal policy and a rip-roaring managing editor who offered $5,000 reward for proof of the Tribune's Moscow-for-Roosevelt story, the Times had doubled its 175,000 circulation in two years, and in 1936 made enough money for the first time to pay the interest on its $3,000,000 debt. The Times had the loyalty of its men by virtue of being the only near-liberal sheet in town, but it was a sweatshop with an average editorial salary of $25 to $35. (Among those who were sweating was the publisher, S. E. Thomason, who draws exactly one-thirtieth of the salary he got as business manager of the Tribune.)

A week after Stevens opened up on the Times, a majority of the staff of 100 had organized an office unit. Last week the Times unit, representing 90 per cent of the staff, drew up a draft contract providing a $60 vertical minimum for three-year men, and notified Thomason that it had appointed the Guild to negotiate. Thomason, who had not seen the contract but suspected the worst, said he was ready to negotiate, but he warned the staff not to drive him out of business. The Times, with its working-class circulation, will never let its staff call a strike.

Meanwhile, Hearst's Examiner, which lost $843,000 last year "competing" with the Tribune, and his money-making evening American tried the old tricks of undercutting the Guild drive by posting a new scale of minimum salaries for three-year men, to remain in force "as long as in the opinion of the management economic conditions justify." The "concessions" were so transparent that on the day they were posted twenty-four Examiner men joined the Guild. Today the Examiner unit has 90 members of a staff of 125 and a scale committee working on a draft contract. The American hasn't been attacked yet, but five members of its staff have come in.

The United Press unit has ten members out of a possible thirteen. The German-language Abendpost is 100 per cent organized, and its twelve underpaid editorial workers have notified the publisher that he is about to negotiate. The Associated Press Bureau, stymied by an undisguised campaign of intimidation, will not be approached until the Supreme Court decides the Watson case. The City News Bureau, supported cooperatively by five papers, pays as low as $18 a week; five of its men have come in, and the rest are crying for organization. The News, with a legend of decency that Frank Knox is too smart a publisher to touch, has a comparatively low wage scale and a six-day week, but it has refused to intimidate its staff, most of whom claim they voted for Roosevelt and Knox. The other day the entire News copy desk, except for one holdout, sent in applications, with a note saying, "We have informed the management of our action."

The Tribune is going to fight to the death. "McCormick's folly," as this hundred-million-dollar inheritance is affectionately known, pays higher wages than any other Chicago paper—although its most famous reporter, the late Jake Lingle, had to get rich on $65 a week. Arthur Sears Henning gets $18,000 a year for pulling Dubinsky out from under the Colonel's bed. Christmas bonuses run as high as 17 per cent of a year's salary. The old and the faithful get pensions. Tribune men enjoy the scorn even of their colleagues on the Hearst papers. The heroic stature of McCormick's framers of fakes is indicated by the plight of a Tribune employee of my acquaintance who is afraid the office will find out that his wife trades at a co-op grocery.

Nevertheless, there are signs of unrest among the well-fed toilers in the Colonel's barony. Early in December McCormick assigned two men to "investigate" the Guild and sent a third to an organization meeting. One—count 'em—one Tribune man has joined on the promise that his membership in a no longer secret society will be kept secret, and another materialized in Stevens's hotel room at three o'clock the other morning, whispered that half the Tribune staff would join up under cover, and evaporated into the night with terror riding his bent shoulders.

After the Hearst papers posted their "concessions," there was a special meeting of the Chicago Newspaper Publishers' Association, and McCormick asked the News and the Times to subscribe to his policy of refusing to post scales or otherwise recognize that the Guild was organizing. They refused. So the united front of the "toughest publishing town in America" is broken, and McCormick is left alone, with only the courage of his advertisers' convictions to console him.

The Guild victory in Chicago is not yet set down in black and white. But when that has come to pass, as it now must, the whole unorganized Middle West will rally to the Guild banner. Chicago's newspapermen are not altogether free from their "glorious" tradition. They are not yet talking strike. They, and the whole profession in the Middle West, are considerably less progressive than the present Guild leadership. But they are on their way. The other day they learned that the printers' local had just negotiated a contract embracing the highest wage scale of any city in the United States or Canada, after a couple of playful press-time sitdowns by the Hearst composing room. Chicago's publishers may yet picket Guild headquarters.

Birth Control Wins

BY HANNAH M. STONE

TWO events which occurred at the end of 1936 may signify a turning-point in the birth-control movement in America. Together they denote the closing of one era—the era of pioneering, of preparation, of laying the foundation—and the beginning of another—an era of extensive research and clinical accomplishments.

The first event was the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of the Japanese pessaries. In 1933 a package containing some 120 pessaries was sent to me from Japan for certain clinical and experimental tests. The package was seized at the Customs with a view to confiscation and forfeiture on the grounds that it violated Section 305-a of the Tariff Act of 1930, which, originating from the so-called Comstock Act of 1873, provides that "all persons are prohibited from importing into the United States from any foreign country . . . any article whatever for the prevention of conception. . . ." We felt that this action of the Customs officials offered a sufficiently clear-cut test case for a legal determination as to whether the blanket prohibition of the laws applied to contraceptive articles sent to physicians and intended for use in the legitimate practice of medicine.

On the initiative of Margaret Sanger, and with Morris L. Ernst and his associates acting in our behalf, the seizure of the articles was contested. On December 10, 1935, the case came up for trial before Federal Judge Grover M. Moscowitz of the United States District Court. At the trial Drs. Frederick C. Holden, Foster Kennedy, Robert L. Dickinson, Ira S. Wile, Alfred M. Hellman, and Louis I. Harris testified as distinguished medical authorities that there were many medical conditions which necessitated the prescription of contraceptive measures for the preservation of the health of the mother and the family; and Mr. Ernst, in turn, argued that in view of this testimony and in view of the fact that the confiscated materials had been sent to a physician and were intended for lawful use, they did not come under the ban contained in the Tariff Act and should therefore be released.

Judge Moscowitz, in a very lucid decision, upheld the point of view that the Tariff Act could not reasonably be construed so as to prevent the importation by physicians of articles for the prevention of conception when intended for lawful use. He ruled that the articles in question did not come within the condemnation of the statute and directed their return. The federal government, not satisfied with this decision, appealed the case, and in November, 1936, it came up for another hearing. This time the case was tried in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, the bench consisting of Justices

Augustus N. Hand, Learned Hand, and Thomas W. Swan.

In a historical statement which will undoubtedly have a very wide and important influence upon the future progress of birth control in America, the United States Court of Appeals reaffirmed the decision of the lower court. In speaking of the Comstock Act generally, the court held that "its design, in our opinion, was not to prevent the importation, sale, or carriage by mail of things which might intelligently be employed by conscientious and competent physicians for the purpose of saving life or promoting the well-being of their patients." It amplified this opinion with the statement that "it is going far beyond such a policy [of Congress] to hold that abortions, which destroy incipient life, may be allowed in proper cases, and yet that no measures may be taken to prevent conception even though a likely result should be to require the termination of pregnancy by means of an operation. It seems unreasonable to suppose that the national scheme of legislation would involve such inconsistencies and should require the complete suppression of articles the use of which in many cases is advocated by such a weight of authority in the medical world."

Unless the government appeals to the United States Supreme Court, the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals will remain as the final interpretation of the laws affecting the importation or distribution of contraceptive materials by the medical profession. Actually it means the passing of the Comstock laws, at least as far as contraception is concerned. These laws, enacted in 1873, long since became archaic and obsolete, altogether out of tune with present-day conditions and needs. Laws which define moral behavior cannot remain static. They must be swept aside from time to time by the newer currents of thoughts which spring from changing human needs.

For a number of years now the National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control, under the leadership of Margaret Sanger, has been endeavoring to procure an amendment to the birth-control laws which would free the medical profession from the existing legal restrictions and prohibitions. The decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals accomplishes this very fact. It once and for all establishes contraception as a recognized part of medical practice and removes the legal barriers to the dissemination of contraceptive knowledge. From now on hospitals, clinics, and public-health centers will have to face frankly the responsibility and opportunity of including information on contraception as a part of their health services to the community, and we may well expect that clinical contraception will make rapid progress within the coming years. Quite right—ly Margaret Sanger considers the decision to be "the greatest victory in the history of the birth-control movement."

The second significant event to take place last month was the Conference on Contraceptive Research and Clinical Practice which was held in New York on December 29 and 30. Men and women from universities, laboratories, and birth-control centers in many parts of the country came together at the invitation of Margaret Sanger and the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau of New York to discuss the scientific aspects of contraception, to evaluate techniques and procedures, and to formulate plans and programs for future clinical and laboratory research.

The first day of the conference was devoted to the medical and biological investigations in contraception. During the morning session Dr. Bayard Carter of the Duke University School of Medicine spoke of the relationship of contraception to maternal health and outlined the various conditions which make contraceptive advice essential on medical grounds. Dr. J. Paul Pratt of the Henry Ford Hospital of Detroit presented a survey of our present knowledge of the endocrine factors that influence and control human fertility. Dr. Raphael Kurzrock of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University spoke of the prospects of rendering the woman temporarily sterile by means of hormones. He mentioned several types of glandular products which may be used to inhibit the ovulatory function, that is, the ripening and discharge of the egg cell from the ovary, and induce temporary sterility without changing the character of the menstrual cycle or permanently affecting the reproductive functions. At the same session Dr. Werner Henle of the University of Pennsylvania surveyed the possibilities of rendering the female immune to conception by injections of the spermatozoa of the male. While the potentialities of hormonal sterilization or spermatotoxic immunization have as yet been but superficially explored, they nevertheless offer a wide field for future biologic research.

An entire session was given over to a discussion of the "safe period"—a subject of intriguing interest. Carl G. Hartman of the Department of Embryology of the Carnegie Institute at Baltimore, who has done pioneer work in the reproductive physiology of apes, spoke on the Facts and Fallacies of the Safe Period. All present studies, in his opinion, point to the fact that a sterile period does exist during the menstrual cycle of the woman, but our knowledge today does not justify an unqualified indorsement of the "safe-period" theory, or clinical reliance upon it when it is a question of the health or life of the mother.

In the course of his address Dr. Hartman mentioned the recent work of Allen, Burr, and Hill, who are able to determine the time of ovulation in animals by means of an electrical device. It should be possible in the near future, he said, to find out the ovulation time of a woman by attaching two electrodes to her, setting the machine going, and "when the storm of electrical discharge that accompanies ovulation occurs, amplifying this so as to light a lamp or ring a bell." This statement, of course, caught the fancy of the newspapermen present and was recorded in large type in the daily press. The possibility of such a development, however, actually lies within the bounds of reality and may be attained within the near future. An exact method of determining the ovulation time in the individual woman will greatly facilitate the study of reproductive physiology generally, and should help to place the "safe period" on a more concrete and practical basis.

The general opinion during the discussion that followed Dr. Hartman's paper was that clinically, at least, we are in no position as yet to advise any woman to rely upon the computation of the sterile period for the prevention of conception. The very marked variations of the menstrual cycles in women, which we have found at the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau from a special study of the recorded menstrual cycles of a large number of women, and the absence of a positive method for determining the fertile and sterile periods of the month render this method unsuitable for clinical use. More exact data and simpler methods of calculation have to be available before the "safe period" can become suitable for practical application.

The second day of the conference was devoted to consideration of the technical aspects of contraceptive practice. Dr. Norman E. Himes of Colgate University, an authority on the medical history of contraception, Dr. Leo Shedlovsky, a biochemist at New York University, Dr. Eric M. Matsner of the American Birth Control League, Dr. Bessie Moses of the Johns Hopkins Clinic, Dr. Clarence Gamble of Philadelphia, and many other representatives of laboratories and clinics in different parts of the country participated in the discussion. Surveys of the present-day chemical and mechanical methods of contraception and the means of evaluating their suitability and efficacy were presented, and the importance of formulating standards and developing new methods and techniques were stressed. The urgent need for a simple, inexpensive, and safe contraceptive, one that would be especially suitable for the women in outlying rural districts and on farms who cannot avail themselves of modern clinical methods, was especially emphasized by Margaret Sanger, and she called for more intensive investigation in this field on the part of the scientists. Similarly, Dr. Robert L. Dickinson, the dean of medical contraception in this country, stressed the need for more and more research. Eager and active at seventy-six, Dr. Dickinson illuminated many of the conference discussions with his rich and varied experiences and his broad knowledge.

Altogether the conference marked a turning-point. The number of universities, hospitals, and birth-control centers represented and the caliber of the men and women who participated in the proceedings marked the removal of birth control from the field of controversy to that of scientific consideration, from the platform and the pulpit to the laboratory and the clinic. It marked the beginning of an era of extensive practical service.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Walter Lippmann's Prize Piece

I WAS much tempted during the last campaign to offer a prize of $1,000 to be awarded to the daily newspaper columnist who wrote the silliest article prior to the election, my plan being to ask the editors of the Baltimore Sun, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and the New Republic to act as judges. But I did not happen to have the $1,000 available, and the plan came to naught. I used to think, as the weeks wore on, that Mark Sullivan would be an easy winner if only because of his original and startling discovery, in the middle of the campaign, that there were two new ideologies menacing democracy at work in the world, namely, the creeds of the Communists and the fascists. But each time that I thought he had nailed down the hypothetical prize along would come an article by Walter Lippmann so overpowering as to put Mark into the background.

One of these Lippmann triumphs has been recalled to me by a recent article of his in the Herald Tribune entitled Effective Neutrality. The mid-campaign effort was a gem of purest ray serene. The whole of the first column dealt with the next war in Europe. We were told that European military men felt that it would be short, must be short, that every effort would be made to avoid trench warfare and to end the war quickly by destroying the enemy's capital from the air. We then learned how vulnerable the European nations are because of their relative nearness to one another and the concentration of their financial and commercial power and all their government bureaus in their capitals. The thesis was laid down that England, France, and Germany would have to surrender if their capitals were destroyed. As far as that the article read just like a military essay, and then with the turn of the column the real objective appeared. This military stuff was only a prelude to an argument against Franklin Roosevelt's reelection. I did not get it at first, my brains being old and dull, but after a while it hit me.

Here is the argument, as Lippmann put it: A vote for Roosevelt would be a vote for a man whose whole idea was to increase the power of the federal government and to concentrate that power in Washington. Of course he could not do it in four years. But if he were reelected, the tendency would be confirmed and approved, and in the course of time we should be just as dangerously vulnerable to airplane attack as Berlin or London or Rome or Paris, with all our governmental activities in one basket. It might, of course, be several decades before this situation could come to pass, but still the thing must be scotched in November, 1936, once and for all. Therefore all good citizens and true, all who wished to preserve our institutions from destruction from the air, must vote for Landon. Q.E.D. The fact that General Hugh Johnson, a trained soldier, declared the next day in his column that Lippmann's entire original premise was false, and that the countries he named could fight on if their capitals were destroyed, did not really mar this masterpiece. If there ever was a prize-winner, this was it.

Now we have another gem from the same pen. In his Effective Neutrality Lippmann brushes aside the legislative proposals both of those who favor complete mandatory laws and of those who desire permissive legislation. With a stroke of genius he ends the whole debate. We need do only one thing to be safe and that is to "found our neutrality on a program of military preparedness," for that "kills two birds with one stone." It "makes our neutrality effective, that is to say, likely to be respected," and "it relieves the depression, which would inevitably produce the social discontent in which war fevers are generated." Those who remember 1914-17 will recall how great were social discontent and the depression when our factories all over the country were working day and night for the English and French war machines and employment was at its maximum. The next pearl of wisdom is that by immediately going on a war footing we should provide "useful and patriotic work for those who would otherwise be the leaders and the rank and file of a war party." "This," he says, "is no small help in the preservation of peace," for it was not the Allies, nor the J. P. Morgans and the du Ponts who were the war-mongers, but Theodore Roosevelt and Leonard Wood.

This, Walter Lippmann says, is "the only prudent and effective way to remain neutral, at peace with ourselves, and reasonably sane." Well, let us hope that no Hugh Johnson will take hold of this argument, for such a man might point out that war parties are not the creation of months but spring up overnight, that nothing could strengthen a war party more than mobilization, that mobilization inevitably brings not calmness but hysteria, and that with three million men being trained the demand of future Theodore Roosevelts and Leonard Woods to go somewhere and do something with our champing military strength would acquire dangerous if not fatal force. It is impossible to think of any other plan which would more certainly involve us in war. Lippmann himself admits a doubt, for he claims only that mobilization would make our neutrality "likely" to be respected.

In case anyone should ask why I proposed to limit my competition to the dailies and did not include those who write weekly columns, I hasten to explain that I wished to save the judges from the possible embarrassment of having to give me back my own money.

BROUN'S PAGE

You Can't Win

IN RECENT years there has been a great amount of shifting about among the virtues and the vices. Some foibles which our grandparents regarded as reprehensible we now dismiss as trifling peccadillos. But the old boys were more correct than some of the youngsters of today are willing to admit. Gambling is a sin. I ought to know because I've tried it. I'm still trying it, and the conviction of guilt rests heavier on my head every day.

Of course, it will be said that there is no harm in games of chance if the stakes are low enough to make the hazard mild. That was the theory which drew me into the ring of addicts. At my mother's knee I learned to play contract bridge for a fiftieth of a cent a point. On a bad night you might lose a dime. But if you asked me, "Where's the harm in that?" I should be compelled to reply that it is the first false step and that all the rest follows after quite logically. Having lost a dime, one tries in his second engagement not only to get even but to come away with a profit. In other words, you will be shooting for twenty cents. And if I had a table of progressions I could figure out for you very rapidly what this leads to in the long run.

Florida offers many examples of the epidemic quality of mass wagering. It is assumed quite generally that America's playground is ruled by rapacious natives who lie awake for the unwary traveler and strip him of his possessions. It is quite true that they do that, but in all fairness to the natives it must be admitted that they then proceed to toss away their profits by wagering with one another. I was talking just the other day to a man who sells two-dollar tickets in a tote window booth at the race track.

"Mr. B," he said, "this isn't your game. I hope you know that you can't beat this racket. If I had some paper and a pencil I could show you that if you broke even on every race you would still come out behind at the end of the day. Between the state tax and the take of the track you have 10 per cent against you and that's murderous. To put it simply so you can understand it, every time you hand me $2 I give you back a ticket worth $1.80."

"What could be fairer than that?" I asked. "Do you mean to say that this ticket on Boocap which I have in my hand is worth all of $1.80?"

"By some sort of sheer genius," replied my friend, "you have succeeded in picking the poorest horse in the race. I wouldn't be surprised if he is the poorest horse now at the track. I would figure that the two-dollar ticket which you hold is worth all of seven cents."

"Don't be so petulant," I expostulated. "Look at the odds I'm getting. Right now Boocap is ninety-nine to one. I wasn't expecting to get Man O'War at that price."

"The price is of no importance," my statistical acquaintance explained, "so long as you are not going to win. That seems to be the hardest thing for a novice to learn. The problem is one of sheer mathematics."

"I should think it would be very wearing to have to stand there at that window with all those figures flying through your head. What do you do for a rest?"

"I go to the dog races at night," said the man. "Of course the dogs haven't quite settled into their regular form yet, but as soon as they do I can beat the life out of them."

"And if I may ask," I inquired naively, "what is the percentage against you at the dog track?"

"Fifteen per cent," said the man gruffly, "but there are a lot of saps out there and I know enough to make up that handicap. Come out with me some night and I'll show you how to do it. I can't go this week because I'm flat broke and I have to wait for pay day."

It is easy to pick up the taste for gambling in Florida because all the little stores around the schools have slot machines into which the children can put their nickels. The slot machines, I am told, come in three varieties. You can get them rigged to run 60 per cent, 80 per cent, or 90 per cent in favor of the house. At the moment Miami is sternly moral in the matter of roulette, dice, and all the other pastimes of the regular gambling house.

And yet the inveterate gambler need not turn in early for want of some spot in which to follow his proclivities. Only the other night I was weary and ill at ease because I had wagered unsuccessfully on eight horse races and eleven events at the dog track. Naturally I wanted to get even, and I said as much to the guide and mentor who was showing me around Miami.

"I suppose there's no place we can go now," I said. "I hate to go to bed but what else is there to do?"

"It isn't as bad as all that," he said, "we can go to Childs."

"That doesn't sound very exciting."

"But you don't know the Miami Childs," he explained. "They have some of the best slot machines in town. I don't think the percentage against you is more than 30 or 40 per cent. Childs is one of the gayest places here."

And so it turned out to be. There was a dance floor, a Spanish orchestra, and machines for dimes, quarters, and half-dollars. A plate of ham and eggs cost me $15.25, but I have no reason to complain because I knew the nature of the hazard when I risked the first dime. Still, I am moved to a slight curiosity as to the way in which the slot-machine profits appear in the annual report of the Childs corporation to its stockholders. I suggest that in the section devoted to Miami the revenue might run under the simple heading, "Doing as the Romans."

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

A MODEST PROPOSAL

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE Theater Guild has recently issued an anthology of fourteen plays* upon which it looks back with especial pride. It is a valuable book despite the odd fact that the individual plays are treated as though they were closet dramas and printed without so much as a list of the original performers or even of production dates. Reproaching the Guild for these omissions, one is tempted to go farther and ask why it cannot present us with an anthology of a different kind—on the stage. Many of these plays are very much worth rereading; why shouldn't they be even more worth seeing in the theater again?

Let me hasten to add that I am not making the suggestion after the innocent fashion of those who complain in general that good plays of the past are not revived more frequently. I know something of the difficulties and of the brutal fact that the theatergoing public does not seem to want old plays except very rarely, when they happen, for one reason or another, to afford suitable vehicles for some unusually popular actor or actress. Thus, despite her strong personal following, Eva LeGallienne consistently lost money at her Civic Repertory Theater, and a year or two ago the firm of Wee and Leventhal gave up the practice of reviving on Broadway very popular plays from seasons recently past. Different as the two enterprises were, low admission prices were necessary in both cases, and in both cases operation under these conditions proved unprofitable.

The experiment I am suggesting is not quite the same and is based, among other things, on the assumption that there is a class of plays rather different from those favored by either Miss LeGallienne or Wee and Leventhal. The latter chose, for the most part, distinctly "popular" dramas of a rather insubstantial sort. Miss LeGallienne, on the other hand, went to the other extreme. She chose mostly certain modern "classics"—almost exclusively foreign—among which were a number, like the plays by Benevente and Sierra, which always struck me as very faded indeed, and which, however popular they may have been with a certain small potential audience, certainly had no wide general appeal. Why she never attempted any of the best and most successful plays by the best contemporary and still popular American dramatists I do not know. Perhaps she found them difficult to cast. But in any event what one usually got at her theater was either a play, like one of Ibsen's, which, however great, belonged distinctly to a former age, or a more recent foreign play which seemed hardly to have sufficient strength to reach across the barriers of an exotic scene and tradition. One would never have suspected that there were half a dozen American dramatists at least as good as Sierra and considerably more pertinent.

There was a very sound artistic reason why repertory disappeared from our stages during a certain period. We were developing a new style of dramatic writing. The theater of O'Neill and Sidney Howard and Elmer Rice had no place for the plays of Clyde Fitch or David Belasco, just as the theater of the two last had no place for those of the mid-Victorians. There was too great a difference in their spirit, and what was a decade old was already outmoded. But the last ten or twelve years have seen no such change. "What Price Glory?" and "They Knew What They Wanted"—both produced during the same season some dozen years ago—are contemporary plays for the simple reason that most of our most successful plays today belong in essentially the same tradition. Whatever difficulties might lie in successfully reviving them, these difficulties would not be the same as those in the way of reviving either a play like "Camille"—which Miss LeGallienne performed—or the plays of Ibsen or even of Shaw.

The experiment I should like to see tried is, then, one based upon certain pretty definite convictions and pointing in a particular direction. It would aim at least at moderate commercial success and would renounce all directly "educational" purposes. Its appeal would be primarily to the regular theatergoing public, and it would recognize the fact that that public stubbornly resists any effort to educate it; that it may possibly send its children to see Ibsen and Shaw but that it is itself so stubbornly and narrowly contemporary as to shun like the plague anything tainted with "historical interest." Merely popular plays should be avoided because they grow old-fashioned within a year, almost, but on the other hand the natural tendency to give another chance to something which seemed excellent though unsuccessful should be equally resisted. The plays chosen ought to be plays which were at once substantial and popular, and the assumption ought to be that there are a certain number of such which would make essentially the same appeal as they made three to twelve years ago. Offhand I can think of at least half a dozen which fulfil all these requirements: "What Price Glory?" "They Knew What They Wanted," "Craig's Wife," "Street Scene," "The Second Man," and "Desire Under the Elms." A theatergoing generation has grown up since several of these were produced; a good many persons who saw them originally would, I believe, like to see them again.

*"The Theater Guild Anthology." With an Introduction by the Board of Directors of the Theater Guild. Random House. $3.50.

There are, I recognize, many practical questions which would have to be decided and many practical difficulties to be met. Probably the Guild, if it should undertake anything of the sort, would have to make the productions separate from its regular subscription program. Probably the admission prices would have to be somewhat below the usual Broadway level unless it were decided to emphasize the presence of some "star." Undoubtedly there would be a considerable risk in attempting something which has not been attempted before. But I am not sure that the risk would be any greater than the normal production risk, and what I really want to emphasize is the fact that the attempt would be something new. Nothing quite like it has been tried, and the failure of other "revivals" and "repertories" is not strictly relevant.

BOOKS

Legend and Reality

CATHERINE DE' MEDICI AND THE LOST REVOLUTION. By Ralph Roeder. The Viking Press. $3.50.

THOSE most likely to go into a romantic glow at the prospect of another rehash of the devilish machinations of the Italian queen will be chilled and rebuffed by Mr. Roeder's superb volume—and, it is not impossible, if they can take the punishment, stunned and disciplined into a little good sense.

The name of Catherine de' Medici—like that of Machiavelli and of Satan, with which it has been so fantastically woven—has belonged rather to the province of demonology than to that of history. Two years after her death in 1589 Catherine figures as the villainess in a characteristic pamphlet published in England. Therein her least forgiven sin was cunningly "to fetch the Quintessence out of the people's purses," which pointed to economic considerations that have not particularly entranced her biographers. As a murderess she is more effulgent: "Never were there so many died by poyson of Serpents and other venomous beasts, nor by the crueltie of Tygers, Lybbards, Crocodiles, Lynxes, Beares, and other devouring beasts, since the creation of the world," ■■ by the "tyrannous crueltie" of "Katherine de Medicis, and her Florentine Councill." Earlier, in 1577, Simone Patricke, in the introduction to his translation of Gentillet's infatuated "Contre-Machiavel," was fixing the essential outlines of the legend: "Sathan useth strangers of France as his fittest instruments, to infect us still with this deadly poison sent out of Italy." And from "The Prince," "the Bible of the queen-mother," sprang not only the vigil of Saint Bartholomew but, according to Gentillet, "contempt of God, perfidy, sodomy, tyranny, cruelty, pillage, foreign usury, and other detestable vices." The legend of Catherine is inextricably merged with the legend of Machiavelli, but ■ consideration of either legend is beyond the orb of Mr. Roeder's masterfully executed purpose.

On March 11, 1513, Giovanni, son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was in Holy Conclave elected Vicar of Christ. Leo X's one legitimate nephew, Lorenzo, to whom Machiavelli dedicated "The Prince," journeyed to France in the spring of 1518 to marry Madeleine de la Tour d'Auvergne, an heiress of great wealth and a distant connection of François I. On April 13 of the following year Madeleine was delivered of ■ female infant, the mother to die two weeks later of puerperal fever, the father to follow her to the grave almost immediately from a complication of nervous irritation, pleurisy, and syphilis. Ariosto, who had come to Florence to console with Lorenzo on the death of his wife, arrived on the very day that Lorenzo died. He addressed an ode to the frail little life hovering between birth and death, to Catherine, the last tendril of the Medici. Verdeggia un solo ramo. . . At Leipzig Luther was soon to reach the revolutionary stage of challenging the primacy of the Pope; he was excommunicated within the year, and the Papal Bull of Excommunication was publicly burned at Wittenberg. The solo ramo, that last frail Medici tendril, was to prove a tough and enduring shoot. Catherine was to live for seventy years. She was to marry the king of France, and though all but deposed because of sterility, she was to see one daughter queen of Spain and three of her sons successively king of France, and to survive eight civil wars. The future which she inherited was that movement which began when she came into being and matured as she developed, and which brought to chaos and disintegration the world into which she was born.

Catherine was herself without imagination, devoid of religious conviction, a believer in astrology and black magic, with a genius for enduring self-effacement, a passionate maternal devotion to the ten children she bore after eleven barren years of married life, ■ passionate interest in people, and an indifference to ideas that helped her to sustain her lifelong loneliness. In her forty-second year, at the beginning of her second regency under Charles IX, she spoke deep from her heart when she wrote to her daughter Elizabeth, wife of Philip II:

So, ■ fille m'amie, commend yourself to God, for you have seen me as happy ■ you are now, never knowing any sorrow but that I was not loved as much as I wished to be by the king your father, who honored me more than I deserved, but I loved him so much that I was always in fear, as you know; and God has taken him from me and, not content with that, has deprived me of your brother whom you know how I loved, and has left me with three little children and a divided kingdom, where there is not one man whom I can trust, who is not governed by private passion of his own.

Having the invincible quality of never knowing when she was vanquished, based on the inveterate defect of not understanding why she had failed, she spent her energies up to the time of the Bartholomew in trying to maintain by continual adaptation the shifting equilibrium of unsatisfactory compromise. Alternating cycles of rabid war and vicious peace fertilized France for ■ social upheaval far exceeding the scope of the religious wars, which, religious only in name, were a complex, turgid, confused phenomenon that embraced and hallowed social power and social protest in all its forms—the rivalry of princes, the impoverishment of peoples, personal ambitions, economic pressure, financial chaos, class friction, republican stirrings, reactionary repression. Catherine, the central figure on whom all these forces converged, was ■ passive pivot, ■ medium of life, never its master, who baffled and defeated every positive and dynamic impulse. The climax of Bartholomew was a paroxysm of sterility. From that night, when her inert barrenness was transformed into an active force of negation, she became ■ medium through which all the negative and destructive forces of life were free to work. After Bartholomew, Catherine lived seventeen years.

In Mr. Roeder's pages a complicated epoch is ordered about the tenaciously enduring and passively destructive figure of the Medici queen. The luminous clarity of the writing, the vividness of the events in their exorable and dramatic sequence, the incisive insight into the springs of action, the wealth of details that never blur the organic structure of the whole—these cannot be too highly praised. But beyond these distinguished achievements, and without once ever drawing a parallel between the sixteenth century and today, Mr. Roeder has written what is in effect a startlingly illuminating commentary upon our own time. Should we be distressed at being disabused of the illusion that we have made any essential progress in the betterment of man, or find solace in the realization that what we are now suffering was borne by others now at peace?

RAYMOND WEAVER

Man's Worldly Goods

MAN'S WORLDLY GOODS. By Leo Huberman. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

NO BOOK could live up to so neat a title as "Man's Worldly Goods." Man's aspirations have soared toward the life of the spirit, the soul's salvation, and the nebulous goodness of self-denial. But his ambitions have reached out toward the fulness of life, the laying up of treasure upon earth, and the practice of the gospel of the world and the flesh. Here is a theme for poet, pedant, novelist, and historian. Since preachers have made the morals, those who decry the acquisitive arts—from Isaiah to R. H. Tawney—have had the better of the argument. And—save in the movies and the swashbuckling biographies of the robber barons, where romance is at hand to take the taint from dubious values—the pursuit of gain has never had its literary due.

Nor does Mr. Huberman give it unstinted justice. He has cast his theme in the form of a history. The story begins in the Middle Ages, when men affected to despise worldly goods, and the House of God was tripartite: "Some fight, some pray, and some work." It runs on into a more perfect society, in which a course of events which up to the present has been contemptuous of charts falls placidly into grooves cut out for it by the Marxists. All through, the sympathies of the author are for the lower classes; he sees in the systems which are passed in review variations on the theme of exploitation; and the argument does not quite escape the old, old pattern—which has persisted from medieval theology to the American movie—of a helluvasituation, the deus ex machina, and the salvation of the proletarian hero.

But in spite of its orthodox mold the book is a breath of fresh air. A series of systems for the getting of wealth are passed in review. Arid abstraction is enlivened by the color and concretion of everyday life. Alien usages are made to live with the breath of passages gleaned from the old documents. Economic history is not presented as an isolated thread in social development. A persistent revolutionary march of a culture—whose changes are too persistent and insidious to be eventful—is always in the background. As they come and go, economic theories are paraded as the ways of thought engendered by life under diverse economic circumstances. The tempo is swift, the sentences are short, events are ever on the march. It is all written, not in the frozen stereotypes of the King's English, but in the American slang of here and now. And, most important of all, it is communication, not literary creation. The reader gets without difficulty what the author has to say.

It is not a book for the scholar. So shortcomings are quite beside the point. It is of little consequence that quotations come mostly from standard works, that the doctrines of the schools are too glib, that a touch of the absolute clings to many an argument, that the author has not read too widely, probed too deeply, or pondered too continuously over his materials. A more meticulous or more competent student would have written a poorer book. And a specialist—unless he had remained a man of the world—would have made a mess of it. The asides—see there, get the point—with which the author exhibits his quotations are his genuine exclamations in making his discoveries. No other book can give to the reader so much of its subject in so limited a space. As an example of the art of writing, it all but atones for the evangelical urge that moves through its pages.

Of the making of books by the professional for the laymen there is no end. Amateurs need books written for them by persons who understand their needs. Here is a book written for amateurs by an amateur. That is the key to its quality.

WALTON H. HAMILTON

Two Small Books

THE SACRILEGE OF ALAN KENT. By Erskine Caldwell. Portland, Maine: Falmouth Book House. $3.

THREE TIMES THREE. By William Saroyan. The Conference Press. $2.50.

NEITHER of these slender volumes is likely to affect one way or another our impression of the fundamental qualities of their respective authors. The Caldwell item, written several years ago in a since abandoned style, is quite obviously intended for the back pages of the Publishers' Weekly. Collectors of American "firsts" will find much to appreciate in the printing and in the numerous wood engravings by Ralph Frizzell. Of the latter it may be said that it is almost a question whether they were made for the text or the text for them. Mr. Caldwell unfolds the spiritual biography of his hero through a series of sharply etched vignettes, or poetic snapshots, some of them only a sentence or two long, and all possessing the black and frozen quality of the illustrations. The effect is of moving too rapidly through a picture gallery—more exactly, a gallery of horrors. For famine, rape, murder, as well as the more naive modes of depravity so leisurely detailed in Mr. Caldwell's later works, are here concentrated within a few bare images. Also the pressure of the formal scheme results in an over-intensification of style in the individual sections that comes close to the banal and the grotesque. What this experiment must have proved to Mr. Caldwell was that he could not treat his particular kind of subject matter with the usual romantic lyricism, that he could balance its exaggerated violence only with a correspondingly exaggerated simplicity of language. The story is therefore, for anyone interested in the problems of writing, a very valuable lesson in the disadvantages of overstatement.

The stories in Mr. Saroyan's collection are all of recent origin; and it would be possible to show that he is in about the same stage of technical development that Mr. Caldwell was in when he wrote the story just discussed. He is indeed in a somewhat worse predicament, for he has not only not found his proper idiom but he has also not found an adequate subject. All that he still has in great abundance is feeling; but while feeling can fill up the whole universe, it may not be enough to fill up one very short story. Mr. Saroyan has succeeded in convincing a number of people that talking about life, art, America, and William Saroyan is the same thing as recreating these somewhat indefinite realities. In the present book he carries the bluff a step farther by burdening each of the items with an introduction describing the source of his inspiration, the condition of his health, the trouble with communism, and the rest. But remarks, as he should have overheard Miss Stein telling Ernest Hemingway, are not literature; and there is no good permanent disguise for the writer who fails to work out and establish an objective equivalent for whatever may be his feeling. Fortunately, there are two indications in the volume that a recognition of this elementary truth may be on the way. The first is to be found in The Man with the Heart in the Highlands, which is rightly labeled "goofy and tragic and comic and classic." Upon examination its success will be found to derive from the fact that it is a single incident built around the personality of a character who is not William Saroyan. It is the one clean-cut example of objectivity in the book. The other successful item is Public Speech, in which the set conventions of American oratory, as well as the whole surrounding situation, serve as a framework to contain the otherwise self-consuming indignation and despair. It is quite as good in its way as the much-imitated Prize Day address in Auden's "Orators." If Mr. Saroyan can come to realize that these triumphs are the result not of luck but of shifting the writer's focus from the self to the work, he may still live to put his admirers to shame.

WILLIAM TROY

The Making of a Boston Brahman

THE LATE GEORGE APLEY. By John P. Marquand. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

IT HAS been proved time and again by literary critics and by instructors of novel-writing courses that a successful novel cannot be written by indirection, by documents, by third-person relating of events which the narrator did not see and had no part in. Mr. Marquand, in a gallant effort to prove these rules to be without validity, has not only described the life of his hero through letters from father to son and from son to grandson, has not only presented the letters through the eyes and mind of an old family friend who was reporting hearsay, but worst and most impossible of all he has not even begun to consider his hero until that gentleman is decorously laid away in the family vault. It is pleasant to record that this unorthodox method of telling a story is surprising effective.

The late George Apley was the descendant of a long line of solid Boston citizens on whom wealth and culture were bestowed in equally satisfying quantities. Learning, sobriety, responsibility, and the absence of vulgar ostentation were the family watchwords. The first article in the family credo was that Boston was the intellectual and moral center of the universe; the second was that nothing must ever be done to cast discredit on the Apleys. Casting discredit might consist in singing rowdy songs at a gentleman's club or in wishing to end by divorce a marriage that had become intolerable. It might even consist in the impropriety, on the part of a lower and less fortunate family branch, of usurping the place in the Apley burial plot designed for one of the higher-ups. Whatever it was, George Apley's father, as had his father before him, immediately recognized and rebuked

BY ROBERT GESSNER

The publication of this book set off one of the sharpest battles in years. It has been applauded and denounced from coast to coast . . . but it cannot be ignored!

honest: "It is a fine, angry, honest, hard-hitting book."
—ROBERT NATHAN

foolish: "A foolish confused brash young man has written a book."
—LUDWIG LEWISOHN

provocative: "Some will find it provoking, and others provocative."
—LEWIS BROWNE

ignorant: "An ignorant and pretentious and malicious book."
—HENRY HURWITZ

magnificent: "A magnificent book . . . it is going to be widely and viciously damned."
—JAMES WATERMAN WISE

381 pages, with photographs by the author, $3.00
FARRAR & RINEHART

Understand Europe

WITH ENGLAND'S LIBERAL WEEKLY

To form sound judgments on the crucial events in Europe, you require complete unbiased news from abroad and candid interpretation prepared by the best minds in England.

For more than a century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on a great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific.

In actual square inches devoted to editorial matter, each issue measures the equivalent of 66 pages of the ordinary American news weekly.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weekly indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of 26 weeks for $2—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home. Mail the coupon at once!

The Manchester Guardian

TO THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose two dollars for your 26 weeks' trial offer
of THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
LAST WEEKS

The Pulitzer Prize Play

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

by Robert E. Sherwood

with ALFRED LUNTand LYNN FONTANNE*SHUBERT THEA., 44 St. W. of B'way, 30 seats $1.10
Mats.: Thurs. and Sat. 2:45. Eves. 8:45

The Theatre Guild presents

(by arrangement with Sidney Harmon)

BUT FOR THE GRACE OF GOD

by Leopold Atlas

GUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of Broadway. Eves. 8:30
Matinees THURSDAY and SATURDAY, 2:30

DEBATE

DEBATE: CAN JEWS AND ARABS LIVE
PEACEFULLY TOGETHER IN PALESTINE?Between Dr. Faud I. Shatara, President, Arabian National Congress, Rabbi
Louis I. Newman, Temple Rodolph Shalom, Rev. Amos Dushaw, ChairmanSUNDAY EVENING, JANUARY 17th, 8:30 P.M. SHARPJulia Richman High School Auditorium, 67th Street and Second Avenue
Bus brings you to door—All seats 25c and 50c*Auspices of the Society for the Aid of Crippled in Palestine*

RESORT

The "Your Winter Home"
Vendome
MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.

Private Baths—Private Sun Porches—Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.
M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood 555.

When you come to WASHINGTON

Stay Near The Capitol

The convenience of being near the scene of congressional activities has made many political and business leaders choose this delightful hotel. Only two blocks from the Capitol and Union Station. Facing beautiful new Park Plaza.

Large comfortable rooms. Home-like cooking and moderate rates are featured at the Capitol Park.

Chas. L. Hutchinson, Manager

CAPITOL PARK HOTELCAPITOL PARK PLAZA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

the rashness and took pains to prevent its happening again. Young George, in his Harvard days, had one high moment of rebellion against the Apley mores. He had the temerity to fall in love with the beautiful, sensible, intelligent daughter of an Irish immigrant; he promised marriage, sure that his parents would recognize the worth of his beloved. But he did not quite know his Apleys. The benefits of a European tour, pressed on him in haste by an indignant and worried father and taken in the company of other respectable Bostonians, if it did not open his eyes, at least closed his heart. His marriage to a suitable young Boston lady followed. And George was lost. Thereafter, with a few minor exceptions, he conformed; he was an Apley.

In relating George's long life—from 1866 to 1933—Mr. Marquand has inserted many sly digs at the narrowness of a declining Boston culture. For the Irish immigrants would not be put down. And the day of the Apleys and of those families fit to associate with them is passing. America's Athens has suffered the fate of all empires—it has been captured by the barbarians. Inbreeding, provincialism, the security of knowing the right thing to do and doing it have been challenged and defeated by lusty tribes from Ireland and the Middle West. Mr. Marquand is pleased that this is so, and on the whole he is so merry about it and so clever at disclosing the weaknesses of Boston society that the reader cannot fail to be pleased also. Mr. Marquand is no Marcel Proust; but he is a telling caricaturist of a set of manners that lend themselves happily to his pencil.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

The End of Nijinsky

THE DIARY OF VASLAV NIJINSKY. Edited by Romola Nijinsky. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

IT IS hard to believe that this diary of Vaslav Nijinsky should have been lost in an old trunk from 1918-19, when Nijinsky wrote it, until 1934, some time after Nijinsky entered a sanitarium. Because even in its present form, as edited and translated by his wife, the diary is a document for the psychologist, not for the admirer of a great dancer, who will search it in vain for revelations of personality. The doctors who were studying Nijinsky's illness should have had these words before making their diagnosis. But apparently the diary was never seen by those who could best make use of it.

And now one wonders why, in all its shocking pathos, it is presented to the world. We must conclude, in partial sympathy, that it is published only in a mistaken effort to earn money for his further care in the sanitarium. Much can be forgiven on that score, though there would seem to be other ways of raising funds. What, however, has to be forgiven is the exposure here of an irrational being, broken by imaginary persecutions and maudlinly exalted, revealing all the typical symptoms of the schizophrenic patient.

Surely it is a pity that Nijinsky's art—an art so peculiarly personal, depending on the memory of his contemporaries for preservation, since it consists in lines of motion lost in space—should be judged across the abyss of his mental torture. If one believes that art is the highest organization of emotion and thought into new forms, a super-rationality, then these words written under the stress of disintegration are peculiarly painful, for they come from a region that is anti-art.

RUTH PICKERING

DRAMA

Othello

TO THE spontaneous and informal Shakespearean festival current this year in New York the Messrs. Max Gordon and Robert Edmond Jones have contributed Walter Huston in "Othello" (New Amsterdam Theater), with Brian Aherne as a very murderous and spectacular Iago. It is a swift and beautifully pictorial production; it is highly intelligent and not unsubtle besides; but undoubtedly it lacks something in sweep, in power, and in terror.

As given here the play runs hardly more than two hours, exclusive of the single intermission. None of Shakespeare's other tragedies is, of course, in itself so simple in outline or so direct in method, and it is these qualities which Robert Edmond Jones has emphasized. Taking his cue perhaps from the author's own use of the tag line, "Look to thy wife," he has used other speeches like "not poppy nor mandragora" and "Othello's occupation's gone" to mark successive stages in the development of the plot until he has given it an almost geometrically precise outline, which provides admirable clarity while, so it seems to me, sacrificing something of vitality. Speed itself can sometimes be bought too high, and while I am no pedant when it comes to cutting a text, there are dangers in the process. Even in Othello's final speech, "I have done the state some service," there were lines which I did not hear, and I am still hesitating between two improbabilities, one that my ears deceived me, the other that parts of even that great apology were omitted.

Mr. Huston has a natural dignity and a natural intelligence which assured one in advance that his interpretation would be in certain respects admirable, and one is not disappointed. One never fails to feel in him native dignity as well as fundamental nobility, and in many moments at least he is also highly intelligent. Indeed, I think that I have never seen more clearly brought out one of the central motifs of the play, namely, the fact that in Desdemona Othello has "garnered up his heart," that she is the symbol of his faith in life and so much more than merely herself that what he thinks of is not so much the loss of her as that loss of everything else which losing her implies: "Othello's occupation's gone." But if Mr. Huston has natural dignity it is not precisely the dignity of the Moor, and it would not, I think, be improper to say that his dignity is, on the contrary, a peculiarly American one, the sort he exhibited so superbly in "Dodsworth." There is an element of the placid, almost of the inarticulate, in it. It is the dignity of understatement, a dignity almost unaware of itself. And there is something of this quality which persists very inappropriately in his Othello. He has his bursts of passion, but between them he is almost too poised, failing somehow to suggest the barbarous passion which is soon to be released. And that is perhaps the reason why, as I suggested before, the production as a whole lacks something in sweep. It is interesting, credible, and absorbing. But one has not the sense that something irresistible and terrifying has been let loose.

Brian Aherne's Iago is, on the other hand, almost flamboyant in the swagger and relish of its villainy, but it is also highly effective even if, at times, dangerously near the operatic; and concerning Mr. Huston, as well as the production as

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by

C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

including charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M. D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital.

a 3-WAY
GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect upon Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Acquiscent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Sex Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via the Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sex Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—*Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

*The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View ■ Female Genital Parts ■ Male Sex Organs, Side View ■ Male Sex Organs, Front View ■ Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 746-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

a whole, I should not like to seem ungrateful or grudging. Both are far above the ordinary and both are worth any playgoer's time.

Making now the strange bedfellows which weekly dramatic criticism necessitates, I should like to add my agreement with the general opinion that "The Show Is On" (Winter Garden) is the most generally satisfactory musical revue seen here in a very long time. Neither the Shuberts, who produced it, nor Vincente Minnelli, who shares credit along with a list of others unusually long even for a revue, has undertaken anything novel in plan. What we have is the conventional alternation of comedy sketches with spectacular dancing scenes, but the outlay of talent is most unusually lavish, and for once first-rate performers are given something substantial to do. Beatrice Lillie and Bert Lahr have never been funnier in their own individual ways, and we get, besides, Reginald Gardiner in a new series of imitations, including one of a flashing lighthouse—Mr. Gardiner can actually make a face like a beam of light—which deserves a place alongside the gesticulated wallpaper which made him famous overnight. The dancing is taken care of by the iron-muscled Paul Haakon and the ingratiating Mitzi Mayfair, who can kick backward over her shoulder. But perhaps the most important thing to say is that "The Show Is On" is remarkable among revues chiefly for one thing: there are almost no dull stretches.

At the Chanin Auditorium Erika Mann, daughter of the novelist, is presenting her "Pepper Mill," a sort of café chantant which has operated previously in various European cities. Two or three American performers have been added, but the nucleus of the organization is composed of German refugees and the enterprise is sponsored by a group of prominent persons active in the movement to aid exiles. Miss Mann acts as mistress of ceremonies, while the chief performers are Therese Giehse, Lotte Goslar, and Sybille Schloss, all of whom were formerly well known on the German stage. Miss Giehse's "Stupidity Talks," in which she impersonates a sort of idiot Brunnhilde, is outstanding, and so are the satiric dances of Miss Goslar, but much of the material suffers somewhat from the fact that it is keyed to moods which, fortunately, we have so far hardly been compelled to understand. The "Pepper Mill" company has great talents, but it still needs to find itself in the American scene.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

M. Bernstein's "Promise" (Little Theater) deals with misdirected affections in a French upper-class family group which consists of an elderly second husband, a still attractive and vain wife, the daughters of the wife's two marriages, and a young man who is engaged to one sister and in love with the other. The notable English cast, which includes Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Irene Browne, Frank Lawton, and Jean Forbes-Robertson, provides the play with dramatic force and coherence through sheer brilliance of acting. The production provides an interesting example of the actor's importance in giving a tenuous play direction and distinction.

M. G.

FILMS

Muscle Movies

JAMES CAGNEY is on the screen again after a year's absence from it, and he brings back all the swagger for which he was famous in the old days of 1935. "Great Guy" (Grand National) is so exactly like each of his other pictures, indeed, as to provide after this breathing-spell an opportunity for defining his charm. For he is charming in a way that most of our muscular heroes are not. The tradition of the tough guy and the hard mug, not to speak of the sudden uppercut to somebody's chin, was wearisome almost from the start; but Mr. Cagney has worn well. His size has something to do with it, since he is surprisingly sawed off. And so has his humor, which consists in confessing that there is something a bit grotesque in the big brave parts he plays; in confessing, too, that his boy friends and his girl friends are probably right when they predict that if he keeps on in the way he is going he will run into trouble and plenty of it. But there is something else in his acting, and it has more meaning than either of these things could possibly have.

His strength is not in his right arm but in his spirit, which explodes within him and explains his smile. His smile is chiefly for himself, and it expresses a sense that the world is swarming with villains to be knocked down—not by the next fellow, but by him. His test for villainy is of course pretty simple. The bully, the deceiver, the stuffed shirt, the fraud—that exhausts the list. Yet it is not a bad list, and Mr. Cagney as I have said is a terrier constantly at their throats, a gadfly who can sting in several places at once. And this is because he does really seem to hate the evil at which he strikes. He is a cocky little lover of the good. No wonder we like him.

But there is something beyond even this. The good he loves is the natural and common good for which we have no name

Under this Plan:

- you select the books you want—no "Selection Committee."
- you get your choice of all books: best-sellers, fiction, non-fiction.
- you receive all books, including FREE ones, when and as you want them. You need not buy 2 books at once.
- you get regular publishers editions—no reprints.
- there is no membership fee.

For complete information on this revolutionary plan, fill in the coupon and mail (no obligation) to:
BEST SELLERS THRIFT SERVICE, 152 W. 42 St., N.Y. C.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

and which there are no institutions to represent. Mr. Cagney's roles have always showed him disrespectful of authority, or at any rate suspicious of it. And the fact that "Great Guy" places him in a city government where his job is to eliminate the weights-and-measures racketeers in no way alters the situation now. For the authority in this city is a super-government of district leaders and dirty millionaires, so that as a mere deputy Johnny Cave is nobody at all—until he gets going. Then he makes the feathers fly; and he does it with a heart so unimpeachably in the right place that—well, no wonder we like him. He has come to the defense of that anonymous humanity whose rights can never be put into words. They can only be put into the bow of Robin Hood and shot at sheriffs.

A very different sort of Robin Hood was to be seen in "Janosik," a Czecho-Slovakian film which succeeded "La Kermesse Héroïque" at the Filmarte. It followed the pattern more closely, since its hero Janosik, a peasant of the early eighteenth century, organized the mountaineers of Bohemia for the purpose of robbing the Hapsburgs and relieving the native poor. The Hapsburgs were represented as extremely cruel in their fur coats and the Bohemians as extremely noble in their strange wool garments and their high square hats from which dangled long pigtailed of black hair. But this was as it should be in a film so strong and simple. "Janosik" was as different from "La Kermesse" as a film could be, yet it was probably as good. Palo Belik, the tender giant who played Janosik, was worthy of the role; and the landscape was always very skilfully worked into what was finally an effect of great and tragic wildness. The current Swiss film at the same theater, "The Eternal Mask," is an interesting study of a young doctor's mind, more mysterious before it plunges into his subconscious than after, but worthy of the closest attention throughout.

"Revolutionists" (Amkino) has an advantage over many recent Russian films in that it returns to the days before 1917 for its material. The revolution as an accomplished fact has not been the best sort of subject matter, probably for the reason that success is uninteresting to the imagination. The present film in any event takes us as far back as 1896, and indeed stops in December of the bloody year 1905. It has a special interest as showing the student class at work underground in the early days of this century, and as being among other things an excellent costume piece. The exiles in Paris, the aristocrats on the streets of St. Petersburg, and the intellectuals in Siberia are fascinating if only for the clothes they wear; though they are also figures in an absorbing story. The workers preparing to march on the fatal ninth of January, 1905, are handled furthermore with a fine photographic sense which permits of their pausing now and then to present themselves in "stills" of great beauty and power. Producers of moving pictures can never afford to forget that what they are producing after all is pictures. We do not mind in the least being forced to remember the camera.

"After the Thin Man" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) restores William Powell to his role as Nick Charles, the unwilling detective, and brings Myrna Loy with him as the pretty Mrs. Charles. It is not as good as "The Thin Man," partly because it is too much like it; but of course it is very funny, and the direction of W. S. Van Dyke gives us as usual a whirl of sophisticated thrills. "Beloved Enemy" (United Artists), with Brian Aherne as hero of the Irish republican army in 1921, suffers by comparison with "The Informer." Yet it proves once again that the Irish rebellion is a first-rate subject in any medium.

MARK VAN DOREN

SPAIN NEEDS U. S. WORKERS . . .

Hard pressed by fascist invaders, the Spanish people call on American workers to take industrial or productive jobs in Spain. Each such worker would free a Spanish worker to join the military forces of his own country. Backed by German and Italian troops, Franco threatens liberty. The Spanish people need every fighting man on the front line to save Spain—and you—from the fascist menace.

HELP SEND THEM ACROSS . . .

Many electricians, steel workers, telephone and telegraph repair men, automobile workers, truck drivers, miners, bakers, others, are ready to respond to the call to serve in freedom's cause, though behind the firing line. They'd serve to keep up the essential productive system needed alike for the Spanish army and civilian population. Lack of money for transportation delays their sailing for a job at union wages and to work for democracy. We need money to pay for their transportation. We ask you to help with contributions to send them over.

Your Contribution Will Help To Save Spanish Democracy

The American Society for Technical Aid to Spanish Democracy (Officers: Waldo Frank, chairman; Paul Crosby, vice-chairman; John Howard Lawson, secretary; William E. Browder, treasurer) asks your help in sending American workers to work in Spain.

William E. Browder, Treasurer
American Society for Technical Aid to Spanish Democracy
31 East 27th Street, New York, N. Y.

Enclosed is $..... as my contribution to send American workers to Spain to help the Spanish people win their fight against fascist invaders.

Name

Address

Letters to the Editors

[In recent weeks THE NATION has published two articles by Albert Viton and one by Philip S. Bernstein discussing the situation in Palestine from contrasting points of view. From the many letters received commenting upon the discussion the editors have selected the following excerpts which seemed to present the widest range of opinion and additional material.]

The Dilemma in Palestine

Dear Sirs: Permit me to observe that Albert Viton's articles do not contribute to an objective understanding of the situation in Palestine. The statement that 29 per cent of the peasantry are landless is derived from the discredited Hope Simpson report, based in turn on a misinterpretation of the Johnson Crossbie study. The "landless" Arabs are denominated in the latter as "laborers," by which was meant any farmer not in possession of the fee, that is, tenant farmers, village workmen, heirs expectant, and others who are not properly "landless." Since Jews own only 6 per cent of the land, Viton is misleading here.

Again, no informed person would say: "A. Granovsky . . . claims that only 688 peasants have been displaced in the plains of Esdraslon and Acre, but evidence before the [1929] commission . . . showed that about 2,000 had been so displaced." The former figures were entirely correct, as proved by the government report in 1934 that less than 688 peasants had applied for resettlement on state lands as persons displaced by Jewish colonization. And this included the whole of Palestine.

It is completely untrue that Zionists oppose any scheme to resettle Arabs on the soil, for it is obvious that Jewish resettlement depends on intensive cultivation of soil by Jews and Arabs. In 1930 the Jewish Agency advanced to Hope Simpson a memorandum entitled "Palestine, Land Settlement, Urban Development, and Immigration," which constituted a feasible plan for coordinating unused Arab lands, Jewish capital, and legislation for resettlement. This plan would be accepted today if sanctioned by the government.

As Viton has quoted Yari to the effect that Arab unionization strengthens Zionism, it is pointless to discuss at length his cruel libels against Socialist Zionists. Jewish workers have insisted on their share of work on Jewish enterprises because (a) cheap Arab labor is used to demoralize the wage scale below that on which white men can live, (b) Jewish enterprises are possible only because the Zionist movement has spent huge sums of money to transform the Jew from middleman to farmer and laborer, and these funds would cease to flow were the benefits of Zionism used to create a race of capitalists, (c) Arab labor itself is undersold by even cheaper labor from the Hauran, (d) Arab labor can seek employment in Arab enterprises, which are subsidized to the extent of £2,500,000 per annum by purchases from the Arab farmers by Jews. The experience of trade unions in America has shown that black labor must be unionized by white labor or both face ruin. In Palestine Jewish labor, to maintain its own standards, must organize the exploited Arab.

Whether or not the mandate should be internationally controlled and the Holy Land strictly neutralized deserves serious consideration, but it has nothing whatever to do with the main purpose of the mandate, namely, to facilitate the creation of the Jewish National Home. And it is this to which the Arabs object, regardless of the benefits conferred upon themselves.

ELEAZAR LIPSKY,

Member of the Executive of Masada
New York, January 4

Democracy Will Resolve It

Dear Sirs: I went to Palestine in 1929—toured the country, visited Jewish colonies and Arab villages, and conferred with Jewish, Arab, and English leaders. Everything that I saw and heard then on the actual scene, everything that I have been able to learn since, has established these facts in my mind:

1. The Jews have taken a barren country and turned it into one of the most fruitful regions of the Eastern world.

2. The Jews have shared with the Arabs the benefits produced by their labor and sacrifice—the university, the schools, the hospitals, the welfare centers, the increased wealth of production, the improved standard of living.

3. Jews and Arabs at the bottom, on the land, in the labor and life of the common people, have learned to cooperate in ever-closer understanding.

4. The trouble in Palestine comes primarily from the top—from the feudal landowners as they see an Arab peasantry liberated by Jewish influence and thus passing out of their control, and from the English imperialists as they see a rapidly growing Jewish population refusing to go "native" or to take the status of "natives."

5. The trouble becomes intense just in proportion as it moves slowly but surely toward a solution in the amalgamation of the working masses of both races in the control and service of their common interests.

Nationalistic feeling, whether on the Arab or on the Jewish side, is a condition which makes the dish hot, but does not change its constituent elements.

Time in this case will do its perfect work. Fundamental democratic forces, shared by the two races concerned, can be trusted to solve all present difficulties. In the long run we may regard Palestine as one of the few spots on the surface of the globe today which we do not have to worry about.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

Brooklyn, January 5

Palestine's Resources

Dear Sirs: The success of the Zionist achievement is to be judged by the social and cultural values created in Palestine rather than by the absolute number of Jews settled in the country. This is, however, no reason for a gross underestimation of the absorptive capacity of Palestine, such as is presented in Mr. Viton's recent articles. According to Mr. Viton's own figures, somewhat more than half of Palestine is Transjordan, and this region is more fertile than Cis-Jordan, having been one of the great granaries of the Roman Empire in ancient days. Its present population is only 300,000, and there is no reason to believe that it should not equal the three million which Mr. Viton assigns to Cis-Jordan. Furthermore, one-half of Cis-Jordan is the Beersheba district, which has a present population of less than 100,000. It is known that this district has some sub-surface water, though how much has not

Never before so popular— never before so essential

Average paid circulation of The Nation since 1922

Although The Nation began its career as early as 1865, never before has its present popularity been equaled. Not even during the halcyon days of 1928 did the average paid circulation exceed the 39,050 for 1936!

Principal credit belongs, of course, to The Nation's contributors who include a large number of the leaders in progressive thought throughout the world. They help you understand the headlines of today and prepare you for those of tomorrow. Through the cold, hard eye of the militant progressive, they scrutinize every significant event to show you why it is a stride forward or a step backward. Readers who disagree with their views admit, nevertheless, that they perform a service of extraordinary value in clarifying issues, attacking shams, and upholding progressive principles. As critics of the passing scene, these writers have made a distinct place for themselves—and for The Nation.

You need not be reminded that the world is torn with dissension and hate. Never before was it more essential to keep alive the liberal and progressive fires. Accordingly, we hope that you will continue to be informed on progressive thought, and thereby contribute to the steady growth of The Nation.

SOME CONTRIBUTORS TO THE UNPRECEDENTED POPULARITY OF THE NATION

The success of any magazine depends on its ability to meet the exacting demands of its readers. These contributors to The Nation during 1936 include many of the leaders in progressive thought in America and Europe today.

Body Articles

Louis Adamic
Roger Baldwin
Joseph Barnes
Carleton Beals
Charles A. Beard
Philip S. Bernstein
Anita Brenner
George Britt
Erskine Caldwell
Stuart Chase
Vera Micheles Dean
Irving Dilliard
John Dos Passos
Walter Duranty
H. C. Engelbrecht
Abraham Epstein
James T. Farrell
Lion Feuchtwanger
John Gunther
Frank Hanighen
Josephine Herbst
Franz Höllering
Paul Hutchinson
Suzanne La Follette
Corliss Lamont
Emanuel H. Lavine
Louis M. Lyons
Dwight Macdonald
Klaus Mann
Maury Maverick
Walter Millis
Willard Price
Wright Patman
Carl Randau
James Rorty
Bertrand Russell
Morrie Ryskind
George Seldes
Rose Stein
John Steinbeck
Benjamin Stolberg
Leon Trotsky
Sidney Webb
Lawrence Westbrook
James Waterman Wise
William Zukerman

The Arts

Carl Becker
Ruth Benedict
John Peak Bishop
R. P. Blackmur
Kenneth Burke
Stuart Chase

Lewis Corey

Frederic Dewhurst
Irwin Edman
Abraham Epstein
Clifton Fadiman
Sidney B. Fay
Irving Fineman
Horace Gregory
Louis M. Hacker
B. H. Haggin
Walton H. Hamilton
Abraham L. Harris
Henry Hazlitt
Sidney Hook
Leo Huberman
Younghill Kang
Alexander Kaun
Cyril Kay-Scott
John H. Kingsbury
Hans Kohn
Louis Kronenberger
Arthur Livingston
Marvin Lowenthal
Margaret Mead
H. L. Mencken
Broadus Mitchell
Marianne Moore
Reinhold Niebuhr
Peter H. Odegard
Bunji Omura
Donald Culross Peattie
Philip Blair Rice
Lindsay Rogers
Gaetano Salvemini
J. Salwyn Schapiro
Frederick L. Schuman
Henry Simon
Wallace Stevens
Norman Thomas
Lionel Trilling
William Troy
Mark Van Doren
Eliseo Vivas
Eda Lou Walton
Edmund Wilson

Special Features

Heywood Brown
Robert Dell
Louis Fischer
M. W. Fodor
Harold J. Laski
M. E. Ravage
Oswald Garrison Villard
Paul W. Ward

FOLLOW THEM IN THE NATION
DURING 1937, TOO!

THE Nation

PRESENTS THIS SPACIOUS ORDER
FORM FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

I want to keep informed on progressive thought. Please enter my subscription for 42 weeks at the special rate of $2.50 (Regularly $5 a year) ☐ I enclose payment in full OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.
(Additional postage for foreign subscriptions, 84c; for Canadian, 42c)

Name

Address

City State

been determined. With irrigation this region may be expected to be very fertile.

In the northern half of Palestine proper, to which Jewish immigration has up to the present been limited, Jewish agricultural settlements have been largely confined to what were wastelands in the Sharon plain and the Emek, but the wastelands in these regions are as yet only about half-occupied, and the Huleh Valley and Jordan Valley, both of which at present support the scantiest population, have a total area approximately equal to that which has up to the present time been placed under Jewish cultivation. One has to look no farther than these two regions to provide for the doubling of the present Jewish agricultural population.

In the hill country the Arabs work small fertile valleys with very ineffective means. Yet these regions support a farming population of about 400,000. The surrounding hills are barren and are used by the Arabs to graze their goats, so that any tiniest shoot or blade of grass is eaten up, and the top soil is washed off by the rains each winter. The few experiments by the government and the Jews in afforestation and by the Jews in the planting of vineyards and orchards have been very successful. No estimate can at present be made as to the agricultural population which these now barren hills can support, but it is quite possible that the restoration of top soil would make the land fertile again and in addition save a great deal of the water which now runs off in floods during the rainy season. However, even using Mr. Viton's figures, it is plain that the hill country which now supports 400,000 Arabs at a low level of subsistence on an average of thirty dunams per person can be made to support six times that number, at a higher level of subsistence, by the use of modern methods.

Palestine's commercial and industrial possibilities have only just begun to be explored. Mr. Viton is not correct in stating that industrial production has begun to approach the saturation point. Large and still increasing imports of consumer goods into Palestine are clear indications of the magnitude of the available market. The difficulties are not due to a boycott of Jewish goods by Arabs, but to the facts that the young industries have not yet reached a competitive level with European and Japanese goods, and that the Arab demand for manufactured goods is still very small.

Mr. Viton is on sounder ground when he points out that the British administration has been actuated by motives reflecting the interests of the Empire as a whole rather than an interest in the success of the Palestine experiment. He is also on sound ground when he points to the rising tide of Arab nationalism. The problem of finding a basis for permanent peace between the two communities is undoubtedly complex and difficult. The first prerequisite to peace is that the Arabs should learn that the Jews are in Palestine to stay. The self-controlled resistance of the Jews to the recent uprisings has been an enormously useful demonstration on this point, and it is instructive to realize that whereas the Arab leaders in 1929 demanded that the Jews be put out of the country, they are now demanding a limitation of Jewish immigration. It is by no means incredible that the Young Arab leaders will eventually find in alliance with the Jews the best means of advancing the interests of their own people and of throwing off their feudal yoke.

JONAS S. FRIEDENWALD

Baltimore, December 31

It Won't Work

Dear Sirs: The "Promise of Zionism" held out by Rabbi Bernstein is as close to reality as the pie-in-the-sky promises the Jewish clergy have been making to the poor, misguided, persecuted Jews for thousands of years. This leadership has created in the majority of Jews an attitude of exclusiveness towards the "Promised Land," a "Chosen People" psychology, that makes for emotionalism in a problem that cries for a rational approach and solution. Rabbi Bernstein speaks of the international aspect of anti-Semitism; of the beneficent effect of the Jew's herculean reclamation accomplishments upon the Arabs and the country. Bravo! When the Arabs and the Moslem world sing the praises of the Jewish colonists and invite them as welcome co-adventurers, then the time will be propitious for colonization. Being a mundane realist I am certain that this time will never come.

The Jews admittedly accomplished great things in Germany too—only to reap a reward of hatred. The same will happen in any land or venture where the Jews force their presence, as Jews, upon a people unwilling to assimilate them. The hostility of the Moslem hinterland will some day loose itself upon the colonists. When this time does come the pogroms of Poland, Rumania, old Russia, and Germany will be reenacted again.

Whether it be Cuba, the Argentine, Africa, or Biro-Bidjan, the Jew must find a refuge where both the population and the terrain are more friendly than they are in Palestine.

Rabbi Bernstein, like the rest of his kind, takes a parting shot at Biro-Bidjan and cites its failure. This may be true. But the fault is not Biro-Bidjan's; the fault is the Jew's. Had the efforts and resources that went into Palestine been put into the Biro-Bidjan venture, the Jew's future might have been made secure from the ravages of defeatism, ghettoism, and mysticism.

E. J. KRAUSE

Brooklyn, January 1

CONTRIBUTORS

EDWARD LEVINSON is labor editor of the New York Post and author of "I Break Strikes."

MILTON S. MAYER recently resigned a position as reporter on Hearst's Chicago American "in an attempt," he writes us, "to buy back my soul." Now a free-lance journalist, he has contributed articles on political subjects to Forum, Today, and Survey Graphic.

DR. HANNAH M. STONE, one of New York's leading gynecologists, is medical director of the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau and coauthor with Dr. Abraham Stone of "A Marriage Manual." She was the defendant in the recent case in the Circuit Court of Appeals which resulted in Judge Augustus Hand's momentous decision freeing the medical profession from the restrictions of the Comstock statutes.

RAYMOND WEAVER is associate professor of English at Columbia University, where he has been conducting special studies in classical antiquity and the Italian Renaissance.

WALTON H. HAMILTON, formerly head of the Brookings Graduate School of Economics, is now economic adviser to the Social Security Board on leave of absence from Yale Law School.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

THE FASCIST FRONT HOLDS	88
A PROGRAM FOR THE JUDICIAL POWER	89
BROOKINGS TO THE RESCUE	90
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	91
STAFFORD CRIPPS, SOCIALIST LEADER by Harold J. Laski	92
DEATH IN THE AIR by Robert W. Horton	94
PROFILE OF GENERAL MOTORS by Samuel Romer	96
BERNARD DE VOTO AND KITTY SMITH by Floyd Dell	98
THE AGE OF AMERICAN MAN by Gregory Mason	100
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	101
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
A WORD FOR WINTER by D. S. Savage	102
SURREALIST FIELD DAY by Meyer Schapiro	102
DEFENSE OF DEMOCRACY by Oswald Garrison Villard	103
EMBATTLED TRADITION IN SPAIN by Ralph Bates	103
PARNELL'S CAREER by Horace Gregory	104
NEW NOVELS by Caroline Smith	106
UTOPIA REVISITED by Ruth Brindze	107
DRAMA: REALISM AND SPECTACLE by Joseph Wood Krutch	108
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin	110

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

TO MR. ROOSEVELT, AT THE INAUGURATION of his second term of office, we extend our best wishes for the four years to come. By the time this appears the inaugural ceremonies will be over. The pomp and parade will be a matter of yesterday's newspapers; the captains of politics and the kings of industry will have dispersed. What will stand is the American nation itself—the men and women throughout the country who will not be content with phrases but want raised living standards as the framework for a genuine American culture. The President's first inaugural address was a response to the emergency needs of the 1933 panic. His second inaugural has a similar chance to go down in history as a response to the more permanent needs of a democracy that has a genuine economic base. Whether Mr. Roosevelt has taken that chance or muffed it will be clear by the time this is printed.

★

AS WE GO TO PRESS GOVERNOR MURPHY IS in Washington, seeking to salvage the truce between General Motors and the United Automobile Workers which broke down when the Flint Alliance injected itself into the picture. The issue lies between two hardheaded men, Alfred Sloan, Jr., and John L. Lewis. Governor Murphy hopes to make their minds meet, with the help of government officials. Meanwhile in Flint the alliance protests its innocence, while George Boysen intones that "we want our jobs back" and talks of plebiscites. He also says he will not press his demand for collective bargaining—which is helpful, if true.

★

WE HAVE HAD LABOR SPIES, COMPANY unions, professional strong-arm men, and amateur vigilantes in the long war against legitimate organization and genuine collective bargaining. The Flint Alliance is a combination of all four. With the help of paid publicity men and reporters whose newspapers have faith in General Motors, the alliance has had a good press. Its claims have been difficult to check, partly because the present skirmish is, for the union, an organization drive—if it wins a favorable settlement, it will undoubtedly be found to represent a large majority—and partly because the union has even encouraged workers to join the alliance if they were threatened with the loss of a job for failure to join. It was hardly accidental that this ungainly creature, with George Boysen at its head, put itself forward as a bona fide union and demanded a conference with General Motors just after the company, in a surprising burst of good-will, had consented to negotiate with the United Automobile Workers on the crucial issues, including the question whether the U. A. W. should be the sole bargaining agency. The alacrity with which Mr. Knudsen acceded to the "demand" confirms the suspicion that the Flint Alliance is the latest model in strike-breaking devices. The automobile workers promptly decided to sit tight, both inside and outside the factories, until Mr. Boysen's wooden donkey was retired.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

★

THE MORGAN-LILIENTHAL FEUD HAS AGAIN flared up violently. It is unfortunate that a matter of far-reaching national policy should come down to a clash of two personalities, and be widely played up as such. The real issue is not Mr. Morgan as against Mr. Lilienthal. It is the issue of whether the power companies may be trusted to reform themselves overnight, or whether the government should make assurance doubly sure by continuing to push a vigorous TVA policy. Mr. Morgan is a man of unquestioned idealism and integrity—but unrealistic. His plea for a truce with the power companies comes up against some stubborn facts. If sweet and reasonable conduct may be expected from the power companies, why have they not taken the very simple step of registering with the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Public Utility Holding Company Act? Such action, without any surrender of constitutional right, would seem a slight concession for them to make compared with what Mr. Morgan expects of them. If sweet and reasonable conduct may be expected of them, why have nineteen utilities tied up the entire TVA program by suits and injunctions in the federal courts—a course of action which stirred the wrath of Senator Norris and gave the President occasion to discontinue the negotiations for a power pool. His appointment of a committee of five, headed by Mr. Ickes, to draft a general federal power policy cannot smooth out the matter without meeting the basic issue. It must not be allowed to result in a shake-up that will affect the essential structure of the TVA.

★

REPORTS OF THE BACK-STAGE MANEUVERING in Washington which accompanied the practically unanimous passage of the resolution barring shipments to Spain reflect little credit on anyone except John Toussaint Bernard, Farmer-Labor Representative from Minnesota, who cast the lone vote against the proposal. Members of the liberal bloc in Congress are known to have been present at an informal gathering in which the full implications of the unneutral stand against Spain were explored. Most of them must have realized that they were being asked to support a bill which could only react to the advantage of world fascism. But in common with everyone in Washington they expected that the resolution would at least apply to Germany, Italy, and Portugal, as well as Spain, on the ground that those countries are constantly shipping war material to Franco. At the last moment the resolution appears to have been changed and rushed through Congress before an effective opposition could be organized. Now, somewhat belatedly, a bill is being introduced by Congressman Maverick to extend the embargo to Germany and Italy. True neutrality would compel the support of this measure, even though it is not likely to have any practical effect. But something further is needed if the United States is not repeatedly to be aligned on the side of anti-democratic forces. It would be desirable, for example, to amend the neutrality act so as to make it illegal for American citizens to aid any group which is in revolt against a government that has been duly elected by democratic processes.

★

JOHN (SNOOPER) SUMNER, WHO JUDGES A book by the number of four-letter words it contains, has haled the Vanguard Press into court for publishing James T. Farrell's latest book, "A World I Never Made." According to this connoisseur of obscenity, who has devoted the best years of his life to what he considers the worst words in the language, the book contains seventy-five indecent passages. This must be the largest addition in some time to Mr. Sumner's private library of "dirty" passages, which is said to be the best collection to be found outside any slum in any large city. Mr. Farrell's defense, if he needed one, is contained in the very title of his book: the world he reports too faithfully for Mr. Sumner is "a world he never made." Unlike Mr. Sumner he thinks it is better to allow a fresh wind to blow through it than to attempt to hide its existence. We need hardly say that Mr. Farrell's book is a serious and excellent piece of literature. We have no doubt that he and his publisher will be acquitted. If they are not it will mean, as Mr. Farrell says, that every honest author will have to write with one eye on the censor.

★

HARVARD LAW SCHOOL HAS A NEW DEAN—James M. Landis, at present chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Following in the tradition of Langdell and Ames and Pound, Mr. Landis marks a new trend in legal education at Harvard. Judging from his past interests, his emphasis will be on legislation and public law rather than on the common law and legal philosophy. Mr. Landis is young, vigorous, driving, and will bring energy to his post. It is an open secret that the appointment has given President Conant a good deal of trouble since last September, when Dean Pound announced his resignation. At that time the suggestion of Landis as dean would have aroused the opposition of the financial groups and of the conservative leaders of the bar. But since then Mr. Landis has convinced these interests that he is not their enemy. For Landis's career as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, however vernal may have been the hopes with which American progressives greeted it, faded out on an autumnal dying note. His stress turned increasingly to self-control by Wall Street rather than governmental control of Wall Street. President Roosevelt would do well to appoint as his successor to the chairmanship of the commission William O. Douglas, who has shown firmness and realism in his conduct of hearings. If Douglas gets the chairmanship, we shall keep our fingers crossed and pray that he will retain those qualities.

★

IT IS NOT ON THE FLOOR OF CONGRESS BUT in the committee rooms that most of the real work is done. Of ten assignments to major committees which the eight Progressives and five Farmer-Laborites of the new House claimed were their due as a minority bloc, the Democratic caucus has given them three, and in two cases has deliberately outranked senior Progressives by first-term Democrats. It is apparent that the Progressives will continue to be crowded out of committees by the Democrats and Republicans unless they organize as a recognized minority bloc. By so doing they would make their committee posts dependent on their ratio to the rest of the House and not on the whim of the major-party whips, they would gain the outright adherence of independents who still belong to the other two parties, and they would give a strong stimulus to the movement for a new national progressive party.

★

FOLLOWING THE MURDER OF MRS. CASE AND the Mattson kidnapping has come a wave of public hysteria. Both in Tacoma and New York lynching sentiment has been voiced which can do nothing but harm. As indicated by the excellent police work and the promise of a fair trial in the New York case, the law is quite able to handle all phases of both these crimes without being spurred on by aroused public indignation. Such hysteria can only aid lawlessness, not justice. Experience has shown that public excitement and banner headlines in connection with such crimes often lead to many similar crimes in close sequence. Another unhappy result is the dismissal of several hundred Negroes from their jobs in New York due to a spurt in racial prejudice—one of the most irrational and dangerous elements in whatever fascist mentality America may be preparing. Thirdly, comes the proposal from Alderman Newbold Morris to require finger-printing of all hotel and apartment-house employees. Although the murder offers a sympathetic excuse, finger-printing of workers is too dangerous a precedent to be established. Finally, as happens always after widely publicized crimes, we find throughout the country a revival of attacks on the parole system.

★

THERE IS BOUND TO BE A LOT OF FUN IN reshuffling government agencies into new patterns and departments. We count on that, more than on anything else, to stand the President in good stead in his effort to get the Brownlow report on government reorganization adopted by Congress. Everybody loves a brand-new Cabinet officer, and everybody will have fun—except those that get lost in the reshuffle. How many people that will include is hard to say, but our bet is there will be less squawking than was anticipated. Our own pleasure at the President's move has only a few qualifications. We hate to see such an agency as the National Labor Relations Board get absorbed by one of the departments. We regret that the President did not see fit to shuffle army, navy, and air force together and create a new Department of National Defense. And we fear that people will think the new set-up is better than the previous one merely because it is neater and newer.

★

J. R. McCARL, WHOSE ADMINISTRATION OF the office of Comptroller General was ripped up the back by President Roosevelt's committee on reorganization, has issued a reply full of righteous indignation and dire warnings. His career is worth a brief review. Appointed by President Harding, McCarl, with his stiff-collared respectability and pin-point economies, sounded a lonely note in that rollicking and spendthrift Administration. But he lasted for fifteen years, a model of thrift to the conservative press, but just an Old Scrooge to the New Deal. The luxuriant ship-mail subsidies, based upon special speed-test runs that were never duplicated in actual performance, brought from him two small squeaks of protest, after which he paid these millions without complaint for years. To offset the cost, he reduced the size of government carbon paper by half an inch. He showed his hostility to the Department of Labor by requiring Secretary Perkins to travel in an ordinary sleeper instead of a compartment, and his incessant mosquito-prickings at the traveling expenses of other officials was a constant source of irritation. He arrogated to himself an unconstitutional executive power in overruling the inherent right of government departments to appoint subordinate officials by the simple expedient of refusing to pay the expenses of such officials. Portly and sleek, exuding the odor of gentility and fashion, he was at heart a small-time clerk on a high stool, plugging away at little figures in a big ledger.

★

IN THREE CROWDED, FACT-FILLED DAYS LAST week the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee showed: how the House of Morgan induced the Guaranty Trust Company of New York to sell $30,000,000 of unsecured Van Sweringen Corporation notes to the public; how the prospectus failed to reveal a $25,000,000 write-up in assets made immediately before the public sale; how the Guaranty Trust sold the notes to the public after its vice-president admitted the corporation's probable insolvency; and, finally, how Thomas W. Lamont and George Whitney of J. P. Morgan and Company sat on Guaranty's executive committee, approved the deal, and allowed the notes to be sold to the public but would not let their own bank take "even a silent interest" in the notes. From these revelations the Wheeler committee moved into the wings of the New York Stock Exchange, exposed seventeen governors of the Big Board as recipients from Morgan and Guaranty of a $7,405,000 share in underwriting Alleghany at a time when the same governors were about to pass on Alleghany's listing application. More than $21,000,000 of the note-holders' money went into Alleghany speculation, although William C. Potter, Guaranty's president, sold out his Alleghany holdings. Loss to note-holders, $15,000,000; allowance for Wheeler investigation, $100,000. The Wheeler committee has had to spread its stint thin over seventeen months and now depends upon public support to get more money for its investigation from the Senate Tories.

★

READERS OF ALDOUS HUXLEY WILL RECALL that in his novel "Brave New World" the talkies had been further elaborated into the "smellies" and the "feelies." As a matter of fact the latter are almost here. One has only to visit the Museum of Science and Industry at Rockefeller Center, where several daily demonstrations are being given of a new process for producing three-dimensional moving pictures in color. Many attempts have been made in the past to present animated stereographs upon a screen, but most of them have been based upon complicated mechanical contrivances. The new system, like its predecessors, projects overlapping or successive images taken from two viewpoints as far apart as the eyes normally are. But it projects each image by light polarized at right angles to the polarized light of the other and gives the audience spectacles each lens of which passes only light polarized in one plane. It is made possible by the recent invention of a cheap polarizing substance and has, among other advantages, that of permitting the use of pictures in full natural color, as produced by the Kodachrome or Technicolor processes. The effect is startling. Aside from the somewhat greater expense involved in production, there seem to be no great impediment to theatrical exploitation except the possible difficulty of persuading members of an audience that it is worth their while to wear queer spectacles when they go to the movies.

The Fascist Front Holds

THE events of the past few weeks clearly indicate that what we have in Spain is not so much a civil war as a definite invasion of Spanish territory by Italian and German troops. Unquestionably it started as a civil war last July when the army, supported by a few fascist groups, attempted to seize power and oust the republican government. In the early days foreign interference was at a minimum. The rebels purchased supplies from Germany and Italy; the government was dependent mostly on France for its war materials. Then came the non-intervention pact, which temporarily cut off the supplies flowing to the government but did not lessen the aid rendered the rebels by the fascist powers. It was in this period that Talavera and Toledo were captured and Madrid first besieged. The period ended when the Soviet Union served notice that it would consider itself free to furnish supplies to the government to counterbalance the fascist aid to the rebels.

By this time the rebels had practically used up the available supply of Moors and would have collapsed for lack of man-power if Germany and Italy had not come openly to their support. The Burgos junta was recognized and a fascist front formed including Germany, Italy, Japan, and the Franco clique in Spain. A few thousand Germans and Italian soldiers were dispatched tentatively, ready to be withdrawn in case of too vigorous opposition from France or England. After some weeks Great Britain protested, but almost immediately nullified its protest by a step that must have proved utterly incomprehensible to the fascist leaders. It forbade British citizens to enlist on the side of the Spanish government. It is true that Germany had used the presence of the international volunteers as an argument for continuing to send men to assist Franco. But both legally and morally the volunteers are in a very different category. They enlisted not as citizens of their respective countries but as individuals, in what they conceived to be a worldwide struggle against reaction. And they placed themselves under the discipline of the legitimate government of Spain.

The German and Italian soldiers, on the other hand, are being dispatched as part of the German and Italian armies. If Franco wins, they will have to remain as an army of occupation in order to preserve his power against an enraged population. Last week's agreement between Göring and Mussolini to push the war to the utmost may be taken as a contemptuous reply to the British and French ban on volunteers. It has remained for the Soviet Union to point out the folly and hypocrisy of this unilateral ban. But when it comes to a showdown, the Soviets are helpless if they are unable to gain support from France or England. There can be no individual Soviet volunteers, and the dispatch of Soviet troops to Spain would invite a general European war.

At no time since the beginning of hostilities in July has there been such serious danger that the democratic countries would deliver Spain, lock, stock, and barrel, to the fascist leaders. France's conciliatory attitude toward Berlin is particularly ominous at this point. On several occasions, such as the recent crisis over Morocco, it has appeared as if France and England had awakened to the menace which threatened their national interests. But each time they have stopped short of bringing the pressure which alone could suppress fascist ambitions. If anyone thought that the fascist lust for power would become satiated by victory in Spain, the patience of the democratic countries might at least be understandable. But fascist audacity thrives on success. Mussolini's insistence that Germany and Italy must be content with preserving the status quo in Spain sounded conciliatory, but it may be interpreted merely as a face-saving device if success should not be forthcoming. What is happening in Spain today will almost certainly happen in Czechoslovakia tomorrow. By that time any effort to stop fascism will certainly mean war, but a war in which the fascist countries will hold all the advantages.

A Program for the Judicial Power

WHY Change Is Needed. After two years of constitutional crisis, there seems finally to be some chance of action on the Constitution and the Supreme Court. This is evidenced by the President's message to Congress, the avalanche of bills that the more militant Congressmen are preparing for introduction, the comments of some of the national legislators which indicated that their attitude was more thoroughgoing than the President's own, and the formation of various independent groups to push a constitutional amendment, especially the group headed by that doughty warrior Senator George W. Norris. The discussion has at least passed the point where there is any lingering doubt that some sort of change is necessary. Two things have happened to bring this new phase of popular opinion: One is the Supreme Court's own doing: the succession of decisions which have added up to a popular conviction that the power of the Supreme Court to veto national action is the greatest threat to our future. The second is the election, with its clear mandate to Congress and the President to go on with progressive national policies despite every obstruction. The conviction and the mandate are sounder and clearer than any legalistic arguments you are likely to hear.

The Great Debate. When Congress in 1802 considered repealing the Judiciary Act of 1801, it took part in what has gone down in history as "The Great Debate"—on the scope and functions of the judiciary. The debate that is now to be waged within Congress, and outside its halls in the popular press as well, will probably go down in history as another Great Debate, surpassing even the excitement at the time of the famous Dred Scott case. There are four courses of action that will be most hotly debated. One is to wait until a vacancy offers itself in the court, and to fill that vacancy with a liberal appointment, meanwhile patching up in some fashion the legislation that the court vetoes. A second is to regulate the judicial function by statute, either by providing that the appellate jurisdiction of the court shall not extend to certain types of cases, or by providing that the court shall not declare an act of Congress invalid where there is a reasonable doubt—a reasonable doubt being construed as the affirmative vote of one or two justices. A third course of action is for Congress to grant itself the power of repassing an invalidated law by a two-thirds' vote, say, in successive sessions, or else to submit the law—if greater speed is required—to a plebiscite. A fourth is to put through one or more constitutional amendments, defining clearly the powers of Congress and the states over the regulation of agriculture, labor, and finance.

Mr. Roosevelt and the Odd Man. In his message to Congress Mr. Roosevelt tentatively chose the first of these courses. He took upon himself the task of educating the odd man on the court—whatever judge holds the balance of power. Working on Mr. Dooley's dictum that the Supreme Court follows the election returns—which is doubtful—the President tried to underline for Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts the lesson of the last election. Of the two the

OUR CONSTITUTIONAL PROGRAM

1. Do not count on converting individual judges. Face the problem of the judicial power as a whole.
2. Act now to allow Congress by a two-thirds' vote in successive sessions to override the judicial veto.
3. Act now to set in motion a constitutional amendment giving Congress clear power over the regulation of agriculture, labor, and finance, and giving the states power over wages and hours.
4. Select an advisory board of constitutional experts to draft possible amendments.

Chief Justice is probably the more hopeful as a case for conversion. But it should be clear to Mr. Roosevelt that the American people did not reelect him so that he might conduct in public the education of either of the justices. The logic of Mr. Roosevelt's position seems to be that there will be time enough later on to talk of amendments and of curbing the judicial power. Meanwhile, he says, let us wait until the court has shown its attitude on the crucial cases now before it, and repass in a modified form whatever legislation it vetoes. This is essentially a policy of watchful waiting and education. Its danger is that it will drag the constitutional crisis out for at least another four years, while the people's conviction of the need for reform is dissipated.

The Confusion of the Progressives. The progressives have never been in greater confusion over an issue since the early days of the NRA. Some of them are cheering Mr. Roosevelt's stand, mistaking his policy of watchful waiting for one of sharp attack on the judicial power. Some of them are terribly puzzled by the conservatives: they see reactionary papers insisting that if there is to be any change, it should be through a constitutional amendment; and they are bewildered by the argument that no clear amendment can be drawn. Most of them are therefore spending their energy fighting each other. Those who favor an immediate curb on the judicial power insist that an amendment is too cumbersome and unsafe, and those who want an amendment insist that to curb the judicial power is either inadequate or too drastic. Thus, while the enemy thunders away at the gates, the defenders spend their ammunition on one another.

What Then Must Be Done? The first thing to bear in mind is that we are not dealing with individual justices but with the whole institution of the judicial power. It is not enough, in order to meet the threat of this power, that we should wait for possible changes in the court's composition or a change of heart on the part of particular judges. We must also remember that the essential problem is not that of fighting the court, but that of giving Congress the power to deal with the problems it raises. We believe therefore that the proposals whereby Congress would regulate the voting procedure of the court (two-thirds' vote needed for a veto, for example), or remove certain types of cases from the court's appellate jurisdiction, are less desirable than other proposals. We prefer, as an immediate and practicable plan, allowing Congress to override the judicial veto by a two-thirds' vote in successive sessions, or by submitting the question to a plebiscite. But neither of these plans should preclude submitting to the conventions of three-quarters of the states a draft of adequate constitutional amendments.

One final word. The question of fundamentals should be separated from the question of procedures. Sensible men, sitting around a table, can agree on procedures if they are clear on fundamentals. And the fundamentals here can be summed up in one question. Do we believe sufficiently in democracy to grant Congress adequate powers, or do we prefer to trust our fate to a court the majority of whose members, by their background and mode of selection, are bound to be conservative? Do we, in other words, dare to make our way in the future on the resolute legs of the people themselves, or do we prefer to cut them off and hobble along on crutches provided by the Supreme Court?

Brookings to the Rescue

IT HAS been said that the pronouncements of the Brookings Institution on current economic issues have come to occupy a position analogous to those of the Supreme Court on constitutional issues. If this is true, even to a limited extent, it may be accounted for by the scope of the institution's studies and the fact that no other organization has the temerity or the resources to undertake such sweeping asseverations. Its conclusions are another story.

Its latest book* contains a summary, brought up to date, of all that has been previously published, an evaluation of our present economic status, and recommendations for future action. It points out that the current recovery, though less spectacular than certain recovery movements in the past, has already continued a longer period without serious interruption than any other in modern times. But it also points out that the present standards of living are intolerably low. Divided equally among the entire population, the 1936 national income would amount to about $1,800 per family, but the majority of families—on the basis of the 1929 distribution—probably obtained less than $1,200. This is about two-fifths of what the institution describes as a "reasonably satisfactory" living standard and even farther from a genuinely liberal one.

* "The Recovery Problem in the United States." The Brookings Institution, $4.

In considering the prospects for a continuation of the recovery movement, the institution appears to be primarily concerned with two dangers: (1) an inflation growing out of a continuation of unbalanced budgets; and (2) the possibility that labor may force through a program of shorter hours as a panacea for unemployment. The danger of inflation, as The Nation has repeatedly pointed out, is real. But we need not conclude from this, as Brookings does, that there must be a drastic curtailment in expenditures for relief and recovery. As in the institution's previous volumes, the question of redistribution of income and the regularization of the budget by social taxation is carefully avoided, although it is the most obvious method of bringing about the desired adjustments. Instead, a considerable amount of space is given to further discussion of the thirty-hour-week fallacy, though there is no reputable economist who has ever advocated shortening the work week to that extent. No economist would deny that a drastic reduction in working hours would lower the living standards of those now employed. On the other hand, it would be difficult to justify the final conclusion of the Brookings report favoring "the maintenance, in general, of prevailing hours of labor, as the only means of restoring the standards of living of the laboring masses." In many industries, as a result of part-time work, the hours have been much too low, but millions of men and women—in hotels, restaurants, and small retail establishments—still work upwards of fifty hours a week. Several of the manufacturing industries are averaging well over forty hours a week. The Brookings Institution cannot very well support the minority of employers who would like to reestablish the pre-1929 era.

On the positive side, the report emphasizes conditions which, if attainable, would restore a laissez faire economy. It favors stabilization of currencies, reduction in tariffs, abolition of production controls, and a general lowering of prices in line with the development of technological efficiency. Voluntary price reduction in the interest of higher profits is the golden key that is expected to restore capitalist prosperity in the United States. Two excellent examples are cited in defense of this theory—the automobile industry and the railways. In both cases low-price policies have resulted in greatly increased business and higher profits. But it should be noted that the reduction in railway rates was forced on the companies very much against their will, and it might be set down as an iron-clad law that business enterprises will maintain prices as high as possible, irrespective of the theoretical advantages of a contrary policy. The unit profits in the automobile industry and its fight against an effective labor organization which would cut into these profits suggest that it is by no means an exception. History records few examples of oligarchies which voluntarily altered their policies in time to save themselves from destruction. This historical fact is likely to remain unchanged despite the Brookings Institution's latest attempt to come to the rescue of the prevailing oligarchy.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington Weather Report

Washington, January 17

PITY the poor Washington correspondent who must try to compress into a page and a half such vital developments of the last few days as (1) the new TVA crisis brought on by Chairman Morgan's fresh outburst of hysterics; (2) the suspiciously sudden softening of the General Motors management's attitude toward unionization following John L. Lewis's threat here of a Congressional investigation of its corporate practices; (3) the invasion of Washington by 2,500 representatives of the unemployed demanding $1,040,000,000 instead of the $650,000,000 Roosevelt has recommended to carry the WPA on to July 1; (4) Roosevelt's governmental reorganization proposals, which in dealing with independent agencies such as the NLRB strike a reactionary note in positive conflict with his pleas for judicial reform; and (5) the La Follette committee's forging of a link between United States Steel's Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company and the flogging last September of a University of Alabama professor who had dared to intervene in behalf of a Communist railroaded to jail near Birmingham for attempting to enlist T. C. I. employees in the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union.

Fortunately, some of these developments do lend themselves to cursory treatment. Dr. Arthur E. Morgan's statement issued here yesterday, advocating a peaceful compromise with the power trust that runs directly contrary to the plain intent of the TVA act and is, as Judson King says, "almost exactly what the utilities want," need occasion no alarm. It was, I have good reason to believe, only an anguished outcry from a man who knows himself beaten. It was compounded of his desire to make the TVA merely a gigantic Hull House in the Valley and of the personal bitterness of a man who, spoiled by years as a college president, has taken affront at not being treated by the White House and his colleagues as an omniscient being in complete command of the TVA. His defeat, made certain by Senator Norris's vehement and unflinching opposition to the course Morgan advocates and by the no less vehement opposition of Congressmen and Senators from the TVA area, will be signalized shortly after Roosevelt's inauguration in the discontinuance of the cooperative "studies" now being made by federal power agencies and representatives of the private utilities looking toward a wedding of the TVA with its enemy, the power trust, in a "power pool." Morgan tried last spring to have Roosevelt boot David E. Lilienthal out of the TVA for insisting, now that it has the power boys in a corner, that the TVA should push relentlessly on to its objectives and place no trust in the utilities' peace offerings. Morgan failed in that endeavor but did not resign. The time has come to provide the grace he needs and ease him out of the TVA. And the time also has come to rid the scene of one Louis Brandeis Wehle who, using his kinship to Justice Brandeis as a certificate that he is on the public's side, has stuck his nose and hands into the "power-pool" business on the side of the private utilities. Mr. Wehle, after having been unaccountably allowed to attend the power conference at the White House, busied himself in the subsequent negotiations as the President's representative, although he lacked, and still lacks, credentials. In his assumed role he attempted, among other things, while Roosevelt was out of town, to have the PWA's power division hold up certain contracts of vital importance in the TVA situation. Some time ago Mr. Wehle, a New York lawyer, also attempted to intervene pro bono publico in negotiations leading to the amendment of railroad-bankruptcy statutes. He was on retainer from one of the big insurance companies, as he was obliged to confess to the RFC, but he maintained that his clients had left him free to take the public's side.

General Motors' sudden agreement last week not only to meet the strike leaders face to face but also to negotiate with them on the union's demands surprised even Lewis and his C. I. O. lieutenants but did not catch them off guard. They prepared to go into the peace negotiations with fingers crossed and with the notion that Presidential intervention ultimately would be necessary to make a strong and lasting peace. The abrupt rupture which took place tonight when General Motors began openly playing patty-cake with its stooge, the Flint Alliance, a vigilante outfit with a former Buick paymaster as its chairman and an embezzler fresh from the penitentiary as its secretary, bears out Lewis's expectations. Meanwhile the La Follette committee investigators report that they have ready for disclosure sensational data on General Motors' anti-strike preparations, including the Flint Alliance.

Lewis privately had to bring his whip down hard and heavy across the back of Governor Frank Murphy in the matter of relief and the use of militia to bring the negotiations to the stage they reached. He probably would not have been so vigorous if Murphy, taking the immemorial liberal position, had not tried to use his prestige and his pose as a friend of labor to get the strike leaders to accept the corporation's bogus offer to talk peace only after an unconditional evacuation of the "sitdown" strikers.

Congress's immediate attention has been chiefly absorbed in the last few days by the President's reorganization proposals. They are meeting with enormous opposition from those members of Congress who want reorganization in the interest of budget-balancing rather than administrative efficiency and from those who are mainly interested in preservation of the status quo from the patronage angle. The President himself does not indicate a too rapt devotion to the whole scheme and speaks of two or three years as being perhaps necessary for its fulfillment, but that may be merely protective coloration. He is obviously fearful that his recommendations will be denounced as a grab for dictatorial powers. His proposal to abolish the office of Comptroller General, which J. R. McCarl converted into a sort of Supreme Court and used to thwart any executive or Congressional edict displeasing to him, is beyond question a sound one, and there can be little objection to his plan to create a Department of Public Welfare and a Department of Public Works. His proposal, on the other hand, to equip himself with six assistants with "a passion for anonymity" calls for wariness. It is bad enough to have one McIntyre in the White House without having to risk adding five more. But if the formal establishment of six assistant Presidents will aid in making it possible to hold the President himself more closely accountable for all acts of his Administration, then the proposition deserves favorable consideration, especially in view of the realities—which are that he already has a whole host of anonymous assistants who are constantly playing peekaboo with the public interest.

There is only one proposition in the program that cries out to be dynamited out of existence and that is the proposal to blanket all the independent boards and commissions in the executive departments and make them subservient to the vote snatchers who head those departments and to the Chief Executive. It is proposed, in justification of this plan, to separate the judicial functions of these independent agencies from their administrative functions and to preserve their judicial independence. It should be a sufficient condemnation of this idea to point out that such reactionary organizations as the American Bar Association have for years been advocating this step and that the bar association itself in 1934 formally recommended it. It runs counter to all modern and enlightened concepts of administrative law. Under it the members of the National Labor Relations Board, for example, would be set up on a pedestal of lofty "impartiality" and isolated from the interplay of economic and social forces with which they must deal. The shadow of combat that still darkens our courts would spread out to encompass the NLRB; whichever side in a case before it had the better lawyers, the better gladiators, would have to win the board's verdict regardless of the realities in the case. At present the board, in the best tradition of administrative law, can call upon its own staff of economists and lawyers to dig up all the data and testimony needed to illuminate those realities. Under the President's program the board would be a thing apart, and the amount of digging done by the staff of economists and lawyers, who would be in the administrative division, would depend on the will of whatever politician happened to be occupying the Secretaryship of Labor or the White House. The purse-strings would be held there.

Stafford Cripps, Socialist Leader

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, December 27

THE abdication of Edward VIII is now, I think, a definitely closed chapter. It has revealed some interesting things, among them the vital fact that the hold of the monarchical idea on popular imagination is far more fragile than we had been tempted to believe. I have heard more discussion these last three weeks of the desirability of republican institutions, and from all sorts and conditions of men, than there has been in fifty years. In my own view the Labor Party was profoundly right in supporting Mr. Baldwin. Mr. Atlee and his colleagues have strengthened certain theorems of our constitution that are vital if there is to be any hope of a peaceful solution of our problems.

It is now essential that the Labor Party get back to more permanent questions. The first of these is the recovery of the initiative in politics. The country is wholly disillusioned about the National government, but it does not trust the Labor Party sufficiently to risk the experiment of putting it into power. Why is this? The answer, I am confident, is that the country does not believe the Labor Party knows its own mind. It has no clear foreign policy, as it has shown by its attitude to Spain and to rearmament. It has no clear domestic policy; it has not made up its mind between socialism and social reform. It is divided on the problem of the support it wants to win; Sir Walter Citrine and the trade unions would, it appears, be willing to make terms with Winston Churchill in return for a firm policy toward Germany, while Sir Stafford Cripps and the Socialist League have signed an agreement—still to be ratified by the respective bodies—for joint action with the Communists and the Independent Labor Party on the main issues of the day. There are also delicate organizational problems within the Labor Party which Edinburgh evaded without seeking to solve.

On foreign policy the first question is whether Labor is willing to press for immediate help to Spain now that non-intervention has become so tragic a farce. Let us be clear that this is not merely the issue of supplying munitions to the Caballero government in accordance with international law. It is also the much graver question of telling Hitler that Great Britain is not prepared to see Franco victorious by the aid of German man and machine power now being poured into Spain. In the last resort this might mean war since, obviously, the abandonment of Franco by Hitler now would mean the first great diplomatic defeat the latter has suffered since 1933. That Labor should insist that this risk ought to be run is clear to every farsighted observer. That it will so insist, no one can predict. Since prediction is impossible, the man in the street may be pardoned for refusing to distinguish sharply between Mr. Eden's policy on Spain and that of Mr. Atlee. Expressions of hope for the Spanish government are not enough. The moment calls for deeds.

So, too, on rearmament. Dr. Dalton and Mr. Bevin are for supporting the National government's policy; Mr. Lansbury is for disarmament by example; Sir Stafford Cripps is for opposition to rearmament by this government but he would support rearmament by a Labor government against the menace of fascism. I do not profess to understand the Bevin-Dalton attitude. Rearmament is meaningless except in terms of foreign policy. They do not know—nobody knows—what this government's foreign policy is. Logically their support, both at home and abroad, may lead them into far-reaching co-operation with Mr. Baldwin for ends and methods that might split the labor movement from top to bottom. I agree with Sir Stafford Cripps that the party ought not, on any issue of policy, to trust this government. If they manage to maintain peace, it will involve some kind of accommodation with Hitler and Mussolini. If they stumble into war, their war will be an imperialist war, for it is with British imperialist interests that they are alone concerned. The Bevin-Dalton line, in a word, leads straight back to Labor's fatal choice of 1914. It leaves the National government to make the running and deprives Labor of a clear alternative policy. Sir Stafford Cripps is right in insisting that, if fascism chooses to gamble on war, only a Labor government would wage that war for working-class ends.

The party, I have said, has not really made its choice between socialism and social reform. That is the damnosa hereditas of Ramsay MacDonald's long association with the Labor Party. Either it must start with the assumption that the class war is real, that the state is the instrument of the owners of property, that the business of a Socialist government is socialism; or it must seek to operate the capitalist system as best it can, extracting from it the maximum concessions the employers can be persuaded to give. Sir Stafford Cripps sees, quite rightly, that the first policy demands the united front. The trade unions frankly fear it, because they think it might mean a fascist phase; they prefer the decadence of liberal capitalism, with the forms of political democracy, to the risk of the abandonment by the Tories of constitutional methods after a Labor victory. So the party says nothing about the presence of Sir Walter Citrine on the same platform as Mr. Churchill—who is really not a Socialist—though there is talk of expelling Sir Stafford Cripps for appearing on the same platform as Harry Pollett—who really is a Socialist. For the machine at Transport House Sir

Stafford has become the enfant terrible of the party. He talks Marxism with an English accent. He frightens the timid supporters of Labor. He has wide support among the intellectuals of the party. He has better meetings than any of his critics. His policy requires more courage, more incisiveness, and more realism than they like. It may even postpone an electoral victory while the voters get accustomed to its stark implications. Will the executive summon up courage enough to expel Sir Stafford and his followers?

On the whole, I think not. Sir Stafford would not go alone. His expulsion would deprive the party of one of the half-dozen figures in the movement with a national appeal. It would imply the frank abandonment of a really Socialist policy. It would sharpen all the differences within the party to a point utterly destructive of its hold on the masses. It would leave in command of policy the men who are unprepared for risks, who are largely responsible for 1931 and 1935, who cannot persuade the electorate to see any permanent distinction between social reform of the Baldwin variety and social reform of the Labor brand. The only difference between them lies in the belief of how much can be extracted from capitalism. It would make the splits in the left permanent—a policy that always maintains the right in power. I may be wrong in my prophecy, for there are undoubtedly in the movement forces which, both on personal and on doctrinal grounds, find the left generally an embarrassment. Comfortable trade-union officials, liberals who have joined the party without ever changing their views, pushing middle-class intellectuals who want to be in the Cabinet as quickly as possible, these may demand Sir Stafford's head on a charger. But the day they get it will mark the end of the hope of most of us that this generation may still see in England a great forward move toward socialism.

Of the organizational difficulties within the party this is hardly the place to speak. They are above all connected with the technique of representation in the direction of the party. They turn on the question of whether the executive is, effectively, to be determined in composition by the trade unions—which use the seats there as consolation prizes for men who do not get elected to the Trade Union Congress General Council—or whether the local labor parties, which do the real daily work of the party, are to have their proper share of government. At bottom, discontent with the system of governing the party represents discontent with the policy for which it stands. The simple fact is that by and large the masses are well in advance of their leaders. In the present constitution of the party they have no effective opportunity of making their voice felt. The masses have their eye on socialism; the members of the executive, with a few individual exceptions, have their eye on the next general election. The executive still thinks that discretion is the better part of valor. I wish it had courage enough and knowledge enough to see that it is this kind of discretion that made Ramsay MacDonald the colleague of Stanley Baldwin. Genuflection to the fears of the capitalist has never been the high road to socialism.

Death in the Air

BY ROBERT W. HORTON

AN EXPERIENCED air-line pilot, writing to a friend recently about the tragic death of a colleague said: "It is too damn bad but doubtless — was pushing too hard. When yours truly runs into tough weather he's going to turn around and go back and set down in the first emergency field he finds." That is the spirit of the old "contact" flier—the man who piloted planes before instruments made the United States the leading nation in blind and night air-line operation. In the old days pilots took off only when they could see the ground beneath them.

No one would argue for a return to the horse-and-buggy days of aviation, but there is no doubt that instrument flying has created new perils of its own. Pilots are naturally inclined to put faith in their delicate instruments even though they know them to be fallible. Were some of the dead to speak they would testify that one or another of those instruments was more unreliable than their own guess would have been. This is illustrated, to a degree, by the Senate Commerce Committee's report on the Cutting crash. This report said that Pilot Bolton "was the victim of fallible ground aids to navigation in which he trusted implicitly."

Another aspect of the problem was discussed by the pilot quoted above. He was not discounting the value of instruments but merely being realistic when he said: "Flying as it is done today on your air lines in bad weather is 90 per cent guesswork. The pilot guesses his land speed, he guesses his drift, he guesses his wind speed and its direction, and in turn radios the ground his guess as to where he is."

Weather is, without question, the most vital element in modern aerial navigation. It is almost the only thing about which investigators can get definite information in seeking the reasons why a particular accident occurred. Given bad weather, a reasonable solution may be predicated. Still, it might have been something else. Aviation, unlike other forms of transportation, leaves little at the scene of a disaster to explain its cause.

Safety in aviation is the primary concern of the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce, and when, as in the Cutting crash, ground aids prove fallible, much of the responsibility must rest upon that strange subdivision of the federal government. Yet this vital bureau is a political pasture for Daniel Calhoun Roper, evangelistic Secretary of Commerce, and his hand-cultivated assistant, Colonel J. Monroe Johnson.

When Secretary Roper set up the present Bureau of Air Commerce, he performed an operation apparently unique in government. He gave the bureau three heads, but none was head man. As one distressed Senator characterized the gesture, Roper tossed three cocks into the ring, apparently letting the longest spurs determine the winner—if any. Those familiar with the circumstances were not surprised at the bureau's rapid deterioration.

The storm broke on May 6, 1935. Just before dawn that day, in a pea-soup fog, the great Douglas DC-2 of Transcontinental and Western Air Express, carrying, among others, Senator Bronson Cutting of New Mexico, was flying only a few feet above ground in a gully 792 feet long and 300 feet wide near Kirksville, Missouri. A wing scraped the earth, upsetting the plane's equilibrium. Still Pilot Bolton might have pulled out had not a rise suddenly appeared a few yards ahead of the plane's nose. Reconstructing the last moments of this unhappy flight, the report to the Senate said: "But the upgrade beyond was too much. Fate, not Bolton, now held the stick. He landed creditably under the circumstances, but the inevitable happened—some of his passengers were killed and others fatally injured."

In memoriam to Bolton, I quote the following from that same report. I trust it may be graven upon the conscience of those, whoever they may be, who share the responsibility for the tragedy. "Bolton himself, mortally wounded and bleeding profusely, displayed such nerve and coolness in the few minutes that followed that no one could possibly allege carelessness, lack of loyalty to duty, selfishness, or a character that would shirk or under any circumstances disobey the law of tradition. Uncomplainingly he told everyone who asked him what had happened, that he was 'out of gas,' an expression the schools teach a pilot to say when he is forced down. Bolton was low on gas—too low to venture up again into the overcast, which would have meant another time-consuming orientation, but he did not whimper even though he knew he had been 'let down' in trying to land." Then came the often-repeated sentence: "He was the victim of fallible ground aids to navigation in which he trusted implicitly."

Why was Pilot Bolton "let down"? It is a long, complicated, and technical story which I can only summarize briefly here. But it illustrates clearly, I think, why, given the present administration of air safety, there must be blood on the wings.

First, consider the plane and its equipment. It was one of the best types in air-line service. Its operators—Transcontinental—have contributed substantially to the development of safety aids in aerial navigation. The plane was carrying an automatic pilot based on the gyroscope principle which keeps the plane level in flight and relieves the pilot of considerable strain. It had a controllable pitch propeller; a two-way radio; an artificial horizon, particularly valuable in showing the pilot just how much he is diving, banking, or climbing; a rate-of-climb indicator to improve his guess as to how rapidly he is descending in feet per minute; a directional gyro which the pilot sets on the course he plans to fly and from which he gets, theoretically at least, exact and continuous readings on his course; a sensitive altimeter that is supposed to record descent to within ten feet of accuracy; equipment to keep ice from forming on wing edges; landing flaps which act as brakes, and various other gadgets designed to assure maximum safety of operation. Yet Pilot Bolton was "let down."

He had intended to land at Kansas City. Pilot J. D. Groves took off just ahead of Bolton at Albuquerque on the first section of the fatal flight. He barely made his Kansas City landing. The ceiling was falling much faster than the erroneous weather reports showed. As he came in on the radio beam through the mist, the beam was suddenly cut off so the Commerce Department could broadcast a weather report in which Groves was not at all interested. He wheeled and headed back to come in again, and once more the same thing happened. Groves had to make two approaches to the field on instruments before the radio beam returned to continuous operation, though he had requested some miles out of Kansas City that it be not cut off until he landed. Bolton came through the fog a few minutes later. The ceiling by then was too low for him to follow Groves in. He was directed to go on to Kirksville.

To summarize again. Bolton expected the northeast leg of the Kansas City radio range to be sufficiently dependable to carry him to Kirksville. He also was justified in expecting normal operation of the Commerce Department's radio station at Kirksville. Finally he counted on spotting the three rotating beacons along the last twenty miles of the run to Kirksville. The Senate Commerce Committee reported that "all three failed him," and all three were operated by the Department of Commerce. The northeast range was off course; the Kirksville radio was not operating properly because of faulty inspection; and the three radio beacons had been reduced from 1,000 watts to 500, which detracted substantially from their efficiency in penetrating fog. Thorough investigation of these circumstances moved the Senate committee to remark that "no more is needed to prove a case of government negligence, to put it mildly." That, in short, was the Cutting crash.

It was not unique in so far as the Department of Commerce was involved. Suspicion also attaches to the crack-up that killed Martin Johnson, noted explorer, near Los Angeles on January 12. The cause of that crash is at this writing unknown. However, it is interesting to recall that late last year another Western Air Express pilot reported that on the Salt Lake City-Los Angeles run "one failure of radio range has resulted in a dangerous situation. Trying to get into Union Air Terminal [the destination of the Johnson plane] at Burbank, California, ceiling over 1,200 feet, visibility four miles at night, came over on top with intention of working a problem of the Van Nuys radio range. After milling about for an hour and unable to get any signals from the Van Nuys range, was forced to return to Palmdale, California, in-intermediate field, because of gasoline shortage." This pilot discovered that the Van Nuys range was sending out improper signals. He added: "Dependability of operation same as two years ago. Stability of course worse."

There are other instances of something wrong on the ground. There are instances, too, of something wrong in the air. Competition leads to risks in the face of bad weather. Impatient passengers press the pilot to go on, take a chance against his better judgment. The air lines are by no means innocent of practices which apparently can only be eliminated by a tough-minded government. But if past experience is any indication there is no hope in Roper or his gang in the Commerce Department. After the Martin Johnson crash Colonel Johnson called the newspapermen in and made a great show of "taking action," and issuing new regulations. But such gestures have not been the answer in the past and there is no reason to believe they can be now.

"The Senate Commerce Committee's report, ignored by Roper for seven months, said plainly: "We wish we could be spared this necessity, but we strongly recommend to the Secretary of Commerce that he thoroughly overhaul the Bureau of Air Commerce with a view to improving its administrative officials. . . . Until there is greater firmness, greater experience with men, larger knowledge of the problems involved, there can be no hope of improvement in the Bureau of Air Commerce." The bureau's administration is in the hands of Eugene Vidal, now known nominally as the director. Of him the committee said: "He is an amiable gentleman. He has a good background. Our fear is that he is too amiable, that he is lacking in iron, positiveness, and the determination to keep the employees under his direction functioning according to schedule."

Of Vidal's principal competitor for place, the very fierce-looking Rex Martin, in whose custody reposes the air-navigation division, the report said: "We question the professional equipment and preparation of Mr. Rex Martin. A man of much larger experience is needed for this position. He must be chosen not with reference to his political affiliations but strictly because of his professional ability, his known success as an administrator, his possession of tact and leadership. These qualities are not combined in Mr. Martin." Colonel J. Carroll Cone, the third of Roper's triple threat in air commerce, "came through the ordeal without criticism."

As this is written, seven months after Mr. Roper was so gently reminded that he might conceivably have some responsibility for the blood on the wings, the Bureau of Air Commerce is still "administered" by these three gentlemen. And as the storm continues to gather on Capitol Hill with its lightning directed at Mr. Roper's head, a movement is under way to solve the whole problem by turning supervision and control of air lines over to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Senator Pat McCarran of Wyoming, in fact, has introduced a bill to this end. Meanwhile, Mr. Roper is flying blind into a storm which may ground him despite the accumulation of political instruments with which he has equipped himself during his long career in Washington politics.

Profile of General Motors

BY SAMUEL ROMER

WHEN sitdown strikes in five General Motors automobile and parts plants resulted in a practical paralysis of production operations and forced direct negotiations between national officers of both the corporation and the union, few of the workers involved realized that they were participating in the first important battle of a civil war which will largely determine the industrial progress of America during the next decade. For the attack on General Motors was basically an attack on one of the important sectors of Wall Street; other sectors are steel, oil, aluminum, and rubber. And the defense of the General Motors Corporation was the beginning of a nation-wide strategic defense in the coming struggle.

When the United Automobile Workers and the Committee for Industrial Organization with which the union is affiliated chose the automobile industry as their first base of operations, they did not pick a weak link in the national set-up of Wall Street. For G. M. is one of the giant corporations of America—its assets of $1,268,532,025.85 being topped in the field of manufacturing enterprise only by those of the American Telephone and Telegraph and United States Steel. General Motors stands by itself in the automobile industry; its assessed value equals that of Ford, Chrysler, and Studebaker combined, with a few of the lesser shops thrown in for good measure. Ten years ago it challenged the invincible Ford and licked him. Fifty-five per cent of the nation's 320,000 automobile workers are located in the sixty-nine G. M. plants in the United States; thousands of others are bossed by G. M. throughout the world. G. M. manufactures and sells not only automobiles but household appliances, gasoline, airplanes, and even air rides.

It began its existence in 1908 with the goal of absolute domination of the industry. In the early hectic days, when every first-class mechanic who could raise a few thousand dollars opened his own plant, Wall Street took alarm at the spectacle of more than 600 competing firms. Ward, Hayden, and Satterlee (the latter a Morgan in-law), a New York law firm, began negotiations with Benjamin Briscoe of the Maxwell-Briscoe Company, an early pioneer, and William C. Durant, whose Buick then led the field, and suggested a meeting. They met, Briscoe later wrote, for "the purpose of having one big concern of such dominating influence in the automobile industry as, for instance, the United States Steel Corporation exercises in the steel industry, so that its very influence would prevent many of the abuses that we believed existed." The projected combination would have included the big four of that time—Buick, Ford, Reo, and Maxwell-Briscoe—with all checks countersigned by Morgan. This plan fell through when the late Senator Couzens, acting for Ford, and R. E. Olds of Reo each demanded $3,000,000 cash before they would enter the combination. The idea was then discarded; Morgan wasn't ready to spend $6,000,000 to bottle-neck automobiles—it was too great a speculation!

Durant and Briscoe, aided by George W. Perkins, a Morgan partner, continued conferences on a further proposal to form International Motors—with the same object in view. But when Stetson, the Morgan attorney, accused Durant of double-crossing the others by privately purchasing stock during the conferences, the Buick manufacturer broke off negotiations and began the organization of his own holding company, the General Motors Company of New Jersey. He immediately set about to achieve domination of the industry: his first important act was to take an option on the Ford Motor Company for an $8,000,000 sale price with $2,000,000 cash as down payment. He was dealing with badly scared men in Henry Ford and James Couzens—the Selden patent decision had just been handed down and it spelled ruin for those manufacturers who, like Ford, wouldn't play ball with the rest of the crowd. But if Ford and Couzens were scared, they still retained enough of their business acumen to demand a 25 per cent down payment. Durant couldn't raise the money and Ford continued making automobiles.

But there were many manufacturers, large and small, who weren't worried about the cash—and these Durant bought by giving them huge blocks of stock. In two years G. M. had the entire or controlling interest in twenty automobile and parts plants and was producing ten makes—21 per cent of the entire United States output. Durant ran wild in his expansion; his exaggerated stock issues and "gifts" of huge blocks of promotion stocks to friendly executives created whispers of "water." He was running heavily in debt to suppliers and commercial banks without the liquid capital to balance. A final inexplicable flier in the worthless stock of the Heany Lamp Company for $7,000,000 completed the rout, and late in 1910 the Wall Street wolves closed in on their prey.

For a $15,000,000 debt refunding, a syndicate headed by Lee, Higginson and Company and the J. and W. Seligman and Company forced Durant to agree to voting-trust control of the corporation, with the bankers retaining four of the five votes of the trust. Durant was through—two years after he had founded G. M. with grandiose hopes.

There is something likable about Durant. For one thing, he is one of the few who didn't come from Wall Street to run the industry; instead he came from the industry to run Wall Street ragged during the boom years of the twenties. Although he later became known, thanks to the American Magazine, as one of the Wall Street bulls, he always had an open contempt for the vested crowd and delighted in beating them at their own game. From them he learned the technique of the double-cross, and he applied it to them with a vengeance. That today he is a beaten man is a tribute to the power of organization; that it took "the crowd" more than two decades to beat him is a tribute to his shrewdness and pugnacity.

When he was forced out in 1910 he scornfully disdained to ride along while the bankers took the wheel. Even as the reorganization of G. M. was begun, and by a stroke of a pen five of the less profitable makes were eliminated, Durant set about organizing the Chevrolet Motor Company. In New York he met John J. Raskob, secretary to Pierre S. du Pont, who was seeking a market for the stupendous war profits of the munitions concern. Durant talked; Raskob became convinced. Together with Louis G. Kaufman, an independent New York banker and capitalist, they paved the road for Durant's return by buying General Motors stock on the open market.

Legend has it that on October 1, 1915, when the voting-trust agreement expired, the anti-Durant conspirators were startled by the entrance of their foe into the G. M. conference room. Slowly, confidently he walked to the head of the table and flinging down his proxies declared, "Gentlemen, I control." Legend, as usual, is probably wrong in the exact details of the proceedings, but the story undoubtedly expresses Durant's feeling when he regained domination of G. M. Durant was again king—even if the du Ponts were parliament. A last-minute attempt by the anti-Durant block to mobilize the stockholders was of no avail; after a weak fight Charles W. Nash, who had built up the net income from $2,474,177 in 1910 to more than ten times that in 1915, sought new fields to conquer and subsequently began Nash Motors. Durant was again running the works—subject to the qualified control of the du Ponts. He was later to discover that he had jumped from the frying pan into the fire.

Things ran smoothly for a while. In 1919 G. M. acquired 60 per cent interest in Fisher Body; later it made the latter a unit of its empire. (As an example of the complete victory of finance over manufacturing in G. M. control, Fisher Body is almost perfect. There were seven Fisher brothers at the time of the merger; today only two are left on the G. M. board of directors—and they don't say much.) In 1919 a 1,000 per cent stock dividend was declared for all shareholders, and a tremendous debenture stock issue of more than $217,000,000 was ordered. The issue was undersubscribed, however, and when Durant used his entire personal fortune to try and bolster the falling market of 1921—G. M. shares fell from $376 in March to $13.25 in December—the du Ponts decided that they were through playing with the automobile magnate. Along with Morgan they closed in; and Durant was again through. The du Ponts still were parliament, but Morgan was now king.

Today Lamont du Pont, president of du Pont de Nemours, is chairman of the board; Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., who rode in on Pierre du Pont's coat tails in 1920 as operating vice-president, succeeded Pierre as president in 1923. Other du Pont men on the board of thirty-five are three more du Ponts, Donaldson Brown, a du Pont in-law who acts as riding boss in his capacity as chairman of the powerful

In 1935 the 350 officers, directors, and managers of General Motors received an aggregate reward of $10,000,000 in salaries, bonuses, and commissions. This represented, for eleven executives, an increase in "wages" of from 50 to 100 per cent over 1934. In the same period General Motors granted a 5 per cent increase in the hourly rate of its wage workers. We print below a list of the twenty-seven executives who received more than $50,000 in 1935. Figures are taken from government reports and from the statements of the corporation as reported in the New York Times.

Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., President	$374,505
William S. Knudsen, Executive Vice-President	325,869
Donaldson Brown, Chairman Finance Committee	249,862
John L. Pratt, Vice-President	249,862
John T. Smith, General Counsel	245,437
William A. Fisher, Vice-President	224,107
Edward F. Fisher, General Manager Fisher Body Division	221,347
Charles F. Kettering, Director Research Laboratories	216,036
James D. Mooney, Vice-President	205,543
Richard H. Grant, Vice-President	203,478
Albert Bradley, Vice-President	190,091
Ormand E. Hunt, Vice-President	190,041
Charles E. Wilson, Vice-President	189,991
Marvin E. Coyle, General Manager	133,670
John J. Schurmann, Jr., President, General Motors Acceptance Corporation	119,018
B. C. Place, Salesman Engineer	92,298
Elmer G. Biechler, President, Frigidaire	84,745
Frederick C. Kraeger, General Manager, Delco-Remy Division	84,424
Lewis D. Curtice, President, Buick Division	81,260
Charles L. McCuen, President, Olds Division	81,099
Stephen M. Du Brue, Director, Art and Color Section	77,768
Thomas P. Archer, Vice-President	69,144
James M. Crawford, Chief Engineer, Chevrolet Division	68,375
Floyd O. Tanner, Executive Manufacturing Staff	58,287
Ernest W. Proctor, Comptroller	52,754
John J. Carter, Olds Division	52,325
David E. Ralston, Olds Motor Works	51,437
Grand Total	$4,192,773

finance committee; Walter S. Carpenter, Jr., and Raskob. Morgan is represented by Junius S. himself, George F. Baker, Owen D. Young, Clarence M. Woolley, George Whitney, and Seward Prosser. Seven du Ponts and four Morgans sit on the finance committee of fourteen. Other interesting members of the board are Sir Harry McGowan of the Imperial Chemical Industries of England (the British du Ponts), Fritz Opel of the Adam Opel A. G. of Russelsheim, Germany, and Arthur B. Purvis and R. Samuel McLaughlin of Canadian Industries. A cross-section of the interlocking directorates (229 seats) represented on the G. M. board would make even Mrs. Dillon quail.

General Motors began as a holding company but it soon became an operating enterprise. Its affiliates are divided into the following groups: eight passenger and commercial car companies with eighteen plants, twenty body and parts companies with thirty-seven plants, a national service company, Delco Appliance and Frigidaire, two airplane plants, Eastern, Western, and Transcontinental air lines, Ethyl gasoline, four members of its own financial group, four real-estate corporations, three research companies, and an impressive worldwide network of sales and assembly companies. The corporation has never passed a dividend since 1916—when Durant returned to power; before that time it reinvested in itself its entire net income. Even in 1932, when it operated at an enormous deficit, it paid dividends of $53,993,330 from its surplus. In 1934 it divided a $64,-443,490 melon; in 1935 its net income of $167,226,510 was exceeded in its enormity only by its 1926 to 1929 incomes. (It is in comparison with these figures that the importance of the 1936 bonus of $10,000,000 can be measured.) Its officials rank among the highest-paid men in the country, and their salaries are supplemented by dividends and generous bonuses. From the $348,-841,524 invested in the corporation since its formation, G. M. paid cash dividends of $1,299,700,081 through 1935, part of the net income for that year of $2,031,-044,988.

But although G. M. has been more than generous with the top layers, ordinary workers have received an average yearly wage of $1,525, according to the 1935 report. This figure is, of course, too high—it includes the non-automobile worker and the highly skilled craftsman along with the men on the assembly line and at the punch presses. Independent reports have established something under $900 as closer to the annual wage of the average automobile worker. G. M. has been no shining exception to the rule in the automobile industry that "high wages" may be a fine-sounding slogan to sell cars but nothing to worry about in actual manufacturing operation. G. M. boasts of the wide diffusion of its stock ownership: there are 337,218 share-holders, the financial report declares. But nearly half of these, or about 140,000, hold ten shares or less. The du Ponts themselves hold only about 10 per cent of the stock, but nevertheless retain control by pyramiding their holdings into nearly 33 per cent.

G. M. has followed the orthodox tradition of the automobile barons in its dealings with its employees. The men, even their private lives, are considered company property. Its espionage organization is almost as highly developed as the feared Ford service; cities like Flint and Pontiac—and Detroit—are completely under its thumb. Long before the notorious Black Legion appeared in the down-river Ford area, G. M. workers in Pontiac dreaded the "Bullet Club," a secret political organization whose officials practically displaced the formal employment agencies in hiring and firing.

The importance of the skirmish victory won by the union when the corporation agreed to meet with the union officers in an effort to settle the strike may well be overemphasized. G. M. has always followed a flexible policy in its labor relations. Even during the open-shop heyday of 1922-25, when its executives boasted that not a union man worked in their plants, unions were tolerated in the highly skilled crafts, such as the metal polishers, and verbal agreements were often reached. G. M. shapes its labor policy in relation to the question of nuisance value; it has not hesitated to meet and bargain with groups when it would have been expensive to do otherwise. With production almost completely shut off by the sitdowns, while Ford and Plymouth sales are reaching top marks, G. M. may well decide that a temporary settlement is its best strategy. But such a settlement will decide nothing in the larger battle; it will only mark a truce as both sides prepare for the next drive.

Bernard De Voto and Kitty Smith

BY FLOYD DELL

BERNARD DE VOTO, who conducts the Easy Chair department in Harper's Monthly, has apparently been unable to resist the temptation to expand himself into the papal void left by the recent collapse of H. L. Mencken. De Voto has been getting more and more pontifical about America every month. America is the way it is, one gathers from De Voto's pronouncements. And it is that way because that is the way it is. Consequently, it is better that way than it would be any other way. I think that is the De Voto philosophy of Americanism in a nutshell.

I myself have been inclined to agree with some of his opinions. Thus I should probably have thought that schoolmarms in small towns cannot expect to be allowed to smoke cigarettes, drink cocktails, or wear shorts in public. But when De Voto pompously rebukes these errant schoolmarms in the name of "social integration," I abruptly realize that this is merely Ku Klux Klan talk.

A change sufficient to make Caribou accept Chicago's morality for teachers would mean that beliefs essential to the vigor of the whole had lost their vitality. When Kitty Smith can smoke a cigarette, drink a cocktail, or wear shorts on the corner of Fifth and Spring unrebuked by her superintendent, the social integration that is the health of Caribou and, therefore, of the nation, will be gone [italics mine].*

It is my own impression that such a change is now going on in small towns all over the country. I should not be surprised if in ten years or even less time Kitty the schoolmarm could smoke, drink cocktails, or wear shorts in Caribou without being in any danger whatever of losing her job. Personally I am for Kitty the brash young schoolmarm. De Voto, however, warns us that if Kitty wins out, the "social integration that is the health of Caribou and, therefore, of the nation, will be gone." These are strong words. Manners and morals have changed in the last quarter-century. We men folks descended from the lofty plane of social integration represented by the quid and the spittoon to the moral anarchy of the unmanly cigarette. And now nice girls in Caribou smoke cigarettes, and respectable matrons learned back in boom times to drink cocktails at the Caribou Country Club. But obviously it does not devolve upon ordinary people to maintain "the social integration that is the health of Caribou and, therefore, of the nation." It is our school teachers who, according to the De Voto philosophy, have the high and holy task of upholding our "social integration." They perform it by consenting to be—or pretending to be—purer than other people.

So far this is Vestal Virgin stuff, and is rapidly passing out of date. Schoolmarms have in various parts of the country fought for and won the right to marry and hold their jobs. Yet chastity is the very nubbin of the question of the right of schoolmarms to smoke cigarettes, drink cocktails, and neck in parked cars—an indulgence which De Voto also mentions as forbidden to Kitty the schoolmarm in Caribou. These practices were once the outward and visible signs of a probable or possible loss of female virginity. However, public ideas have changed so much, even in Caribou, that these standards are no longer applied to females in general, just to schoolmarms. Why? Can it be that there is some other aspect of our "social integration" that is endangered by the independence of our young schoolmarms? Is all this fuss really just about Kitty's cigarettes, her cocktails, her shorts, and her necking?

De Voto's article is a commentary upon the report of the Commission of Social Studies of the American Historical Association. This report shows that the freedom of our school teachers is curtailed in various ways by school authorities. It appears that Kitty has to conform to the political as well as the moral opinions held by the best people of Caribou. In De Voto's words:

On Armistice Day, pleasantly recalling the handsome face of John Strachey, who lectured at Michigan last year, she refuses to buy a poppy from ■ buddy; the fervor thus reawakened leads her to tell the fifth grade that world peace would be wonderful, information which reaches the Adjutant of the American Legion post through a son who is doing badly in arithmetic. The superintendent of the Caribou schools now summons Kitty and forbids her to teach communism;

he also instructs her not to wear chiffon stockings to school, and as circuitously as possible tells her to put on a brassiere. By February she is nervously aware that the whole Eastern Star is gossiping about her.

Thus we are given to understand by De Voto that the current tendency of American school teachers to think for themselves on political and social subjects is a form of tactlessness which would inevitably irritate any community and is naturally open to official rebuke.

The restrictions upon school teachers are many, and apparently both tyrannical and absurd. "It looks pretty bad," says De Voto, who continues: "But let us not too hastily denounce Caribou. And let us not assail it with too hasty a use of the word freedom." Why not? Because, according to De Voto, "freedom is neither a syllogism nor an entity, and the problem of freedom is not simple but infinitely complex and infinitely contingent."

That should go a long way to console Kitty and the other teachers who thought they had lost their freedom. "Caribou," he says solemnly, "is enforcing on Kitty Smith a special morality that comes from the relationship of its energies to one another." This makes everything all right. The relationship of Caribou's energies to one another just naturally makes Kitty Smith the goat, and gives the American school system into the hands of the American Legion. Above all, we should "not too hastily denounce Caribou," because freedom is "neither a syllogism nor an absolute nor an entity," but just something that American school teachers haven't got.

If Kitty the schoolmarm is allowed to smoke cigarettes or to refuse to buy a poppy on Armistice Day or to mention world peace to her fifth-grade pupils or to exercise her rights as a citizen in having opinions of her own, hell may pop. In De Voto's choicer language, "The disequilibrium so created would swing us out of the orbit so far that all kinds of freedom would be in danger."

He lets it go at that. Maybe we shall go Communist if Kitty the Caribou schoolmarm is allowed to smoke cigarettes and talk pacifism. Maybe we shall turn to fascism so as to shut Kitty up and put her back in the kitchen. Something awful will happen if Caribou and the Ku Klux Klan capitulate to Kitty the schoolmarm. First the "social integration" of Caribou will collapse and then that of the nation. Will it stop there?

We must wait and see. And we probably shall see, because the teachers in Caribou and all the other towns of America are showing a disposition to fight for their rights. We may as well prepare for the worst.

Meanwhile these words of De Voto's are so sublime in their papal quality that I think they should be put in small capitals as on a tombstone:

WHEN KITTY SMITH CAN SMOKE A CIGARETTE,
DRINK A COCKTAIL, OR WEAR SHORTS ON THE CORNER OF FIFTH AND SPRING UNREBUKED BY HER SUPERINTENDENT, THE SOCIAL INTEGRATION
THAT IS THE HEALTH OF CARIBOU AND, THERE-FORE, OF THE NATION WILL BE GONE.

Even without OR HAVE OPINIONS OF HER OWN, these words say quite enough. Heil De Voto!

* Mr. De Voto's article, Tyranny at Longfellow School, appeared in the January issue of Harper's.

The Age of American Man

BY GREGORY MASON

THE sensation of the annual conference of the American Anthropological Association held recently at Washington was the paper read by the retiring president, Dr. Herbert J. Spinden, declaring that man's occupation of America did not occur earlier than 2000 B. C. As Dr. Spinden said, his theory entails a "tremendous deflation" in the chronology of American man.

It is a deflation which will not be generally accepted. The tendency in anthropological circles during the past decade has been to attribute an increasing antiquity to man's occupation of America; successive discoveries, mainly in the Southwest, have left little doubt in the minds of most competent students that human life was in America in the Pleistocene period.

The most important of these discoveries relate to the so-called "Folsom man." A few years ago at Folsom, New Mexico, at a depth of from four to thirteen feet, dart heads of jasper and chalcedony were found in or among the skeletons of thirty bison of a species extinct since the Pleistocene closed. These darts, now on exhibition in the American Museum of Natural History, have been estimated by Barnum Brown, the museum's Curator of Fossil Reptiles, to have been made from 15,000 to 20,000 years ago.

Human bones or artifacts have been found with remains of Pleistocene animals at several other points in the Southwest, the finds of Dr. Chester Stock at Bishop's Cap Mountain, New Mexico, and of Mark R. Harrington in Gypsum Cave, Nevada, being especially celebrated. Mr. Harrington found some 900 man-made articles under or in close association with fossilized remains of the extinct little ground sloth (Nothrotherium Shastense Sinclair).

Dr. Spinden can reconcile his theory of man's brief occupation of America with such discoveries as this of Mr. Harrington only by contending that the Pleistocene lasted much later in America than in the Old World. This contention has by no means been proved. Spinden's theory is based on evidence that Old World culture most resembling Amerindian was not in northern parts of the Old World much before 2000 B. C. And he finds that "a wide zone of the Old World, blocking the road to America, was itself unused by man until long after the last continental ice sheet of the Weichsel-Wisconsin glaciation had disappeared. . . . Now the portal to America for man and beast lies at 67° north latitude. We have, then, a no-proof barrier a thousand miles deep which stretches clear across the Old World." Spinden, obviously, assumes that man must have entered America from Asia, and by the Bering Straits or an adjacent northern route. These two assumptions are currently orthodox, of course, and are shared by anthropologists who believe that man has been in America for 20,000 years or longer.

Anthropologists live in the midst of mysteries; they can prove almost nothing, they can only weigh evidence and compare possibilities—in this lie both the weakness and the charm of anthropology. Which is merely an introduction to the remark that, despite the deserved reputation for scholarship which Dr. Spinden enjoys, the majority of anthropologists will hardly follow him in the argument we have been discussing unless more evidence is forthcoming. Their reluctance to accept such a recent date as 2000 B. C. for the arrival of man in America is based largely on the complex and independent nature of American Indian agriculture and languages. These features of American agriculture and languages—often stressed by Dr. Spinden himself in his earlier writings—have convinced many experts that such dissimilarities to Old World agriculture and languages could not have been developed in anything like the short space of 3,900 years which Spinden now proposes.

The American Indian's agriculture, built around beans, squashes, and maize, or "Indian corn" (which some botanists have called the oldest cereal in the world), has given the modern world five-sevenths of all the vegetable products it uses. And when Columbus first sighted the Bahamas there were being spoken in America 150 languages, or more than were being spoken in all the rest of the world combined. Not one of these, moreover, has been found to bear any relation to Old World languages.

In his paper before the American Anthropological Association Dr. Spinden did not meet this agriculture-and-language difficulty. When I asked him about it afterward, he implied that he could not see it as an insuperable obstacle to the acceptance of his theory of the recency of America's occupation.

Few will be able to follow him in this, particularly as regards language, which is one of the most conservative elements in human culture. Could 150 languages have been brought to America since 2000 B. C. without fragments of some of them being left to survive in the Old World? Or could 150 languages have been developed in the New World in only 3,900 years?

Those who know Dr. Spinden may wonder if we have here the familiar and unhappy spectacle of a man growing conservative in middle age. In the past he has often been admired by the more open minds in science for the boldness of his theories. But even the "fundamentalists" in anthropology were shocked by the extreme conservatism of his retiring address. Let us hope he does not return all the way to the position of Dr. James Usher, who won the approval of seventeenth-century scientists with his dictum that the world was created in 4004 B. C.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THAT the Glenn Frank case is not yet ended and that it may drag on for some time is plain, particularly if the Wisconsin legislature should really make a thoroughgoing inquiry into the whole case. Unfortunately, the hearing given to Mr. Frank cannot be called a satisfactory one. It did give him his day in court and enable him to put in his defense, or as much of it as he was ready to offer. But it was not a trial, and the simple fact is that the regents voted on the pre-announced lines and removed the president by one vote as they had already decided to do. The specific charges made by the leader of those who stood with Governor La Follette were not voted upon, although they were formulated at considerable length by Mr. Wilkie and were sent, I assume, since I received a copy through the mail, to a good many persons. Probably we shall only get the final word when the American Association of University Presidents makes its report upon the case.

I think it will find that the bulk of the faculty had a personal liking for Glenn Frank but felt that the time had come for a change, principally on the correct ground that Mr. Frank is not a scholar or an academic leader who takes strong positions, not a man really fitted by training and taste for the headship of so great an institution. If they go into President Frank's handling of the salary cuts for which he was responsible, they will find that these cuts unfortunately bore down most heavily upon the teachers in the lower brackets and were shaded in favor of those in the higher brackets, at the top of which stood himself. The principle that the head of an institution should set the example when it comes to making sacrifices was not followed by Mr. Frank. If the university presidents can then throw real light upon the Governor's connection with the case, they will help a lot. At present there is a conflict of opinion on this subject. The editors of the New York Times stand behind their reporter's account that two regents testified that the Governor called them to his office and gave them a list of four names from which to choose the President's successor—at least they embody this in an editorial. This statement is challenged by others who were present at the hearing.

The Governor has given such excellent service to the state that I hope his future usefulness will not be impaired by proof that he did such a thing. I admit that any governor has the right to state publicly that he considers a given state-university president unfit, and I know that under the existing system in Wisconsin it is very hard for a governor so to act as not to be charged with playing politics with the university. I do not question that Governor La Follette conscientiously believes that Mr. Frank has been a failure. My own position has been from the first that Mr. Frank was entitled to "the fullest statement of any charges brought against him and the opportunity to answer them before all the world," and that a rumored hasty ouster at a suddenly called meeting of the trustees ought to be prevented. This second objective was achieved, and the first also—to the limited extent stated above. Curiously enough, my appeal for fair play was interpreted as meaning that I approved of the retention of Mr. Frank. It is true that President Frank was given the opportunity to resign a year ago so that there would be no public airing of the dissatisfaction with him, but I respect him for having finally chosen to bring it out in the open. If I were in his position today I should be extremely unhappy that the allegations of failure to live up to his financial agreement and to end his public speaking and writing, and of extra and unnecessary expenses charged to the university in addition to his salary, have not been definitely adjudicated.

My third point, in a dispatch to the Madison Capital-Times, was a plea for sound and decent university administration in the future with politics eliminated. Here I should like to make some constructive suggestions. If the legislature views its task seriously and without partisanship, it should devise some plan for separating the governor, so far as possible, from the administration of the university. Let us hope that President Conant of Harvard will be asked to come out, as he has offered to, and, in his words, take up the "question of the proper relation of such a Board of Regents to the whole structure of the state government." (He added, "I cannot help feeling that the arrangements in the state of Wisconsin are not particularly happy in this regard and not such as to reassure those who may have grave doubts about the board during a crisis such as the present.") Professor Stephen Duggan writing in the New York Times has told of the admirable cooperation at Vassar among the board of trustees, the president, the faculty, the students, and the alumnae. Certainly some such scheme should be worked out at Madison. One admirable suggestion made to me is that the president's term should be for ten years only, with a straight salary and no perquisites, and with the possibility of reappointment. Next it seems that there should be some alumni representation upon the Board of Regents and that at least two professors should sit on the board, without vote, to present the faculty's view of administrative problems, these professors to serve for not more than two years. The modification of the relationship of the governor to the university is not so easy to think out, but men like President Conant should find a way.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Word for Winter

BY D. S. SAVAGE

A grief of glaciers smashed my summer slowly
Cutting me off from source and sun
Fixing the tree trunks in a winter vice,
My landscape leveled to a snowflat scene.

Stumbling thin-shod I walked half winter through
An icefast earth with no birds calling.
The cold locked life within each frozen cell,
Anguish ingrown, isolation killing.

But winter-bounded I became winter-weaned
Inured, accustomed to the blood's slow tread
Ate winter's berries, built with ice a wall
For warmth and shelter, mapped the rough tracks I trod.

Now, master of this life that I have made
From snow and silence, fit, no longer loath
To leave, I bale the skins I trapped for trade,
Plan out my route, set compass for the South.

Surrealist Field Day

SURREALISM. By Julien Levy. New York: The Black Sun Press. $3.

MR. LEVY'S book is an anthology of surrealist verse, prose, painting, and objects, printed on paper of five colors in emulation perhaps of Rimbaud's coloring of the vowels. In the prefatory essay surrealism is presented as a "point of view" related to Marxism and theosophy, psychoanalysis and Tibetan Yoga; it is also recommended as a delightful parlor game and a way of life applicable to almost every field, including politics and suicide. Mr. Levy's description of surrealist paintings as "having slight likeness to any object but nevertheless seeming to offer a sort of essence [his italics] of the spirit of the essence of an object," while unjust to the paintings, will serve as an adequate description of his own explanatory essay.

Although the surrealists decry abstract art as a rationalistic exercise with no future, they preserve its doctrines of absolutes, its subjective content, its ideas about pure and instinctive sources of creation independent of experience. Just as the abstract artists wished to limit art to supposedly basic, elemental forms, the surrealists turn to the hidden psychological roots of fantasy as the exclusive subject matter of art. For the surrealists the subconscious is itself an artistic world, a studio within the psyche, continually producing original images, symbols, metaphors, and dramas. Every man is a poet and painter in the dark, creating for his own inner contemplation; it requires the conscious action of the surrealist school—choice and skilful mediums of the subconscious—to bring this underground world to the surface.

The truth is, however, that by fantasy and the subconscious the surrealists mean only certain corners of these fields, the ambiguous, the tormented and violent, and the sexually disturbing. They are not concerned with the subconscious in so far as it is the starting-point of practical and rational activities, but only in its morbid and bizarre aspects. The personal source of a revolutionary's devotion to his cause may lie, as is argued, in obscure conflicts with his father, but the surrealists, who talk much about the "service of the revolution," are far more interested in the uncontrolled grotesque images and symbols formed by such conflicts than in the ordered activity to which they had been indirectly transposed. The world of the subconscious is therefore not a source but a fulfilment, and in the degree that it exhibits disorder and inversion, traces of anxiety and obsession, it is idealized in contrast to the detestable regularity of everyday life. Revolution itself becomes a surrealist phenomenon, a mutilation and inversion of the existing order, in which the great subconscious force of the masses is released.

In the preceding styles distortions and dissections of the human being were bloodless; whatever their remote cause, they appeared to be intellectual adjustments to a scheme or to a set of formal conditions, or the unpremeditated results of a personal calligraphy. In recent surrealism these mutilations become phenomena of nature; the structural elements of the body are bones and not merely geometrical shapes; when a figure is unbalanced, rigid, or hypertrophied, it is supported by crutches, like a real cripple, or like the excavated statues in the museums. When it is cut at a joint, we see the bleeding and raw flesh of the extremity, minutely itemized in the painting, as if actually beheld at arm's length. But these gruesome realities of physical decay and mutilation, addressed to the experience of our own bodies, are never motivated by an action and suggest no consequences; they are projected as strange spectacles, a fantastic debris cast up by the storms within the artist's mind.

The theorizing surrealists believe that to appreciate their art no cultural preparation is needed, only an intuitive spirit responsive to universal and timeless "vital constants" (sex, death, space). The artist himself does not know the meaning of his picture, but the subconscious of the spectator leaps up to greet its fellow-subconscious in the surrealist work, just as in Plato's myth the soul imprisoned in the body recognizes its spiritual compatriot in the beauty of nature. A little reflection will show that the "symbols" of the subconscious are also historical objects which must affect different persons differently, and that the peculiarity of an individual work of art can hardly be grasped through such a generalized symbolism. The bicycles—and more recently the automobiles—in Dali's pictures can be dated, and the suggestiveness and formal aspect of his symbolism presuppose a current emotionality and modern social attitudes. This is admitted by the surrealists when they attempt, with the shadiest logic, to reconcile their theory with Marxism; for their art is described then as a terrifying Gorgon's head to petrify the bourgeois subconscious. On the one hand, surrealism pretends to liberate the individual from the fettering rationality of bourgeois life—the family, religion, the fatherland—by revealing to him a subconscious and irrational realm of freedom; on the other hand, it avowedly reflects in the most vivid form the decay of society and prepares the spectator psychologically for the coming revolution. But today, as these poets and painters, who have created some memorable spooks, address themselves to a wider circle, especially in England and America, which experiences an economic improvement, surrealism becomes more aesthetic and ingratiating, shedding much of the horribleness of its depression iconography; and with the imminence of war and the actual outbreak of the struggle in Spain, which poses disturbing problems to the Spanish surrealists in Paris, the imaginary mutilations appear abstract, trivial, and evasive as well as artistically petty. The consciousness of alternatives in action at once creates new standards of seriousness, and like the abstract painters the surrealists have to concern themselves with the outcome of their present work, its adequacy for a new state of mind and burden of responsibilities. The anthology of Mr. Levy closes interestingly enough with an essay by G. Bachelard virtually announcing the death of surrealism through fusion on a higher plane with "surrationalism," which includes a "surlogic" and a "surempiricism." The argument is detached from any concrete field of application, being illustrated only by references to non-Euclidian geometry. It reduces itself finally to the familiar exhortation that the life of reason should be an adventure and not a routine.

MEYER SCHAPIRO

Defense of Democracy

"WE OR THEY"—TWO WORLDS IN CONFLICT. By Hamilton Fish Armstrong. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

IN THIS admirable little book the editor of Foreign Affairs has most effectively restated the great problem now confronting the world—whether democracy will continue to exist or whether it will be everywhere supplanted by fascism or communism. If it is true that there is little new in his presentation of the problem, he has clothed it with charm, eloquence, freshness, and vigor. The book is an earnest appeal for the preservation of our American institutions and democracy everywhere, and coming from Mr. Armstrong it should penetrate to groups that are usually not reached by appeals for the retention of the fundamentals of American life—free speech, free press, free assembly, and intellectual liberty of every kind. The author is fearlessly outspoken in his attacks upon the dictators and their methods, and he is by no means ready to give up the democratic ship. He sees clearly that democracy has weapons in its armory with which to fight back, and he realizes that unless democracy fights it will lose. For, as he points out, the dictators are sworn to destroy democracy. It is "We or They," as Mussolini put it.

"It would be disastrous," he declares, "to think that devotion to liberal standards requires us to remain on the defensive against those who frankly announce that if once they can manage to secure power they will kill the democratic system of government that gave them their chance. Fascists and Communists so proclaim and have given proof that they mean it." He too, like the Civil Liberties Union, wishes to leave them the right to state their aims and make their arguments, but he would never let them organize their power. Truthfully he remarks that the right of assembly is not the right to wear uniforms and bear arms; and he is utterly opposed to those Americans who might be tempted to cooperate politically with demagogues and embryo dictators, believing, as did some of the business men in Germany, that they can use them and then later get the upper hand over them, which will naturally not be the case. Mr. Armstrong is wrong, however, when he says that "freedom of speech and conscience does not mean the right to advocate the abolition of free speech and freedom of conscience." It certainly does. Wendell Phillips was far more nearly right when he declared that American freedom of speech meant the right to advocate violence up to the very point of committing violence. Whoever says, "I believe in free speech, but—" drives the first nail in the coffin of liberty. Nor can I share the author's belief that we must rush into collective security; unlike myself, he favored from the start our going into the League of Nations. Norman Thomas has correctly written that Mr. Armstrong fails to realize the relationship to the problem of national economic interests.

But his statement of the case is, on the whole, quite admirable. His quotations from the dictators are as apt and forceful as those from Thomas Jefferson, and he realizes that there must be a "general mobilization" of moral opinion against the dictators if we are to be saved. He is not for a preventive war because he knows that if war comes democracy will disappear while it is going on and that the dictators will triumph in the spiritual field while being beaten physically. He regrets the weakness of British and French leadership in the League and out of it. Finally, he sees that to advance democracy we must not only preserve our liberties but adjust our organic law and our machinery to the needs and changed conditions of modern times. Altogether the book is a thrilling treatise for all whose souls are conscious of the dire emergency in which we live, and as such it should have a very wide circulation. Indeed, I should like to make it required reading by the membership of all our chambers of commerce, merchants' associations, Daughters and Sons of the Revolution, and high-school and college students everywhere.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Embattled Tradition in Spain

BEHIND THE SPANISH BARRICADES. By John Langdon-Davies. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.75.

FROM the roof top upon which I sat last year writing "The Olive Field," looking up fifteen miles of the lovely Catalan coast, I could see the chapel upon the promontory of Sant Feliu de Guixols where Langdon-Davies lived. The experience which has enabled him to write this book was largely gathered in Sant Feliu. Thus it is that "Behind the Spanish Barricades" is a book of my own land. It is a song of my own land, a brave, passionate, and sensitive song, written out of truth and understanding. It is perhaps less of a war song than I should have written, yet it is strange how I, who am of the working class, have the same report to make as Langdon-Davies, who, I imagine, comes from another class.

One of the most striking things in this book is the author's understanding of the fact that today in Spain is being waged a battle of traditions, of an old and decadent myth against a new and creative myth. Elsewhere I have said that one of the most important political philosophies in Spain, and I mean anarchism, is itself religious in character. Mr. Langdon-Davies confirms this with his sustained and searching analysis of the minds of representative people whom he met during his recent visit to Spain. His book cannot fail to pose an important question: it has been claimed for the so-called Nationalists of the Franco faction (Italians, Germans, and Moors defending the soul of Spain!) that they are defending the great Spanish tradition against the inroads of the alien barbarism of social revolution. What is the great Spanish tradition and who are defending it? Are the muleteers with their ancient songs, the peasants with their ancient field lore and their age-old aspirations, in the true Spanish tradition? Are those men, craftsmen whose hands have shaped through the centuries the things of daily need, the true defenders? When I read what Langdon-Davies reports and when I remember what I have seen in Spain during this conflict, I can only give one answer. If I search through the privacy of my own mind, using every scruple to reject all that comes from prejudice and instinctive passion, I can still only give one answer. The true Spanish tradition, the creative tradition, is in the keeping of those men who have gone out to battle, ill-armed, often literally unarmed, against the destructive machines of international fascism.

I have said that this is a courageous book. I mean that Mr. Langdon-Davies does not attempt to cover up the violence and the ugliness of civil war, or that part of its evil which has been committed by those on the people's side who, goaded to desperation, have passed beyond the limits of decorum. Churches have been burned, and it is wrong to burn churches. I myself have not burned any churches, though once I presided over a commission which had to decide which images were to be saved from the flames and which were to be burned. In the baptistry of that village church in the Pyrenees precisely one of the points which Mr. Langdon-Davies makes was made to me by an Anarchist militiaman. "This damned junk," he said and he pointed to the charred and tumbled mummery before the church, "is still alive in the minds of many of our people. Once perhaps, it comforted them; now it is just a lingering and shadowy fear." He told me a legend from his own town, Arenys de Mar. The people of Arenys commissioned a statue of the Virgin from a famous image maker of Palma de Mallorca. A tremendous storm arose soon after the statue-bearing ship had left Palma Bay, and not all the prayers and entreaties of the crew could secure divine help against the storm. Suddenly one of the seamen understood what had happened and rushing to the box in which the image was packed, turned it over, whereupon the storm went down. The Virgin had been laid face downward and to express her displeasure had raised the storm.

How charming, you say, a fine, dramatic medieval legend! No such thing. In Arenys the old women will tell you the date of that storm. It was 1861. Do you begin to see that there may be some truth in the Anarchist's statement; that minds whose imaginations are controlled by a culture of this type can never hope to live happily in a world which has placed new techniques and new responsibilities in people's hands?

It is not only the struggle in Catalonia and in the mines of Asturias which Mr. Langdon-Davies describes. He speaks with equal candor of what he saw in Madrid and Toledo. It is a story of simple courage and desperate faith, sometimes, too, of sad confusion and tragic blunder. I suppose my political convictions and my experiences differ from those of the author, but I can only say that to one who has spent many long years in Spain this book is wholly convincing; it rings as true as a well-made bell. Those who are hoping for propaganda, or fearing it, will be disappointed by "Behind the Spanish Barricades." It is hard to believe that any reader will finish this book without turning, in Mr. Langdon-Davies's words, "in humility to the humble folk of Spain—Republicans, Socialists, Communists, Syndicalists, Anarchists, who are groping in horror with their bare hands to save the light from flickering out."

RALPH BATES

Parnell's Career

PARNELL. By Joan Haslip. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.

EVEN as recently as the summer of 1934 there was a small group of young writers in a suburb of Dublin rereading the black-bordered columns of a newspaper dated October 7, 1891. That day brought to Ireland the news of Parnell's death, and that day marked the end of one period of civil war and opened another. It has taken nearly fifty years for Ireland to exorcise the ghost of Parnell's fame and scandal; and it is doubtful even today, after many years of starvation and bloodshed, whether Ireland has yet freed itself from the choice between two evils—a leader without principles or a set of principles without a leader.

Meanwhile Joan Haslip has written a life of Parnell that has all the virtues of the best narrative technique in modern biography. And when one recalls the confusion of controversial fact and legend which surrounds the dramatic climax of Parnell's career, her work seems nothing short of extraordinary. The peculiarity of Parnell's position in the history of nineteenth-century Ireland is that he was hero and villain rolled into one. He was one of those whom Carl Russell Fish used to call "a first-rate second-rate man." Miss Haslip cleverly suggests that there was a strain of insanity in his heritage, and from then onward by the graceful art of understatement she implies that Parnell was certainly neurotic. However true all this may be, a first-rate neurotic needs no apology; Parnell's great flaw was an inability to see his position in terms other than those of personal power. He had little or no capacity for abstract thinking: it was Michael Davitt who forced him to accept the few economic principles that his plans for a united Ireland contained. As mere leader of an opposition bloc in Parliament which under his direction controlled a balance of power between Liberal and Tory, Parnell displayed a military brilliance that may be compared to the tactics of our own General Grant in the decisive battles of the Civil War. But despite his hatred of the British Empire, it is doubtful if Parnell ever understood the strength of the economic forces aligned against him, and even as a master of parliamentary strategy, because of the very forces he could not understand, his brilliance in attack became a mere foil to Gladstone's superior skill in opportunist warfare. To anyone who has read "The Education of Henry Adams" Gladstone's hypocrisy in the Parnell affair seems of one piece with his general tactics in confusing issues to his own advantage. Surely Parnell's almost superstitious fear of Gladstone seems fully justified, for as opportunist against opportunist, Parnell read his own doom in the "Old Man's" friendly gaze, and in 1890, as he was riding to his fall, he said: "I gained nothing by meeting Mr. Gladstone. I was no match for him. He got more out of me than I ever got out of him."

As Miss Haslip tells her story of Parnell's life, the incident of his adulterous intimacy with Mrs. O'Shea assumes the proportions it deserves; Miss Haslip withholds no significant detail of the affair, but it becomes increasingly clear that the O'Shea episode falls into the consistent pattern of Parnell's life. Again Parnell's behavior followed the path of individual destiny with little regard for the emotions or moral prejudices of his people: that was a responsibility he neither understood nor welcomed. Even his closest followers were ignorant of what he planned beyond the moment, and despite his personal integrity he took on the appearance of a "blind man battering blind men." To those who wish a further understanding of the political cynicism which underlies "The

WHICH OF 10 FAMOUS MAKES OF MEN'S SUITS ARE Best Buys?

ALMOST all ready-made clothing looks all right—when you buy it—but the man who is interested in saving money has to know more about a suit of clothes than what is apparent at the time of purchase. Textile experts, working under the direction of Consumers Union, took apart representative suits made by 10 nationally known manufacturers (including Bond, Howard, Crawford, and Hart, Schaffner & Marx); tested the fabrics and linings; examined the workmanship in minute detail, and analyzed the other factors that mean long wear and satisfactory service. The results are published in the current issue of Consumers Union Reports, the monthly publication of a non-profit, nationwide organization of consumers interested in getting the most for their money. This report on suits will tell you how much you should pay and what you should look for when you are buying a ready-made suit of clothes. It rates the different brands, by name, as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Another report in the same issue tells you which of 16 leading brands of men's hose tested are most likely to wear longest.

How CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS save you money

Consumers Union Reports—telling you which brands of shoes tested will wear longest, which tires will give the most mileage per dollar, which automobiles and radios are the "best buys," and which brands of other products are the best values—can save you money and help you to buy intelligently. These Reports—rating products by name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable"—are published by Consumers Union of United States, a nationwide organization of consumers whose chief purpose is to make accurate information about products—based on research by competent and unbiased technicians—available to its members at the lowest possible cost. Information on the labor conditions under which many products are made is also given in the Reports. Incorporated under the laws of New York State as a strictly non-profit organization, Consumers Union is sponsored by many prominent scientists, educators, journalists, labor and progressive leaders. Professor Colston E. Warne, of Amherst, is president of Consumers Union. Arthur Kallet, co-author of 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs, is director, and D. H. Palmer, physicist, is technical supervisor. The membership of Consumers Union has grown in less than a year to more than 25,000—and is increasing, at the present time, at the rate of nearly 1,000 new members a week.

If you, too, want to make sure that you are getting the most for your money fill out and mail the membership application blank below—checking the month with which you wish your membership to begin. Principal subjects covered in past issues are given in the box at the right. The fee—which entitles you to a YEARLY BUYING GUIDE now in preparation as well as to a year's subscription to the Reports—is only $3 a year ($1 a year for the abridged edition covering only the less expensive types of products.) The Reports, beginning from the month checked, will immediately be sent to you.

Also in the Current Issue of CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS

COLD REMEDIES

Hundreds of proprietary articles—ranging from gargles, cough drops, inhalants and ointments to pills, powders, and "scientifically" formulated internal medicines—are being offered today as "remedies" or "cures" for colds. Which, if any, will do what is claimed for them? Are any of them capable of causing serious harm? These questions are answered in the current issue with lists of specific products.

CHILDREN'S UNDERGARMENTS AND SLEEPING GARMENTS

Tested and examined by Consumers Union experts, 12 leading brands of children's cotton underwear are rated in the current issue as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." This report gives the opinions of child specialists on the comparative merits of cotton versus wool underwear, the features which are in children's undergarments. Leading brands of children's sleeping garments are also rated.

SHAVING CREAMS, SOAPS AND LOTIONS

Over 30 different brands of shaving (both the brush and brushless types) and shaving lotions are tested for Consumers Union members. Some of these brands will meet your shaving requirements for a year for as little as 15¢—others will cost ten to twenty times as much. If you want to economize on your shaving bill read this report. It also tells you how to save money on after-shaving lotions.

Also discussed in the January Reports are MAPLE SYRUPS, FLOURS, and other products. All products are rated by brand name.

Principal Subjects in Past Issues of Consumers Union Reports

MAY—Toilet Soaps, Grade A and Grade B Milk, Breakfast Cereals.
JUNE—Automobiles, Gasolines, Preventives, Vegetable Seeds.
JULY—Refrigerators, Used Cars, Oils, Bathing Suits.
AUG.—Oil burners and Heaters, Blacklist of Drugs and Cosmetics, White Breads, Meat.
SEPT.—Shoes, Tires, Whiskies, Woman's Coats.
OCT.—Men's Shirts, Gins, Brandies and Cordials, Electric Razors, Dentifrices, Anti-freeze Solutions.
NOV.—1937 Autos, Radios, Toasters, Wines, Children's Shoes, Winter Oils.
DEC.—Vacuum Cleaners, Fountain Pens, Electric Irons, Blankets, Nose Drops.
JAN.—Men's Suits, Cold Remedies, Flour, Shaving Creams, Children's Undergarments.

MAIL THIS APPLICATION

To: CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc., 55 Vandam St., New York

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

☐ $3 for one year's membership, $2.50 of which is for a year's subscription to the complete edition of Consumers Union Reports.

☐ $1 for a year's membership, 50¢ of which is for a year's subscription to the abridged edition of Consumers Union Reports. (Note: Reports are higher-priced products are not in this edition.)

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Please begin my membership with the issue.

Signature

Address

City and State.....Occupation.....N-1

James T. Farrell says—

"Behind the Moscow Trial will stand, not only as a brilliant attempt to clarify the confused status of this particular trial, but also as a landmark in intelligent political pamphleteering in the American labor and revolutionary movement. I know of no other such work written by an American in my time to match it for clarity, force, intelligence, and logic." ($1.00)

BEHIND THE MOSCOW TRIAL

The Greatest Frame-up in History

BY MAX SHACHTMAN

THE THIRD INTERNATIONAL AFTER LENIN

An analysis of the policies pursued by the Soviet Union and the official communist parties since Lenin's death.

Regular, $3
Popular Edition, $2

2

new books by
LEON TROTSKY

WHITHER FRANCE?

The French crisis from February, 1934, to the recent elections and strikes. Includes the article suppressed by the Blum government.

Cloth, $1 Paper, 50c

At bookstores or PIONEER PUBLISHERS, 100 5th Ave., New York

SCIENCE & SOCIETY

A Marxian Quarterly

WINTER ISSUE: OUT NOW

OUR SOCIAL HERITAGE

By Lancelot Hogben

INTERPRETATIONS OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR

By Richard Enmale

PROBABILITY

By H. Levy

THE MEANING OF CHANGE IN CONTEMPORARY PHILOSOPHY

By Leo Roberts

RECENT SOVIET LINGUISTICS

By Margaret Schlauch

SOME ASPECTS OF LITERARY CRITICISM

By William Phillips and Philip Rahv

THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF MR. KEYNES

By John Darrell

COMMUNICATIONS AND REVIEWS

By Frederick L. Schuman, Simon Kuznets, Ernest Nagel, Edwin Berry Burgum, Samuel Rosenberg, Harry Slochower, Eugene C. Holmes, Mark Harris, Samuel Sillen.

Order your subscription now!

Annual Subscription: $1

Single Copies: 35c

Editorial Office: 6½ Holyoke St., Cambridge, Mass.

Business Office: 30 East 20th St., New York City

Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man," as well as the later poetry of W. B. Yeats, I strongly recommend Miss Haslip's "Parnell." The shadow of the man whom Michael Davitt called "a cold-blooded sensualist" still stalks the streets of Dublin, and in the near distance one still hears the roaring of machine-guns in civil war. Even De Valera's "peace" is the peace of dictatorship in "John Bull's other island."

HORACE GREGORY

New Novels

THE SOUND OF RUNNING FEET. By Josephine Lawrence. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

MISS LAWRENCE writes in great detail about the ordinary lives of ordinary people. This time it is about the clerks and bosses in a none-too-successful real-estate office, each one of them plagued by the same devil—insufficient income. Money, says Miss Lawrence, is the root of all evil if you spend more than you earn, and most persons do. It is all very well for underpaid clerks to try to form a union, but the boss, in his way, is quite as hard up as his clerks are; and the twenty-five-dollar-a-week workers are not suffering much more than those who are paid twice as much. To prove her thesis Miss Lawrence is obliged to include such a litter of shiftless relatives, ill dependents, and extravagant wives as have rarely been brought together inside a book cover. And money in itself can be a dull subject when it is not a heavy, dragging one. Miss Lawrence might reread her Trollope to find out how to make it bright, fearful, and interesting. Meanwhile she has a keen eye and ear; her people are real; and their situations are often pitiful. What she needs is more variety and a touch of humor.

ROSE DEEPROSE. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Sheila Kaye-Smith is earnest, too, but to more purpose. Her men and women are not hard black or white, wise or stupid, but have a blend of characteristics which make them seem human and credible. Rose Deeprose is by nature a farmer, by accident a wife, and as a mother a tragic and passionate failure. Her child is simple-minded; she can bear no other children. She devotes all her strength to cherishing and protecting the daughter whom her husband fears and loathes; out of very love she brings about her daughter's death. This is the material of tragedy and Miss Kaye-Smith manipulates it with considerable power. Her happy ending, however, is forced and irrelevant.

NAKED TO LAUGHTER. By Dorothy McCleary. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

The story of two sisters who loved too well and unwisely and who were both properly jilted for frankness and overgenerosity. Ruby is hearty, energetic, and capable; Mae is a poor, sniffing clinging vine. Each of them lost a man because she wanted him too much. As in her previous novel, "Not for Heaven," Miss McCleary is lively, explicit, and persuasive. Ruby is not the equal of Ma Bostwick in the former book, who loved pansies and manure equally well. But Ruby is a nice, cheerful woman and she should have had better luck; her little millinery shop is as homely and tangible as bread. And without being a tractarian like Miss Lawrence, Miss McCleary points a neat moral: Love 'Em but Don't Tell 'Em.

CAROLINE SMITH

Utopia Revisited

DENMARK—THE COOPERATIVE WAY. By Frederic C. Howe. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

MR. HOWE discovered the cooperative democracy of Denmark some fifteen years ago and described it in a book entitled "Denmark—A Cooperative Commonwealth Ruled by Farmers." This book has been out of print for many years. Now, because of the current interest in co-operation, particularly in the application of the cooperative principles in the Scandinavian countries, Mr. Howe has revisited Denmark and rewritten and enlarged his original report. This time he has called the book, "Denmark—The Cooperative Way," but it still remains the story of a country ruled by farmers. Although the rural population of 1,466,000 is slightly less than half of the total, Denmark is primarily an agricultural country; it has no valuable minerals, no great factory towns; its wealth is produced on the farms. The well-being of the nation, then, depends on the well-being of the farmers. For this reason the railroads of Denmark owned or subsidized by the government are operated at an annual loss; low freight rates for farm produce are assumed to be of greater importance to the welfare of all concerned than the amassing of profits.

But the farmers of Denmark by no means owe their present happy state to the government. They have created their little Utopia through cooperative effort. Ninety per cent of the farmers belong to cooperatives. Through these associations they market their butter, eggs, and bacon. In 1934 Danish farmers were receiving 63 cents of each dollar spent by the consumer for farm products; American farmers were receiving 38 cents—the remainder going to the middlemen. There is no meat trust. Instead of sending animals for slaughter half-way across the country and then shipping the dressed meat back to the point of origin, as we continue to do in the United States, the Danes operate local abattoirs, which are models of efficiency. By-products are fully utilized; operating costs are low. The distribution of eggs, butter, and cheese, for which the Danes are famous, is conducted in the same manner. Quality has improved; standards and grading have been developed; the prices received for farm products have increased.

Some fifty years ago the Danish farmer was ruled by monopolists. This control was broken by the cooperatives. Here, says Mr. Howe, is a pattern for American farmers to copy. Do we seek a solution for the growing farm tenancy in America? Then consider the Danish system, where tenancy has been reduced to 5 per cent. Do we wish to make of the United States an economic as well as a political democracy? Then let us attempt to understand the way in which Denmark has solved the problem.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Howe has merely presented a sketchy outline of the Danish social-insurance plan. Particularly at this time, when there is so much interest in the subject, he should have told us more concerning such matters as the Danish "sick clubs," unemployment insurance, and pension plans.

These, however, are only a part of the social security that the happy Danes have achieved for themselves. Through producers' cooperatives they have won not only economic but political power, trust in themselves and their government. The kingdom of Denmark Mr. Howe finds to be "a justification of democracy"—and of the cooperative movement.

RUTH BRINDZE

ON YOUR GUARD!
The PREVENTION and TREATMENT of SEX DISEASES
By CARL WARREN, B.A., B.S., M.S.J.
Foreword by M. J. EXNER, M.D.
Consulting Physician to the American Social Hygiene Assn.

PART OF CONTENTS

ARE YOU THE ONE IN SEVEN?
Men First, but also Women—Youth, the Dangerous Age—Regarding Race and Rites—The Professional Prostitute—The Amateur Promiscuous Girl—Prevalence among Races—Venereal Diseases and Crime.

PREVENTIVE METHODS AT A GLANCE
Prophylactics for Women—Doctors, Clinics and Hospitals—Disease, Dollars and Cents—The Innocent and the Indiscreet—Love Rites of Venus—Civilization and Syphilization—The 608th Compound of Ehrlich—Syphilis, the Great Masquerader—The Other Sex Maladies.

SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT OF SYPHILIS
How to Tell if You Are Infected and What the Doctor Will Do—How Syphilis May Be Caught—First Signs of Infection—The Second Stage—The Third Stage.

SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT OF GONORRHEA
How to Tell if You Are Infected and What the Doctor Will Do—The Causes of Infection—Dangers of the Disease—The Fallacy of "No Worse Than a Bad Cold"—First Signs of Infection—Complications in Men—Complications in Women—How the Doctor Can Tell—Modern Methods of Treatment—Advice to the Patient—Length of Treatment—Protecting the Baby—Gonorrhea in Children—Gonorrhea Fallacies.

SAFETY FIRST AND FIRST AID
First Army and Navy Experiments—Prophylaxis Proved a Success—The Swing to Pocket Tubes—Popularity of the Condom—How the Doctor Can Tell—Treatment with Drugs—Artificial Fever Therapy—Advice to the Patient—Length of Treatment—A Message to Women—Syphilis in Babies—Fallacies about Syphilis.

ARE DRUG STORE PROPHYLACTICS THE ANSWER?
The Rubber Prophylactic—How to Buy and Use It—Proper Ways to Obtain, Test and Handle Mechanical Preventive Devices—What Is the Sheath?—The Most Popular Prophylactic—Advantages and Disadvantages—Sales Outside of Drug Stores—The Chemical Tube—How to Buy and Use It—Proper Ways to Obtain, Test and Handle the Prophylactic Packet—What Is the Chemical Tube?—Prophylaxis for Gonorrhea—Fried and Found Effective—The Ointment Tube—Advantages and Disadvantages—The Danger of Delay—What Price Safety?—The Sheath or the Tube, Which?

THE HIGHWAY TO HEALTH
How to Avoid the Perils of Quacks and Nostrums—How to Protect Yourself—Tricks of the Trade—Doctors and Drug Stores—What's in the Bottle—Dangers of Self-Treatment—How to Find a Good Doctor—Paying the Doctor Bill—For Those Not Ill.

NOTE

To assure widest possible distribution for "On Your Guard," the price has been fixed at only one dollar.

Free Offer

RETURN COUPON

DO YOU REALIZE THAT

—in SEVEN Americans, ONE of them is suffering with syphilis or gonorrhea, right now? The information in ON YOUR GUARD "Will save the lives of millions!"

DR. H. N. BUNDESEN, President, Board of Health, City of Chicago, says:

"A book of tremendous personal importance to every individual in the United States—should be placed in the hands of every young man and every young woman of college age."

DR. J. L. RICE, Commissioner of Health, New York, says:

"I am in favor of tactfully telling the public the truth about all communicable diseases, including syphilis and gonorrhea."

DR. MAX J. EXNER, Consulting Physician to the American Social Hygiene Association, says:

"If . . . the knowledge and means for the control of syphilis were fully applied . . . the disease could be stamped out in a short time. . . . Many people who have syphilis do not know it. . . ."

DR. WALTER CLARKE, Director, Bureau of Social Hygiene, New York, says:

"'On Your Guard' describes in simple, dignified language the prevention and the control of syphilis and gonorrhea."

LIBERALLY ILLUSTRATED
160 Pages • Cloth Bound

Mail This Coupon to Your Bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 789-N, 251 West 19th St., New York City.

Please send me . . . copies of "On Your Guard." I will pay postman $1.00 plus few cents postage each book. If not entirely satisfied I may return book(s) within 14 days and purchase price WILL BE REFUNDED.

Name

Address

☐ Check here if you want to save postage charges. Enclose only $1.00 for each book and we will prepay postage. Same money-back guarantee, of course.

You and your friends are cordially invited to the
DINNER SPONSORED BY THE NATION

to be held at the Roger Smith Restaurant, 40 East 41st Street, New York City, Thursday, January 28, 1937 at 7 P. M. Dress will be informal. The guests of honor will be

LOUIS FISCHER

The Nation's Russian correspondent, who has reported the Spanish civil war from Madrid for several months, and noted French novelist, who leads an international air squadron in the defense of Madrid.

ANDRE MALRAUX

*The profit of the dinner will be donated by The Nation
 to the North American Committee for the Defense of Spanish Democracy*

Nation dinners were a lively feature of the late nineteen twenties. Without promising a revival—for revivals seldom have the glamor of first runs—we believe that this single performance is more than justified by the brief presence in America of two such distinguished writers and foes of fascism.

TICKETS ONLY $2

In accordance with The Nation's practice, tickets are priced extremely low—only $2.00 each.

Meet our distinguished guests, our editors, and hundreds of other fellow progressives. Bring your intellectually curious friends. Come out for an evening you are certain to remember for years!

Previous Nation dinners have always attracted more than 500 guests. As the seating capacity of the Roger Smith Restaurant is limited to 500, we urge you to mail your reservation as quickly as possible, using the form below.

RESERVATION FORM

DINNER COMMITTEE, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Please reserve _____ places for your dinner on January 28, 1937, at $2 each OR ☐ please reserve a table of ten. I enclose payment in full, $ _____

Name _____

Address _____

1-28-37

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

DRAMA

Realism and Spectacle

"BUT for the Grace of God" (Guild Theater) got a very mixed press, and it is not, to tell the truth, a very good play. On several counts it is, nevertheless, so much better than most of the dramas of social protest seen here during the last few years that it hardly deserves to be singled out or made to suffer for the sins of the genre to which it belongs. Many of the critics, I fancy, have got suddenly tired of "making allowances," and this particular piece has been chosen as scapegoat. Never having been myself inclined to tenderness toward worthy efforts in this particular direction I have nothing to make up for, and I am disposed in consequence to hold with some complacency that I can speak of "But for the Grace of God" with reasonable detachment.

The author is that Leopold Atlas whose sincere if somewhat uninspired play about divorce called "Wednesday's Child" got more than it deserved of critical approval. This time he has chosen as his subject a depression-ridden family and as his chief character a younger son who is driven into fatally amateurish crime when he finds that such honest work as he is able to obtain will not supply the needs of an ailing brother. Mr. Atlas's proletarians are rather more refined in their feelings than members of that class are usually represented to be by their more ardent defenders, but I do not find them less convincing for that, and except for the violence of the climax I find the whole tale credible enough. It is also very much to Mr. Atlas's credit that he does not, except perhaps again near the end, overstate his case or labor too insistently conclusions which are obvious enough from the situations themselves. Surely I am not the only one who has often found himself perversely resisting the argument of a dramatist merely because he labored his case with exasperating insistence, and I am certain that I accepted Mr. Atlas's conclusions the more readily for the very reason that most of the time he is willing to let me formulate them for myself. He seems to know that the case is too strong to require any stacking of the cards, and I, for one, am convinced. Perhaps it is a little hard to believe that this particular young man would actually have shot down his victim as brutally as he does, but that is a relatively minor matter. Mr. Atlas is right. When society sent its policemen to arrest the murderer, it was a bit too late.

In addition it must be admitted that several of the scenes—notably one in the woodworking shop, and another in the locker room of the police station—are realized with considerable force. The fact remains, nevertheless, that, however convincing the play may be, it is also fatally pedestrian and for the most part too easy to anticipate. Nor is truth—even if it happens to be sociological truth—enough to guarantee the success of a play, and there is no use in arguing that it ought to be. The more "unpleasant" the drama, the more necessary it is to compensate the audience in some way, and the moralist or reformer must accept the fact. If he will not or cannot entertain—in the broadest sense of the term—the public will choose someone who will and can. In states where the theater, like everything else, is a monopoly, one may say to the citizen, "Take this or nothing." In democracies like our own it is difficult to do people good against their will. And I for one still prefer the democracies.

After more than a year of postponements and the expenditure of more than $400,000 the Reinhardt-Bel Geddes spectacle called "The Eternal Road" finally opened at the Manhattan Opera House. If by this time there is anyone who does not know that the text is by Franz Werfel and the music by Kurt Weil, then press agency is a lost art; but it may come to others as the same surprise that it came to me that this spectacle which one had given up the hope of seeing turns out to be quite genuinely magnificent.

The outline of the story is simplicity itself. A company of Jews has taken refuge in the synagogue from a mob. To pass the night of terror their rabbi suggests that they should remember their past, and while he reads from a scroll, major incidents of Bible history are acted out on a vast stage above and beyond them. At the end, a messenger arrives to announce their banishment, and the forlorn procession winds out across the area until then reserved for that history of which they now have become a part. The text, as translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, has a simple dignity, but while it is not lost in the spectacle it is, of course, subordinate. There are also at least two fine performances, one by Sam Jaffe as the eternal Adversary and another by Bertha Kunz-Baker, first as Sarah and then as Naomi. But it is the spectacle to which everything else is subservient and which demonstrates again that the reputations of Reinhardt and Bel Geddes are actually based upon a great deal more than the showmanship of the circuses. For one thing the crowds are never merely crowds, and no matter how complicated the groupings may be one never loses the sense of form and organization. For another, there is inexhaustible variety; so that spectacle, which ordinarily grows so quickly monotonous, seems continuously fresh. But most important of all is the mastery of space, the placing of figures in such a way as to emphasize that plasticity which painters have discovered to be, for some mysterious reason, one of the most exciting experiences which can reach us through the eye.

In derogation I have heard it said of "The Eternal Road" that "the movies do this sort of thing better." Nothing could be wider of the mark for the simple reason that such spectacles as this have no relation whatsoever to the realistic spectacles in which the moving picture excels. Nothing could, as a matter of fact, be less realistic. The ancestor of "The Eternal Road" is the medieval mystery play, and the method is the method of convention and symbol. What we see represented is not a person or an event. It is always an idea. And the measure of the art is the adequacy of a very special iconography.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Project 891 presents "The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus" (Maxine Elliott's Theater) with all the odors of Judgment Day and the uproar of a county fair. The production emerges from clouds of burning sulphur and assorted detonations, one half modern vaudeville and one half medieval morality. Incidental effects include floating eyes, a puppet show, a malediction in ragtime chanted by a chorus of friars, a barrage of photographers' flares, a musical score by Paul Bowles, a dance of devils, a buffoon who tees off with a flea while in the process of delousing himself, and an extraordinary array of lights which are put through all the paces of the aurora borealis. Except for the final soliloquy, which is less Faustian than fustian, Orson Welles's reading of Marlowe's text is tasteful and mellifluous in all respects. The spectator, however, is not permitted to discover whether tragedy is being used as a foil to comedy, or comedy to tragedy.

B. B.

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY PUBLICATION . . .

Two Articles on Consumer Cooperatives

During the past four years scores of journalists have commented on the increasing interest in consumers' movements. Few attempts have been made, however, to analyze the complicated developments along all the fronts. In a factual article to appear soon, Colston E. Warne, president of the Consumers' Union of United States, surveys the current cooperative trends and suggests a definite plan of action to unite the scattered consumer forces.

In Oklahoma organized medicine is being pushed about by the gathering forces of the farmer-cooperators. Dr. Shadid, friend of the farmers, who has established a practicable formula which might well serve as a model for a huge and extraordinarily valuable development of medical cooperation, may have his license revoked. But not if the farmers can prevent it! The author of our provocative series on medical politics, James Rorty, presents the case of Dr. Shadid from the point of view of one who firmly believes that national cooperative movements, labor, the farmers, and the medical profession will profit by socialized medicine.

If the Pope Dies—

What will be the effect on Vatican policy of the Pope's probably imminent death? Will the tendencies toward an alliance with fascism be changed? Will the hierarchy be favored against "lay" Catholicism? Will the strong Jesuit influence at the Vatican continue? Will Cardinal Pacelli become pope? In a spirited article which none of our readers will care to miss, Professor Reinhold Niebuhr of the Union Theological Seminary answers these and many other perplexing questions pertinent to the future of the Catholic church.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ 1 year for $5 ☐ 2 years for $8
☐ 3 years for $11 ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c

1-23-37

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
LAST WEEK
The Pulitzer Prize Play

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

by Robert E. Sherwood

with ALFRED LUNT

and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEA., 44 St. W. of B'way, 300 seats $1.10
Mats.: Thurs. and Sat. 2:45. Eves. 8:45

The Theatre Guild presents
(by arrangement with Sidney Harmon)

BUT FOR THE GRACE OF GOD

by Leopold Atlas

GUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of Broadway. Eves. 8:30
Matinees THURSDAY and SATURDAY, 2:30

I. L. PERETZ

Psychologist of Literature

by DR. A. A. ROBACK

1. This is the first complete biography of Peretz in any language.
2. It has received glowing praise from authorities in all parts of the world.
3. The edition is limited to about 800 copies.

"Certainly none may now complain that the great Polish Jew has been left without a literary monument." Dr. Isaac Goldberg, in the B'nai B'rith Magazine.

"Being a psychologist of note, Dr. Roback delves deeply into the soul and life of Peretz. Another virtue of the book is the translation of some of Peretz's short tales, poems and essays to be found therein." New York Post.

"His new biography of the greatest figure in Yiddish literature thus transcends the narrower interests of the average life story. It is at once a life, a psychology, a social study. . . ." Boston Transcript.

"... also chock-full of information. . . . It is clear that Roback read everything that was ever written about Peretz not only in books and journals, but in newspapers and occasional writings." Jewish Daily Forward.

Dr. S. E. Jelliffe (dean of American psychiatrists and psychoanalysts) in Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease. "The acumen marking Dr. Roback's work is of the utmost order. It illuminates on many sides the reciprocation of evidences of comparative literature and social psychology with the approach to mental problems that the study of unconscious processes has made possible."

Nearly 500 Pages, Fully Illustrated
Beautifully Bound, Indexes, Charts, etc.

$2.65 Postage Included

SCI-ART PUBLISHERS, HARVARD SQUARE, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

MUSICRAFT presents:

BACH

Italian Concerto:

Fugue from "Das Musikalische Opfer"

Recorded at the harpsichord by

RALPH KIRKPATRICK. 2 12-inch records. $3.00

MOZART

Quartet in B Flat Major

(K. 589)

PEROLE STRING QUARTET. 2 12-inch records. $3.00

If your dealer cannot supply you, send to

MUSICRAFT RECORDS, Inc.

45 West 45th Street

New York City

The "Your Winter Home"

Vendome

MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.

Private Baths—Private Sun Porches—Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.

M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood 555.

RECORDS

HIGH-FIDELITY or full-range recording, as I have mentioned before, is recording that gets in the high frequencies of the overtones that add quality to the sounds of lower frequency. Recent experience has taught me that for perfect reproduction the frequency range of record and phonograph must be the same—that there is such a thing as a record being of too high fidelity for a phonograph, and vice versa. Playing the new Musicraft recording of Mozart's String Quartet in B flat, Köchel 589, made by the Perole Quartet (two records, $2.50), I was disturbed by a shrillness in the tone of the violin. This was on a superb Scott machine employing only its chief speaker at a frequency range up to 6,000 cycles; when the machine's auxiliary speakers for high-fidelity radio reception were added, extending the frequency range beyond the 8,000 cycles of the machine's Astatic "S" crystal pick-up, not only did the tone of the violin improve, but the quality of the other strings acquired greater brightness and life. Evidently, without the auxiliary speakers the overtones of high frequency had been blocked. But the auxiliary speakers had previously been disconnected for Victor and Columbia records because of their disadvantageous effect on the tone. It therefore seemed possible that Victor and Columbia, to insure good results on normally good machines, had been keeping their records within the frequency range of such machines, but that these Musicraft records were of such high fidelity that they lost something even on a machine with a frequency range up to 6,000. And when I inquired of Musicraft I was told that the company had in fact deliberated whether to make a record adapted to the limitations of the average machine or to make the best possible record—one with the highest possible frequency range; and that it had decided for the best possible record.

The result of this decision in the case of Musicraft's records of Bach's Italian Concerto by Ralph Kirkpatrick (two records, $3.00) is harpsichord recording of amazing and unprecedented fidelity. Wanda Landowska's recent records of Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue are superb in style of performance and superb in sound—but in a sound that is altered by recording into something different from the true sound of the harpsichord. Musicraft gives this tone sound.

I cannot report on the quality of the Musicraft surface, for I played test pressings made on a special material. Kirkpatrick's playing is excellent; and the Perole Quartet gives a finely wrought performance of Mozart's quartet, which is here recorded for the first time, and which I think more of than others seem to do. No work of Mozart's as late as this one could be entirely without the quality of the marvelous Piano Concerto in B flat, Köchel 595, recorded by Schnabel, and the weaknesses of the quartet—to paraphrase Tovey's observation about Schubert—are relaxations of its powers.

Victor's outstanding January release is its single record ($2) of Rossini's Overture to "The Italians in Algiers" made by Arturo Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. On a recent Victor single ($2) is superb playing by Horowitz, marvelously recorded, of Chopin's Mazurka Opus 50, No. 3, and Etudes Opus 10, Nos. 4 and 5. And on still another single ($1.50) Marian Anderson wastes her talents on two songs of Sibelius: "Saf, Saf, Susa," and "Flicker Kom Ifran."

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Behind the Pan-American Front

Dear Sirs: Mr. Naft's article in The Nation of December 12 betrayed the lack of realism that one has come to expect in almost all discussions touching upon the acts of the Roosevelt Administration. Surely Mr. Naft has never read the correspondence and other documents bearing upon and leading up to the actual statement of the Monroe Doctrine or even Monroe's message to Congress of December 2, 1823. Otherwise he would not have said that "Roosevelt's idea of mutual protection is actually foreign to the original idea of Monroe." And he would never have said that the President's address in Buenos Aires "was a challenge against the implantation of European fascism and a warning to non-American nations to keep hands off this continent."

Mr. Naft assumes, and rests his case in the main upon this assumption, that the Americas are now open to military invasion from overseas. No conscientious military student, jealous of his good name, would lend his support to any such demonstrably absurd statement. Even in their most extravagant testimony, given before Congressional committees, the admirals and generals have never gone so far as to say flatly that this country stands in danger of invasion from abroad. They have insinuated as much, to be sure; for if that notion sinks in, military appropriations are bound to get bigger. But no admiral or general has dared to commit himself on the point.

Mr. Naft suggests, too, that Guam is needed to protect the Panama Canal. America could give Guam to Japan and the canal would have as much protection as it has today. Indeed, America will some day have to give up Guam, for that island cannot even protect itself. A better case might be made out for Hawaii, but the fact is, unfortunately, that Hawaii is being prepared for use as a base for offensive operations in the Pacific, not for defensive purposes. It is, however, in his suggestion that the submarine and airplane have made America vulnerable to attack from overseas that Mr. Naft makes his major error, for by this very suggestion he inferentially reveals that America is not open to such attack.

No territory anywhere can be conquered by submarines or airplanes. No territory anywhere can be conquered without the aid of a landing force or ground troops. And it is still a physical impossibility for any power, or combination of powers, to move across either ocean an expeditionary force large enough to make a successful landing and establish a base in the Americas. In fact, such an expedition (even if its destination were somewhere in the lower extremity of South America) would not be allowed to start unless the American fleet had first been wiped out, and if the American fleet remained in his own waters, a naval force at least twice its size would be required to wipe it out. Now if Mr. Naft had pointed to some new and revolutionary development in the shipping field that had rendered the American navy worthless and made it possible for any enemy to move a gigantic expeditionary force across three thousand miles or more of open sea, his thesis would at least have been plausible. But he chose to support his argument by pointing to two devices neither of which can possibly be regarded as a threat to American territorial integrity. With all apologies to Mr. Naft and to the press agents for certain American aviation firms, there is not in existence in any country today a single bombing plane that can fly under war conditions and with a full load of fuel and explosives a distance of three thousand miles, or even one thousand miles. Tales to the contrary are put out solely for military propaganda purposes. And even if one could fly across either ocean and bomb a target selected in advance, its mission would be pointless. The destruction it wrought would be purely wanton and would gain the enemy nothing.

Unless they have been completely misled, an assumption that cannot be credited, the governments represented at Buenos Aires know all this. They know that the purpose of that conference was not to form an American defensive alliance. They know, above all, that that is not the objective Messrs. Roosevelt and Hull have in view. Nor is "democracy" the real goal, nor yet "peace in the Americas." It is childish to speak of democracy in connection with the South American countries, when Colombia alone of these countries has anything resembling a democratic government; when, as Mr. Naft himself concedes, most of these countries are governed by outright military or fascist dictatorships. No doubt the President and the Secretary of State would like to keep Latin America at peace, but it would be naive for either of them to suppose that another anti-war treaty would do the trick. After all, no less than twenty-six conventions, agreements, treaties, resolutions, and the like for the peaceful adjustment of disputes between the American states have been adopted at the various pan-American conferences since 1889.

Yet in this question of peace we come close to the heart of the matter. Peace is essential to the development and exploitation of markets. And it was to obtain a larger share of the South American market for the United States that Messrs. Roosevelt and Hull uttered high-flown phrases in Buenos Aires. They have a major goal and one or two minor objectives. With regard to the latter, they want to make sure of two things. First, they want it so arranged that when the United States gets into the coming imperialist war none of the South American republics will be found fighting on the other side. Second, they want to protect the sources of certain raw materials that America might need in that war. Meanwhile, of course, they want to see to it that, pending the entry of the United States into the next world war, the United States gets the trade that Europe and Asia must perforce abandon if the Americas, in consequence of the "new neutrality," isolate themselves at the beginning of that war.

But the major objective was to push England, Germany, and Japan out of the South American market in time of peace as well as in time of war as far as that can be done. That is the purpose, and the only purpose, of the so-called "good-neighbor" policy. It is but another example of that "peaceful economic penetration" to which modern imperialists everywhere are turning—so long as peace serves their purposes. If Mr. Roosevelt can persuade the South American countries that the United States has mended its ways, ought not these countries to reciprocate by buying more American goods? That at least is what they are expected to do.

But this does not mean that the United States has renounced its "right" to intervene. It has renounced nothing. It will have the "right" to intervene so long as it possesses the power to do so. The very fact that it is maintaining armed forces far larger than it needs for genuine self-defense reveals that in the last analysis it intends to depend upon its armed strength in any matter involving its self-interest, or "national interest," whether in South America or elsewhere.

Behind the pan-American front? Peace? Democracy? Not at all. It is just the old American imperialism in a new false-face. And when it comes to a showdown the results will be no different from what they have been in the past.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Glenwood, Md., December 13

Free Speech in Ireland

Dear Sirs: While in Dublin recently I discovered that Sean O'Faolain, author of "A Nest of Simple Folk," "The Life Story of Eamon de Valera," and other works, was being detained in Drogheda jail for daring to speak in behalf of imprisoned Irishmen who had republican sentiments. No public charge has, so far as I am aware, been preferred against Mr. O'Faolain; neither has this most gifted of the younger Irish writers been given any trial. When I left the country he was still in jail, having been arrested on November 29.

The news account that appeared in Mr. de Valera's newspaper, the Irish Press, on November 30 was a typical example of evasion and censorship such as is found in countries under dictators, and would leave the outside world totally ignorant of Mr. O'Faolain's continued imprisonment. It said:

A baton charge followed the arrest of one of the speakers at a meeting held at the Tholsel, Drogheda, last night. The meeting, which was addressed by speakers from Dublin, Dundalk, and Drogheda, was held "to protest against the detention of local republican prisoners." When it concluded and those in attendance were dispersing, one of the speakers whose name was announced as "O'Faolain" was apprehended at West Street and hustled into a waiting motor car by detectives and Gardai. . . .

I need hardly remind your readers that President de Valera, who today heads the Irish government and is responsible for this state of affairs, was himself a republican who actually took up arms not only against the British government (1916) but also against fellow-Irishmen (the Civil War) who did not see the republic from his point of view.

"ESSENTIAL READING
FOR ANYONE WHO WISHES
TO UNDERSTAND THE
PROCESSES SHAPING
THE WORLD TODAY"

—The Baltimore Sun

In this book, written not to frighten, but to warn, the author of Hitler Over Europe answers the question that overshadows the world of 1937. Will the next twelve months witness a fight to the finish between the forces of Fascism, led by Germany, and the forces of Socialism, led by Russia? Here is the documented, considered, relentless analysis of a brilliant political analyst. Price $2.50.

HITLER OVER RUSSIA?

The Coming Fight Between the Fascist and The Socialist Armies
BY ERNST HENRI

SIMON AND SCHUSTER, Publishers, 386-4th Ave., N. Y. C.

It is my sincere hope that the publication of this letter will lead to the forwarding of protests to the Irish government against the unjustified treatment being meted out today to such men as Mr. O'Faolain, for whose writings and opinions one must have the highest respect.

JOHN O'HARA HARTE
Philadelphia, January 6

CONTRIBUTORS

HAROLD J. LASKI has long been an influential member of the British Labor Party, and it is to him that the English liberal periodicals generally turn for interpretation of left politics.

ROBERT W. HORTON is Washington correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspaper Alliance.

SAMUEL ROMER, a resident of Detroit, has contributed articles on automobile labor to The Nation in past crises. Once editor of a Socialist paper and correspondent of the Federated Press, he is now a free-lance journalist.

FLOYD DELL is best known as a novelist but has written pieces in almost every other literary form. His autobiography, "Homecoming," was published in 1933, and a play, "Little Accident," was a Broadway hit in 1928.

GREGORY MASON, anthropologist and explorer, has led many expeditions to Central and South America to study the ancient culture of those regions.

D. S. SAVAGE is an English poet whose verses have been published in this country by the magazine Poetry.

MEYER SCHAPIRO is a member of the faculty of fine arts and archaeology at Columbia University.

RALPH BATES, author of "The Olive Field," a novel of rural Spain, is an Englishman who has lived in Spain for many years. At present he is on a brief visit to this country.

HORACE GREGORY, poet and literary critic, has long had a special interest in Irish history.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One Year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

113

EDITORIALS:

ADVENTURE IN BLUEPRINTS

116

ACT OF GOD

117

JAPAN'S FATAL DILEMMA

117

TOM PAINE, BRIDGE-BUILDER

118

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

119

PIUS XI AND HIS SUCCESSOR

by Reinhold Niebuhr

120

A G. M. STOCKHOLDER VISITS FLINT

by Robert Morss Lovett

123

GERMANY'S ECONOMIC IMPASSE. HOW HITLER

PAYS HIS ARMS BILL by Alexander Vidakovic 125

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

127

BROUN'S PAGE

128

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

PSYCHOANALYZING ALICE by Joseph Wood Krutch 129

BEHIND THE LINES by William Troy 130

THE CONSTANTS OF SOCIAL RELATIVITY

by Kenneth Burke 131

MODERN AND/OR CONTEMPORARY by Ben Belitt 131

THE COMMUNITY AS A HERO by Mary McCarthy 132

THE ECONOMICS OF CHINESE HISTORY

by Maxwell S. Stewart 133

A GENERAL TELLS SOME TRUTHS

by Oswald Garrison Villard 134

SHORTER NOTICES

135

DRAMA: NEAR THE BOHEMIAN COAST

by Joseph Wood Krutch 136

FILMS: BLACK IS BLACK by Mark Van Doren

137

DRAWINGS by Bert Hayden and William Steig

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

JOHN L. LEWIS, ACCORDING TO THE PRESS, showed himself to be an incorrigible bully and a bad strategist when he reminded the President of labor's help in the election. According to this view Lewis put himself in a class with the tariff barons and other disreputable gentlemen who have demanded payment for political aid, and by so doing injured his prestige. According to another, sympathetic, view his manifesto was bound to turn away Roosevelt's support rather than enlist it. Paul Ward, on another page, gives cogent reasons for disagreeing with both views. Obviously one cannot make a final judgment until many more General Motors cars have failed to come out of the slot and the efforts of Miss Perkins can be appraised in terms of practical results. But the newspapers put upon Lewis's statement an emphasis quite disproportionate to his actual words. They will sound simple and sensible to workers in the steel towns who voted for Roosevelt because he had promised to enforce collective bargaining. The middle-class reader should not be misled by the editorial sorrow of the newspapers. We may be sure that they are not primarily concerned with protecting the virtue of the President. They are out to discredit Lewis—who helped to discredit them and their masters in the election.

★

THE EFFORTS TO RAISE FUNDS FOR SENDING enlisted American volunteers to the Spanish loyalist forces have run into many snags—legal and strategic. The Communists have opposed the move as an open invitation to government interference. The government has taken no action but has published a warning of the legal penalties attached to enlisting or aiding enlistment. On the basis of this announcement and on the advice of its lawyers, The Nation has declined to carry an advertisement of the "Friends of the Debs Column," although it had previously published one. Meanwhile sufficient money has apparently been collected to make certain the dispatch of some 500 volunteers within a few days. What the final outcome will be is still in the lap of the Attorney General. We can only hope that no effort will be made to apply the full rigors of a law, ignored or loosely interpreted in the past, to the present effort to help Spain. Whether or not the strategy of the Debs Column was wise, its purposes are generous. Our government has welcomed the help of foreign volunteers in its own struggle to win its liberty. It has allowed its citizens freely to enlist in foreign wars—from China to Chile. If it clamps legal restrictions on volunteers to Spain it will reverse its usual practice directly in the interests of fascism in Spain—and in Italy and Germany.

★

THE HORROR OF THE NEW MOSCOW TRIAL IS inescapable, whatever one's belief about the guilt of the accused. In this trial we have for our better information the reports of Walter Duranty in the New York Times. His first accounts indicate a clear belief in the validity of the confessions, despite what would seem their incredible content. He says that documentary evidence against the accused will supplement their testimony. The Soviet government will do well to present every available bit of corroborative material. Confessions not supported by the evidence of witnesses not directly implicated will always be open to suspicion. As the confessions and testimony pile up from day to day, the sympathetic observer who has no political commitments of his own faces a choice of intolerable alternatives. If the defendants are not guilty as charged, no liberal can excuse the resort by a government to such measures, no matter what foreign dangers or other political realities may be cited in extenuation. If, on the other hand, the charges are essentially true, if it is true that these men who were the brain and conscience of the Russian Revolution in its early days and played a prominent part in the government until their arrest, actually sought to sell out the revolution itself to the reactionary governments of Germany and Japan, then the whole fabric of the October revolution crumbles away. A Socialist government that, for all its economic gains, is so riddled with conspiracies cannot lay claim to the trust that liberals have thus far accorded it.

★

WE DOUBT THAT THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS will go down in history as a great state paper. Neither in its literary quality nor in the tenor of its program did it carry conviction. There was a thin but pleasant sort of rhetoric about it, and it was drenched in a moral goodwill, but it failed to recapture the ringing faith, the clear call to action, and the decisiveness of the first inaugural address. Either Mr. Roosevelt must have some sort of emergency to bring out his best powers, or else we have grown immune to his generalities during the last four years. But the address might have been far worse. It might have struck the "era of good feeling" note, or the complacent note of America's return to the pre-1929 Golden Age. That would probably have been Mr. Landon's inaugural, had he been given a chance at one. Instead, Mr. Roosevelt dedicated himself to reaching the "happy valley" of permanently improved living standards under democratic procedures. His address was distinctive as a picture, drawn for the first time by an American President, of poverty under capitalism. But the President did not make clear, even in general terms, how he would reach the happy valley. Is it to be by a steady and gradual march to a firm control over industry? Or is it to be by dotting the i's and crossing the t's of the old New Deal?

COUNSEL FOR DEFENSE IN THE BOMBING case in Wilkes-Barre have broken the back of one of the most intricate frame-ups in recent legal history. Last October Emerson Jennings, who had been conducting a one-man crusade against the corruption of the Lucerne County courts and particularly against Judge W. A. Valentine in the prosecution of miners' trials, was convicted of bombing the Judge's automobile. Evidence for the prosecution, smacking of the Gestapo, had been concocted by a pack of shady county detectives from dictaphone records taken in hotel rooms. In hearings for a retrial that have just been concluded, the defense attorney, Arthur Garfield Hays, with the help of Francis D. Biddle, Dudley Field Malone, and local counsel, proved that the evidence had been falsified and shot the state's case so full of holes that nothing was left but the frame. When the smoke had cleared, the prosecution's chief witnesses were all under arrest for perjury. Although Judge Shull, who presided over the hearings with conspicuous fairness, has not yet handed down his decision, a retrial seems certain. Since the state has no case left and will have to quash the indictment, this amounts to Jennings's acquittal. We congratulate the defense counsel and the judge for showing that even in labor cases justice need not be blind.

★

AS THESE LINES ARE BEING READ THE NAZIS will be celebrating the fourth anniversary of Hitler's accession to power. No one will deny that they have been momentous years, or that great gains have been recorded. Industrial production has risen from 64 per cent of the 1929 level to 113 per cent of the pre-depression volume. Unemployment has been cut from six to slightly more than one million. The country has won again the "right" to arm; it has annexed the Saar; freed itself from its burdensome foreign debts; remilitarized the Rhineland; reasserted its control over internal rivers and canals; and weaned Mussolini from the Stresa front. But, as Mr. Vidakovic shows elsewhere in this issue, these achievements have been at a terrific price. Rearmament and work creation have piled up a debt of approximately 30 billion marks. Foodstuffs, particularly fats, meat, and dairy products, have become scarce. Five per cent of the country's grain acreage has been taken out of production during a period when food imports were being reduced by two-thirds. Wages have been at a standstill for four years, but the cost of living has risen by at least 6 per cent. Self-sufficiency has been won in oil and rubber, but the substitutes cost from two to six times the normal price. On the foreign front Hitler's successes, culminating in the recently established fascist front, have been won by utter disregard of promises, with a consequent harvest of suspicion and bitterness throughout the world. Yet it is the law of fascism that each victory requires something more spectacular next time, and it is not unfitting that Hitler should celebrate his anniversary by launching a series of vindictive press attacks on Czecho-Slovakia, which seems destined to be the next recipient of Nazi culture.

THE FACT THAT HITLER IS UNLIKELY TO abandon his single-minded policy in the face of last-minute offers of economic cooperation by England and France does not destroy the statesman-like quality of Mr. Eden's and M. Blum's speeches during the past week. War may seem inevitable, but until hostilities commence all hope is not lost. And if war is to be averted, it is evident that it will be through a series of mutual concessions such as the two statesmen outlined. The unrealistic element in the speeches is solely a matter of timing. Göring and Mussolini had just agreed to prosecute the war in Spain to the utmost. In reaching this decision they were obviously motivated by the conviction that neither France nor England would impose any insuperable obstacles to the fascist domination of Spain. Under the circumstances Blum's offer of economic collaboration, despite its qualifications, was interpreted as an admission of weakness and contemptuously rejected. M. Blum has displayed rare gifts as an administrator and a conciliator, but he has learned little regarding fascist mentality.

★

ENGLAND HAS A NEW LABOR WEEKLY, THE Tribune, the first issue of which has just reached us. Its editor is William Mellor, who edited the Daily Herald before it sank to its neck in the quagmire of reactionary trade unionism. Its contributors and supporters come from the best elements in the British Labor Party—Cripps, Laski, Wilkinson, Pritt, Brockway, and others who are seeking to instil new energy into the now stagnant British labor movement. The style is crisp and popular; the program advanced is forthright and courageous. The newcomer will need our best wishes and aid, for it faces a task at once difficult and crucial—that of making British labor understand before it is too late that it holds the key to the world struggle from which the democratic scheme of life will emerge either strengthened or destroyed. In America a younger labor movement is beginning to develop its own press. We are happy to have a report that the lively and militant labor weekly newspaper, the People's Press, has reached a circulation of 150,000. Its progress is due to the realistic way in which it seeks to reach the workers and their families in terms of the daily experience they will understand.

★

THE PRESIDENT DESERVES FULL SUPPORT IN his request for a three-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act, giving him power to conclude reciprocal tariff agreements without the approval of the Senate. While the progress in the past three years has seemed slow and in many respects inadequate, none can deny the value of liberalizing American trade policy in a day when the dominant trend has been toward economic nationalism. Most of the fifteen trade agreements have been with countries with which we have relatively little trade, but the pacts with Canada, Cuba, and Belgium have shown that the State Department can overcome substantial obstacles when the stakes are high enough. At times it has looked as if the United States were driving a hard bargain, demanding greater concessions than it was willing to give in return; despite this, our international trade is more nearly in balance than at any time since the war. That this could be achieved in the face of the devaluation of the dollar and despite the President's peremptory note which wrecked the London Economic Conference is largely due to the untiring, single-handed efforts of Cordell Hull. As long as he remains Secretary of State we need not fear to put full tariff powers in the hands of the Administration.

★

MR. RUNCIMAN'S WEEK-END AT THE WHITE House, which was generally regarded as a prelude to a bigger and better addition to Mr. Hull's trade pact, has resulted in a tentative agreement to that effect. The President, in whom neo-Wilsonian ambitions are not absent, may feel that an Anglo-American trade agreement, stimulating a general loosening of tariffs and unfreezing the flow of world trade, would be the most effective gesture he could make for world peace. As for the President of the Board of Trade of Great Britain, is he here to woo Mr. Roosevelt or to threaten him? England is frightened by the rise of the Nye neutrality sentiment in this country. Should it become law it would mean no goods to any belligerents in any war. Mr. Roosevelt is already opposed to mandatory neutrality. But Mr. Runciman may be giving him an extra push in the form of a warning that England will start now buying from others those materials it could not obtain from us in war time. Mr. Runciman may also have suggested that the Ottawa agreements, which are due for revision and renewal, are likely to adopt a further trend toward Empire self-sufficiency unless—unless what? Whisper it not on Capitol Hill, but the word is credits. However, with the Johnson Act barring the way, any credits which Great Britain might look to us for would have to be preceded by something more substantial than "token" payments on war debts.

★

MR. DOOLEY ONCE SAID OF HIS NEIGHBORS, "In Ar-rchey Road whin a marrid couple get to th' pint where 'tis impossible f'r thim to go on livin' together they go on livin' together." This is evidently the principle which guides members of the British House of Commons as they sit in solemn conclave over the Marriage bill introduced by A. P. Herbert, who for years has been trying to alleviate the strictness of England's divorce laws. The obstacles he faces are attested by the recent debates in the Commons, which drew a harrowing picture of England—its religion abolished, its moral principles "cut right across," and Soviet Russia calling the turn—in the event that a clause making three years of desertion grounds for divorce was allowed to stand. The desertion clause survived the vote, but incurable drunkenness as grounds was deleted as "a blow to the unity and sanctity of the home." The English, in their latest "periodic fit of morality," appear to believe that the sanctity of the home is better preserved by keeping a drunkard inside than outside it.

Adventure in Blueprints

THE President may be far from inaugurating a second New Deal in economics, but he seems to have launched a brand new New Deal in the realm of government administration. He has dropped the Brownlow report like a bomb into the Congressional midst, and is now sitting back with Rooseveltian gaiety to hear the reverberations.

Our own reverberation is to rejoice that—regardless of the merits of this particular program—some program of administrative reorganization has been projected. Anyone acquainted with the history of the American spoils system since Andrew Jackson would have been skeptical that a President would dare attempt a general administrative house-cleaning. It would seem a task that seven maids with seven mops sweeping for half a year could not attempt with any prospect of success. But Mr. Roosevelt is nothing if not daring—where he dares to be.

Granted its premises and its limits, the report is as intelligent a review of the problem of administration as we have yet had from official sources. Drawn up by a commission of three—two Chicagoans and a New Yorker, each of them combining elements of the professor and the practical executive, it is a mixture of treatise and plan of strategy, of some pompous rhetoric, some shrewd phrases, and some hard sense. Its general outlines are by now familiar: strengthen the President's immediate personal staff, and day-dream of giving him six assistants of "high competence, great physical vigor, and a passion for anonymity"; extend the merit system "upward, outward, and downward" to include all except policy-making posts; clean out the present Civil Service Commission and replace it with a Civil Service Administrator and a non-salaried Civil Service Board of seven members; glorify the Bureau of the Budget, get rid of all past and future McCarls (masquerading as comptrollers) and set up instead an Auditor General (hoping that a McCarl won't turn up in the new disguise); set up a permanent National Resources Board to do whatever planning can be jammed through the crevices of capitalist activity; set up twelve Cabinet departments, adding Social Welfare and Public Works (why not also National Defense?) to the existing departments; corral all the stray mavericks of existing boards, commissions, and government corporations within the neat and tidy fences of the departments.

Such is the program. Obviously it takes a long step toward a further strengthening of the American executive—a step intended to give flexibility and decisiveness to the action of democracies in a complex world, but one which should none the less be scrutinized in terms that go beyond "economy" and "efficiency." Economy this program will obviously not yield. Efficiency it will yield, but we must be wary lest it turn out to be primarily a paper-clip efficiency. It is clear that the committee has taken as its model the line-and-staff administrative organization of the big business corporation. That would be all to the good—if government were a big business corporation. But it is not. Its essence is not the handing down of ukases made in the single pursuit of profit, but the pooling of the best judgments in the difficult pursuit of the common good. A line-and-staff organization, with power radiating down from the top-center, is fine for such predatory exploits as war and industrial enterprise. But government administration, even at the risk of not looking so well on the blueprints, must have less stiffness, more room for those considered and varied judgments that flow from the relative autonomy of certain agencies. This is especially true if government is to be, as President Roosevelt insists it must be, an experimental art.

As regards the merit system, everyone who cares about good government will welcome its extension. This is especially true of those who look forward to a Labor Party government, the success of which will largely depend on a trained career service. The committee's proposal, however, to concentrate power in a Civil Service Administrator, while it gives a flexibility sorely needed now in the Civil Service in Washington, has its obvious danger of being a back-door return to the spoils system.

We can say unreservedly that to put such quasi-judicial agencies as the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the National Labor Relations Board under neat Cabinet roofs would not be a way of modernizing the executive department but a drastic step backward. Behind the proposal may be many good intentions: for example, to avoid the sort of friction that has just developed between Secretary Morgenthau and the Interstate Commerce Commission on the question of the corporate-surplus tax; to insure also that with each incoming President a Cabinet officer appointed by him would be able to supervise some of the holdover commissioners. But first of all, this would create rather than avoid friction. Secondly, the object of government is not to avoid friction but to get things done. And the heart of the matter is that the commissions that would be severely affected by this move are for the most part those whose job it is to get something done in regulating business. What rejoicing there will be among the economic royalists when the ICC, the FTC, the NLRB, the TVA, and the SEC are placed under the ultimate control of department heads, where whatever traditions of real concern for the welfare of worker or consumer they have developed will be whittled away by the continuous review of day-to-day decisions. Even the "semi-autonomous status" that the report suggests for them would seem, under such conditions, to be mainly rhetoric.

The place for such agencies should ultimately be under some real central-planning board, which could coordinate their activities within a general framework of socialization. That, for the present, is a counsel of perfection. But it is relevant to point out that until progress toward such socialization is made, the problem of the personnel which shall run this vast machine that the report contemplates remains unsolved. We talk of bureaucracy, but what makes for bureaucracy is the thinning out of the élan of officials because of the daily compromises they must make between the public welfare and the demands of the dominant economic group. What makes for bureaucracy is the draining off of the best administrative blood by the encroachments of business offers and the subtle corruption of money values in a money society.

Until we can meet and solve that basic problem all our schemes for government reorganization are doomed to be so many heroic adventures in blueprints. Until we have put some order into our economic lives such admirable projects as the Brownlow report will continue to be desperate efforts to superimpose the planfulness of an administrative system upon the planlessness of an economic system.

Act of God

THE floods that are overwhelming the populous Ohio valley and endangering the lives of millions, come again as a fresh shock. There have always been floods on the Ohio, greater floods or lesser, but always disastrous to the river communities. Acts of God, the lawyers call them, in dodging the private liabilities involved. Nationally considered, rather than theologico-legally, the floods are proof of man's incapacity to plan.

We cannot control the rainfall. What we can do is to make systematic provision for storage dams on the tributaries of the Ohio, to skim the comb off the floods, to transform a seventy-five-foot stage into a fifty-foot stage, with which the river communities can somehow cope. This would cost money, hundreds of millions of money. But we are not likely to shrink from the thought of an expenditure of hundreds of millions for the Nicaragua Canal, if such a canal would strengthen our national defenses. The enemies that really threaten America are not the foreign imperialistic powers, which for all their stupidities realize that the United States is a good country to let alone. No: our real enemies are the forces of nature and man within our own borders, which shatter the hopes and turn to the worse great numbers of our own citizens, whose happiness is the real bulwark of our republic. Flood is one of these malignant forces; planlessness and the fear of spending public money for non-spectacular purposes are far more malignant.

But in most matters of the kind we have to deal with a still more malignant force—private interest, and the incurable disposition of our government to alternate babying of it with bullying. Flood control on the tributaries of the Ohio would mean scores of dams, each one capable of producing hydroelectric power which could be sold cheaply, since it would be a by-product. Can the private power interests endure the thought of such competition? Hardly. There will be little demand from the Senators and Congressmen from the flooded states for a solution that might play hob with the power interests.

In the early years of the World War a great engineer, Dr. Pierson, who had supplied Rio de Janeiro with modern utilities and who was taming the River Ebro in Spain in the hope of taming Catalonia, conceived a plan of putting the Monongahela and Youghigheny rivers to work. Starting high toward their sources he proposed to extract a few thousand kilowatts; moving down the rivers he proposed to set up dam after dam, wherever a good storage could be developed without drowning too much valuable country. He calculated that he could supply Pittsburgh and a radius of a hundred miles with power at less than half the cost of steam-generated power. And he calculated as part of his cost buying up all the steam plants at a generous margin over their actual worth.

Pierson was a great capitalist and a great planner. He had a weakness: he wanted his operations to conform to the law and the rules of government. He consulted the appropriate Cabinet member, who informed him that his plan involved so many infringements of the Sherman Act that he would probably be sentenced to jail for one thousand years. And so Pierson dropped the project and set out for Spain, to continue the taming of the Ebro. He sailed on the Lusitania and went down, but no New York newspaper mentioned the fact, then or since, although Pierson was by far the most important passenger. Then, it would have disturbed the market, for the Pierson interests were far flung. Later, it was ancient history.

The reader will pardon this ancient history. The last disastrous twenty feet of flood came out of the Monongahela and Youghigheny, still untamed, spilling their hundreds of thousands of kilowatts over the shattered fortunes of men who deserve better from their country. Act of God we say, blasphemously gilding our stupidity.

Japan's Fatal Dilemma

AFTER more than five years of undisputed mastery over Japan's foreign policy and virtually a free hand in China, the Japanese militarist-fascist clique is facing a showdown both at home and abroad. Fascism thrives on audacity and brashness. For years the military element has been criticizing the civilian group for pursuing a "weak" foreign policy, and has painted a glowing picture of the vast Asiatic empire which its own policies would assure. The ease with which the army overran Manchuria and penetrated North China enhanced its prestige at home even though it brought no concrete material gains. But each step necessitated further encroachment in order to consolidate the advance. And new triumphs were constantly required to justify the ever-increasing military and naval expenditures.

China's unexpected resistance has completely altered the picture. The collapse of the Japanese-supported invasion of Suiyuan, increasing pressure from Nanking, and the failure of the army's effort to establish a five-province puppet state in North China have destroyed the myth of fascist invulnerability. Even the navy, which formerly gave at least lukewarm support to the fascist program, has aligned itself against the present extreme demands of the army faction. And the army itself is split, as is indicated by the unwillingness of the younger officers to accept General Ugaki as Premier. Hamada's open attack on General Terauchi, former Minister of War, indicates that the civilian group has found new courage. But it is not at all clear that it will succeed in preventing the establishment of a military dictatorship. The party leaders undoubtedly have a large measure of popular support; they are backed by the great industrial and financial houses of Mitsui and Mitsubishi; and they have the advantage of having taken the offensive after five years of hardship under military rule. But the military have two weapons whose importance Hamada and his followers dare not underestimate—fanatical patriotism and military prowess. No crime is so brutal, no mistake so costly, that the Japanese will not forgive it if it is committed in the name of patriotism. Even the treason of last spring's revolt was readily condoned because it was staged in the Emperor's name. Ancient traditions have made the army the supreme custodian of the nation's honor, and there is little reason to expect that the habits of centuries can be altered in weeks. Moreover, there is no reason to believe that fascist elements, however divided, will yield to civilians without resort to force. It may be that Prince Saionji, the last of the elder statemen, will be able to stage another of his famous compromises, but it is apparent that even the Prince, despite his great prestige, is distrusted by the fascist element. Thus far the Emperor himself has seemingly supported the more moderate groups, but his power is probably no greater than that of the English sovereign.

The final outcome may well turn on the result of the struggle now under way between the pro-Japanese faction at Nanking and the new nationalist movement of which Chang Hsueh-liang has suddenly become the symbol. Many aspects of the Chinese imbroglio are still hidden from view. But it is fairly evident that Chiang Kai-shek was forced to commit himself to resistance to Japan as a price for his freedom, and that the old clique at Nanking has attempted to oppose this policy, particularly in so far as it concerns the Communists. The Old Guard, however, has been defeated, if we are to judge from Chiang Kai-shek's rebuke to the Nanking Central Daily News for its attack on W. H. Donald and Madame Chiang. The News, an official Kuomintang organ, had taken Donald to task for asserting that the anti-Communist clique had endangered Chiang's life. It happens that the Communists hold the key to the situation, regardless of what happens at Nanking. If Nanking had attacked Sian, the Communists could have moved up into Suiyuan and joined General Fu Tso-yi, the latest national hero, in a drive on Japanese-controlled Chahar. Such a step would either force Japan to surrender its immediate territorial ambitions on the mainland or plunge it into a fruitless war with China which might eliminate it as a world power.

Japan is thus caught in the fatal dilemma which must ultimately ensnare all fascist countries. If it drives forward on its projected path of world conquest, it is bound to provoke war with China, the Soviet Union, or the United States. If it hesitates and seeks conciliation, the prospective victim—China in this case—will take heart and strengthen its resistance. Moreover, any sign of weakness is certain to encourage a counter-attack by the opposition at home. Under the circumstances we could wish that the military party would quietly surrender power and permit the civilian elements to make such concessions as are necessary. Such an outcome, however, would be intolerable to the fascist mind. It is unlikely that the issue can be settled without bloodshed.

Tom Paine, Bridgebuilder

THOMAS PAINE took pride in himself among other things as a designer of bridges. When he sailed back to Europe in 1787, after having helped to precipitate the American Revolution and see it through, he carried with him the model of an iron bridge he wished to see built over the Schuylkill. His talent, however, was for bridge-building of another sort. His famous pamphlets fed the flames in which men were forging the span between two forms of society. As Washington said, Paine's pamphlet "Common Sense" "worked a powerful change in the minds of many men" and is credited with having started the open movement for independence. His "Rights of Man," published in England in 1791 as a reply to the skeptics and detractors of the great French Revolution, had an enormous circulation—until it was suppressed and Paine indicted for treason. Pursuing his bent, he escaped to France, with the help of no less a mystic than the poet William Blake, and took his seat as a delegate in the convention, to which he had been elected by the Department of Calais. He aroused the suspicions of Robespierre but managed to survive him and took part in the convention until it adjourned in 1795. His last speech was an attempt to save universal suffrage. With the "Age of Reason" Paine went too far for his age, and it offended where his championship of the rights of man struck a dominant social and human chord.

Across the bridge that Paine, with many others, helped to build in the name of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, of enlightenment, of individualism, of laissez faire, large sections of the Western world, throwing off the last restraints of feudalism, entered fully upon an era of unprecedented progress. The pace was so rapid indeed that by the middle of the nineteenth century Karl Marx was proclaiming the holy trinity of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity to be an inadequate and outworn political mythology in whose name millions had been bound in economic slavery, and was projecting a more imposing span to a new society.

The two-hundredth anniversary of Paine's birth finds the world deep in the series of revolutions that Karl Marx, with others, foresaw and helped to prepare, while a new race of skeptics asks why and of what use. The answer is neither final nor pessimistic. So far at least, the drive for human liberty, though it has each time fallen back from its first high aim, has always reached and maintained a higher mark at each new forward thrust, has released the energies and aspirations of an ever larger human segment. There would be genuine reason for despair if it were not certain that men two hundred years from now will be engaged upon yet a new revolutionary cycle for ends not yet imagined.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Did John L. Lewis Blunder?

Washington, January 24

JUST as in the month prior to November 3 last the idea was being broadcast in Liberty League circles that Roosevelt's physical infirmities had at last caused his mental collapse, "as any doctor will tell you they were bound to do eventually," so now the word is being passed that John L. Lewis has gone nuts, and that in a fit of egomania he has placed himself in a position with relation to the White House that endangers not only the General Motors strikers but also the whole industrial-organization movement. This canard, as fantastic as the one that was circulated about Roosevelt, is based upon the fact that Lewis burst out here a few days ago with a public demand that Roosevelt throw his weight into the General Motors strike on the side of union labor.

It was no frenzied outburst. Instead, it was a piece of tactics so unheated that it might have been calculated in an ice box. Lewis had no fewer than four reasons for the action which has so horrified the editorial writers of the nation. As for Lewis's act having been a blunder—as for his having made it impossible for Roosevelt to come to his aid—that question seems to have received at least a partial answer in the action taken tonight by Secretary of Labor Perkins. In summoning both sides unconditionally to a conference here three days hence and invoking an act of 1913 for that purpose, she has done exactly what Lewis has been wanting the Administration to do, and it is inconceivable that she has done it without advance approval from Roosevelt, who discussed the whole situation with her and the rest of his Cabinet the day after Lewis's outburst. At the time the summons was issued, the General Motors management still was insisting that it would not talk peace with the union until all sitdown strikers had been evacuated from its plants; Miss Perkins's summons requires them to waive that condition or put themselves in the position of defying the government. Lewis has been expecting eventually to maneuver the company into precisely that position, knowing as he does—and as does almost everyone else—the diehard attitude of the corporation and its financiers toward genuine collective bargaining. Having maneuvered the corporation into an open show of bad faith and, probably, into a defiant refusal to accept the principles of the Wagner act, to which the Administration is committed, Lewis expected Roosevelt to castigate the corporation publicly.

When, figuratively, he brandished a war club over Roosevelt's head on Thursday, it was because developments indicated that the Administration was not going to allow him to maneuver General Motors into a defiant position. In the first place, there had slipped into the White House just a few days earlier a high mogul of the American Federation of Labor. This high mogul, who was not William Green, came away with what he regarded as assurances from Roosevelt that the President would do nothing in the General Motors strike that might aid the C. I. O., and on the day of Lewis's outburst this A. F. of L. official was engaged in spreading word of those assurances down through all the back channels of the labor movement. Lewis's thunder, therefore, was not intended for White House ears alone; it was directed as well toward all the front-line trenches in the battle to organize steel, rubber, aluminum, textile, and motors. If his thundering was more bellicose than necessary, it was because he was overacting for the benefit of his executive-board members who filled the rear of his press-conference room and whom he expected to carry to all outposts in the war an impressive account of the morale at G. H. Q.

Lewis's second reason for publicly demanding that Roosevelt live up to his campaign and inaugural pretensions was Roosevelt's persistent attitude of aloofness. It is an attitude well known to labor leaders, and they recognize it as an ominous one. It is the attitude, for example, that Roosevelt assumed in 1935 when he was getting ready to sell out the automobile workers and his own National Industrial Recovery Board for the second time. While a struggle involving the lives and fortunes of hundreds of thousands of workers went on in the automobile centers, there sat the President of the United States pretending that he knew no more about the conflict than the average newspaper reader and had even less interest in it. Lewis knew that Roosevelt was fully aware of every development in the strike. Lewis also knew that Roosevelt was completely and uncomfortably conversant with the diehard attitude of the motor magnates and their probable readiness to defy the President in public as they had done successfully in the privacy of his own office in 1934 and 1935. And he found himself being held at arm's length by the President with no effort being made to establish diplomatic but direct communication between the White House and the C. I. O. This, too, resembled the situation in 1934 when the peace plan embodying the Wolman board was foisted upon the automobile workers by the White House without consultation with their leaders.

Lewis's third reason is closely allied to the second. He had come to the conclusion that a little thunder was in order because Roosevelt persisted in leaving the negotiations in the hands of Miss Perkins, though knowing, Lewis believes, that she has neither the prestige nor the ability that the situation requires. Lewis is irrevocably opposed to the peace-at-any-price attitude which colors

Miss Perkins's conduct as a mediator and, in fact, governs the whole conciliation service of the Labor Department.

The final reason for his outburst was in reality the deciding one. Lewis had discovered, as the motor magnates had discovered in 1934, if not in 1933, that Roosevelt can be bullied. He had found, in other words, that the sort of thundering to which he gave vent here Thursday actually works with Roosevelt. And being forestalled from thundering directly and privately into Roosevelt's ear at a time when such thundering seemed necessary, he had to thunder at him through the press. Roosevelt's rebuke to him the next morning was mild, so mild that there is even doubt that it was a rebuke to Lewis alone and not to Sloan and his colleagues as well. It can be argued with equal plausibility that Roosevelt found himself compelled to say something and that he contrived for the occasion the most meaningless sentence possible. Lewis knows how to take advantage of the President's penchant for sweet nothings. He refused to be rebuked and held a press conference of his own two hours after the conference at which Roosevelt had said that "statements, conversations, and headlines" were "not in order" in the strike situation. He also proceeded to dull whatever edge Roosevelt's remark had had by saying: "Of course, I do not believe as some have suggested that the President intended to rebuke the working people of America who are his friends and who are only attempting to secure the rights guaranteed them by law and under the public policy declared by Congress." Lewis first learned to take advantage of the President's gift for generalities and his inability to say no when the Guffey Coal Act was first introduced in Congress. Every week or so Lewis would see Roosevelt and afterward stand on the White House steps and, ignoring White House etiquette, which prescribes that callers shall not quote the President, boldly proclaim that Roosevelt was heart and soul behind the Guffey Act. Questions addressed to Roosevelt at press conferences with reference to these declarations by Lewis met with evasive answers, and Lewis kept on with his bold announcements of Presidential support until it was too late for Roosevelt to repudiate him.

An attempt is being made in the press and elsewhere to picture Lewis's latest demand upon the White House as a piece of sordid politics. The nation is being told that he demanded repayment for the hundreds of thousands that his union and others allied with the C. I. O. spent in Roosevelt's behalf during the Presidential campaign. You are being told that it is precisely on a par with the demands which the tariff barons and labor-hating industrialists would have made on the White House if Landon had been elected, except that they would have made their demands in whispers via the back door. But the parallel is non-existent. Lewis is not asking for new legislation or for deeds contrary to the public interest and for the benefit of some selfish minority. He is asking only that the Administration do its utmost to enforce what is already the law of the land and to carry out policies to which Roosevelt has publicly committed himself.

Pius XI and His Successor

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

WHAT will be the effect of the Pope's probably imminent death on Vatican policy? Catholics may regard the question as slightly premature, not to say impious, but they will hardly question its importance, particularly since the Vatican has taken such an intransigent line in the disturbed affairs of the contemporary world. Will its present policy, in which Catholicism is becoming more and more an unqualified ally of fascism, be changed? Does the selection of a new pope offer at least the possibility of some deviation from this line?

To judge from the casual conversation of non-Catholics, two presuppositions, both of which are very dubious, usually underlie speculations about the future. One is that the present Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, is the probable successor of Pius XI. The other is that Vatican policy at the present moment is the personal policy of either the Pope or his Secretary of State and might therefore be appreciably altered in a new reign. The first supposition is almost certainly false and the second requires many qualifications. Cardinal Pacelli is not likely to be the new pope. If precedent should be violated and he should be raised to the papal throne, the present policy would certainly be continued; for it is his policy. There is, however, a long tradition against elevating the Secretary of State to the highest eminence, in spite of the prestige which he acquires during his secretaryship. The simple reason for this is that he makes too many enemies during his period of authority to be able to command a majority in the electoral college. The hierarch with the greatest chance of success is always one who is not too definitely committed to any particular policy and not too closely identified with the various divergent and sometimes conflicting influences, particularly monastic influences, within the church. Our own Presidential conventions offer interesting parallels to this tendency.

A brief survey of the reigns of recent popes clearly proves the point. The Secretary of State for the "angelic" Pope Pius IX, who reigned from 1846 to 1878, was the reactionary Cardinal Antonelli; but Pius's successor was not Antonelli. His successor was the diplomatic and slightly liberal Leo XIII. Leo had several secretaries, the last of whom, Cardinal Rampolla, gained a great reputation in Europe. His election to the papacy was vetoed by the Emperor of Austria. Whereupon a very simple and pious man, who prided himself upon his simplicity and whose gifts were in marked contrast to those of Rampolla, was elected and reigned as Pius X. Pius chose a man much shrewder than himself as Secretary, the Spanish cardinal, Merry del Val. When Pius died in 1914 many assumed that his Secretary would succeed him. But Rampolla finally came into his own, for a disciple of his was chosen. The new pope reigned as Benedict XV. He chose Cardinal Gasparri as his Secretary. Gasparri gained wide fame and potent influence during the days of the World War. But he did not succeed his master, though he probably determined the choice of the successor. The election fell upon Cardinal Ratti, who had come into prominence through his negotiation of the concordat with Poland after the war. He had been a cardinal for only a short time when he was elected to the papacy in 1922.

Unlike Pius X, the present Pius is a man of diplomatic training and may therefore be presumed to be the author of his own diplomatic policy to a larger degree than was the previous Pius. Nevertheless, there are evidences that his Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, has been the real driving force behind the present papal diplomacy, particularly in the recent years of the Pope's declining strength. Any speculation about a possible change in this policy may well be prefaced by a short description of it. A description of this kind cannot be entirely accurate, however, because Catholic discipline prevents the serious tensions within the church from being aired in public. Some very honest Catholics even deny that they exist. Yet the evidences of these tensions, not to say conflicts, are clear enough to the outside observer.

The present policy of the papacy, a policy for which Cardinal Pacelli is probably more responsible than the Pope, is first of all to favor the hierarchy against lay Catholicism. By "lay Catholicism" the present writer is designating something which Catholics have probably never named but which nevertheless exists. At times it has expressed itself in Catholic political parties, for example, in the German Center, in which such lay leaders as Chancellors Marx and Brüning achieved a greater authority over their followers, at least in the realm of politics, than was held by the bishops. The term "lay" Catholicism is not entirely accurate, however, for it ought to include certain liberal political movements, such as that led by the Italian priest, Don Sturzo. Many village priests, as distinct from the hierarchy, have been active in similar movements. It would be difficult to give an exact description of the political tendencies of these movements, but it is quite clear that they were economically more liberal and politically more daring than anything ventured by the hierarchy. They expressed the common man's discontent with the status quo. In Germany the policies of the Center Party managed to be a bridge between socialism and bourgeois conservatism, a not inconsiderable achievement considering that Catholicism is traditionally rooted in feudalism.

In every case the policy of the papacy in the now

Drawing by Bert Hayden

Pope Pius XI

closing pontificate was to the disadvantage of these movements. The concordat with Mussolini completely destroyed Don Sturzo's movement. The concordat with Hitler was concluded in defiance of the advice of the effective leaders of the German Center Party. It was an agreement between the Catholic hierarchy and the German Nazis in which the hierarchy sacrificed the lay forces of the church for the sake of preserving the freedom of the religious institution within a totalitarian state. Many who were leaders in the now defunct Center Party must find it difficult to suppress an "I told you so" when they realize how little the bishops gained in their bargain with Hitler, and how little they have been able to improve the terms of the bargain by pleading with Hitler to accept them as equal allies in the fight against communism.

The tremendous emphasis upon "Catholic Action" societies in the present pontificate belongs to the same policy. Catholic Action places the lay forces of the church directly under the bishops and thereby establishes a more perfect hierarchical control over all Catholics. The final effect of this process is the establishment of greater papal control over national units. This, despite the accusations of rabid anti-Catholics, has not been the unvarying policy of the papacy. Certainly the tendencies toward centralization of authority have increased in recent years. Among other things they led to an understanding between the church and Hitler in regard to the Saar plebiscite which violated the convictions of 90 per cent of the Catholic population in the Saar.

The other side of present papal policy is more difficult to deal with justly because of the universal reticence of all parties affected by it. Broadly speaking, it could be designated as the continued ascendancy of Jesuit influence at the Vatican over the milder and more spiritual tendencies of other monastic groups. The Benedictines and Franciscans are less anxious to play the political game than the Jesuits and are less deeply involved in political activities. Particularly since the Spanish crisis the Jesuit influence has been accentuated. For Spain is the classic nation of the Catholic counter-reformation, and Jesuitism is the driving force of that movement.

Any speculation about a possible new policy in regard to fascism and radicalism after the present pope's death therefore revolves around the question: Is the intimate alliance between Catholicism and fascism a consequence of Jesuit influence or is it the product of tendencies within Catholicism deeper and more far-reaching than any particular influence? The answer to that question would seem to be that Jesuit influence has merely accentuated a tendency which Catholicism is bound to express. If, therefore, a new pope stood less directly under Jesuit influence, one might hope for a less unqualified alliance between Catholicism and fascism; but one could hardly hope for a reversal of the policy. The change is bound to be slight, but even a slight qualification of the policy might have important consequences in world affairs.

Catholic political policy is determined by fateful forces in modern history. The most important is the intimate historical connection between Catholicism as a civilization and feudalism. This bond sometimes gives Catholicism which may inhere in Catholicism as a religion and to which the more spiritual monastics may give occasional voice. Fascism, except in Spain, is of course not feudalism but the effort to press the forms of feudalism upon a technical civilization, a procedure which results in consequences even worse than those of feudalism.

Catholic policy is determined by the irreligion of radicalism as much as by the feudalism of Catholicism. The avowed intention of radicalism to destroy institutional religion naturally drives religion into the camp of reaction, particularly if the religion is rooted in a historic institution. The radical will be unable to see anything in this opposition to his cause but proof of his thesis that all religion is counter-revolutionary. He will never know how many purer religious souls in a historic religious movement are really defending their faith and not a civilization. Nor do the purer religious souls realize to what degree the irreligion confronting them is not the decadence which they imagine it to be but a protest against the religious sanctification of social injustice.

There is a peculiar pathos in the present Catholic anti-Communist campaign, with its admissions that the church does not like fascism but prefers it to communism because communism tries to destroy it while fascism merely embarrasses it. Since German fascism is as anti-Christian as communism, the Catholic choice is reduced to a preference for a lower-middle-class type of modern religion over the proletarian variety. The total situation is determined by forces on both sides too deeply rooted in history and too inexorable in their logic to permit the hope that a change in reigning popes will greatly affect the issue. All historic religions have tended to become so intimately related to the civilizations of which they were a part that they have been driven to defend them against just as well as unjust judgments and to die with them if the judgment of history was a death sentence. Catholicism is particularly tempted to this identification and confusion because it was the architect of medieval and feudal civilization. There is good reason to estimate the achievement of medieval civilization more generously than the modern liberal or radical rationalist is inclined to do, but such a generous estimate increases the pathos of the present situation. This pathos is accentuated even more by the recognition that religion is never so simply a rationalization of a given social order as the radical believes, and that within the pale of Catholicism today there are many pure spirits who long for a better world and seek a higher justice.

The radical will not learn to estimate the perennial and basic character of this tragedy of modern Catholicism in particular and of organized religion in general for several centuries. He will learn it only when, three hundred or five hundred or a thousand years from now, some group of creative spirits challenges a decadent Russian society in the name of a higher conception of society. It will be seen then that this decadent society can offer stubborn resistance because its official spokesmen derive moral self-respect from the memories of Russian sovietism in its creative period and have appropriated the moral prestige of Lenin's disinterestedness.

Drawing by Bert Hayden

Cardinal Pacelli

a certain degree of impartial perspective with regard to capitalism, such as was revealed, for instance, in the politics of the German Center Party. But it puts it at a complete moral and spiritual disadvantage where there is a dying feudalism, whether in Spain or in Latin America. In such a situation the feudal relation between church and state, or more particularly between the church and the army and the feudal landowning caste, is so strong that the instincts of Catholicism to preserve itself as a social system overpower any possible moral scruples

A G. M. Stockholder Visits Flint

BY ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

AS THE owner of a few shares of the General Motors Corporation I became somewhat alarmed when I learned that the workers were sitting down in my plants at Flint, Fisher Body No. 1 and Fisher Body No. 2, preventing the company from finishing and shipping cars and threatening to interrupt the orderly flow of dividends. Accordingly I took Sunday for a visit of investigation. Arriving at Flint I went to Fisher 2, and on introducing myself as their employer was cordially received by some 400 men occupying the plant. I must admit that I was fortunate in having as my companion Adolf Germer, who is on the board of strategy directing the strike.

My first anxiety was for the condition of my property, and I was relieved to find it well cared for. Springs and cushions were being used for beds, it is true, sometimes laid side by side as in a dormitory, sometimes isolated in cubicles between bales of goods. I was glad to see certain marks of domesticity—a clothes tree, an alarm clock, a whisk broom. The boys had made themselves pretty comfortable. I asked who was responsible for cleanliness, order, and protection of property, and learned that the government was what might be described, except for its unfortunate connotation, as a soviet. Mass assemblies were called at frequent intervals at which everything of importance was discussed. Court was held every morning. I asked what crimes were committed and was told that bringing in liquor and circulating rumors were the usual offenses. Those found guilty of the charges against them were put out.

After a hearty Sunday dinner of roast chicken and ice cream, I was preparing to go over to Fisher 1 when I noticed several round holes in the great glass windows, and inspecting more closely some of the foetus-like bodies of cars on the tracks, awaiting their delayed birth, I saw similar holes in the glass and dents in the metal sides. I thought these indicated wanton violence against my property, and asked how it occurred. Gun fire by the police, was the answer. I knew that there had been fighting on the Monday before in the street outside, but these disasters were on the second floor. It was obvious that there had been firing from a distance into the plant, endangering the lives of my employees, whom I was beginning to like though they were on strike, and damaging my property. Accordingly I asked for particulars, and as I have seen no clear account of the affair in any newspaper, despite the columns of newsprint that have been given to the strike, I will set down the facts as they were related to me by at least eight participants and eyewitnesses.

The sitdown strike involving 1,500 to 2,000 workers started at Fisher 1, when it appeared that the management was loading dies and special machinery into box cars to be shifted to other cities. Our company is fortunate in having factories scattered over the country; so that by transferring equipment a strike in Flint, Michigan, can be broken by workers in Atlanta, Georgia. Incidentally, that is why the workers demand the industrial form of organization and insist on dealing with General Motors as a whole instead of with the component companies.

The sitdown strike spread to Fisher Body 2, where from 400 to 600 men were involved. Relations were harmonious with the company police, who agreed to let the outer door stand open for food to be brought in. Attempts were made from time to time to shut off heat, light, and water, but workers with a mechanical turn of mind turned them on again.

On Monday afternoon the city police under Chief James Wills undertook to block both ends of the street in front of Fisher 2, to prevent food from being brought in. Later the police made an attack in force with tear gas and gun fire, to enter the plant. The strikers from inside countered the tear gas with streams of water, and the bullets with heavy hinges and other missiles. Some twenty-eight persons were injured, fourteen so seriously as to be taken to the hospital, which, I was told, had received warning beforehand to have an emergency ward ready. The defeat of the forces of law and order is referred to as Bulls' Run. The company police of Fisher 2 apparently took no part in the battle, and were found next morning in a ladies' rest room, where they had stood all night at attention, lacking room to sit down. They were released without acrimony by the workers in the factory.

Leaving Fisher 2, I went over to Fisher 1. After the battle, through Governor Murphy's efforts, the strikers and the management of General Motors had been brought to an agreement to go into conference on Monday, January 18, the workers to evacuate the Fisher plants on the promise that the company would not move machinery or dies. They were to march out of Fisher 1 at one-thirty, and a big crowd was collecting outside to see the evacuation. In the long façade of Fisher 1, which stretched away, it seemed, for half a mile into the foggy distance, no door was open, and I had to go in by a window; but once inside I found the boys very good-natured and, when they realized that I was their employer, flatteringly eager for my autograph. Suddenly a loud-speaker blared forth. It seemed that the General Motors management had agreed to negotiate also with the Flint Alliance, and this was regarded as a breach of faith by the board of strategy of the United Automobile Workers of America, since the question whether the U. A. W. A. should be the sole bargaining agency was one of the points to be negotiated. Accordingly orders were given to hold the plant, the sitdown strike to continue until negotiations were finally complete. The crowd surged back to Fisher 1, where an impromptu outdoor meeting was held to protest against the action of the company.

The agreement of the company officials to admit the Flint Alliance to the discussion was a highly provocative action and was deprecated as such by Governor Murphy. It looked like an attempt of the company to get out of the negotiation into which it had been persuaded. The Flint Alliance is an anti-strike organization mainly of white-collar workers and their families and various beneficiaries of General Motors, directed by George Boysen, ex-mayor of Flint and a former paymaster of the Buick Company. It is in no sense a labor union and is detested by the workers. It represents rather the political forces of Flint, which are aligned with General Motors—mayor, police, courts. On that Sunday in Flint there was meeting the Michigan Conference for the Protection of Civil Rights, at which it was forcibly pointed out to the workers that they had only to use their ballots to turn out the whole nest of unclean birds at the next election—defeat the mayor, move the impeachment of Judge Black for his action in granting a sweeping injunction against the union and in favor of a corporation, General Motors, in which he has substantial holdings, and force the removal of Chief of Police Wills for invoking violence both savage and futile.

The General Motors strike of 1937 may prove to be historic inasmuch as it has acclimated the sitdown strike in this country as a weapon of industrial conflict. The right of non-working employees to occupy the plant can hardly be classed among civil liberties. It is rather one of the industrial liberties which are on the way to becoming legally recognized. A little over a century ago it was illegal for workers to combine to refuse work for less than a certain sum. Quite recently it was against the law to picket a struck plant. Today picketing is among the civil rights. Already intelligent governors are applying the rule of reason and common sense to situations which law has not reached in its majestic progress. Governor Earle of Pennsylvania has refused to order the state troops to dispossess the bootleg miners, who are taking coal from seams which are their natural source of livelihood, which the legal owners refuse to work. Governor Murphy has refused to use his militia to throw out the sitdown strikers in the General Motors plants, and has ordered the company to cease the effort to cut off heat, light, and water.

The sitdown is the most effective form of strike. It permits the strikers to remain in comfort, even if somewhat bored, instead of tramping about on the picket line in heat, cold, wind, and wet. It obviates the most unpleasant and demoralizing feature of a strike, the use of strike-breakers. It eliminates violence, or at least places responsibility for it squarely on the police. It promotes the morale of the strikers. Above all it is a forcible reminder to workers, to management, to shareholders, and to the public that legal title is not the final answer to the question of possession. Who has the better human and natural right to call the Fisher plant his—I, whose connection with General Motors is determined by the price recorded on the New York Stock Exchange, or the worker whose life and livelihood are bound up in the operation of making cars? I bought my shares at long odds and probably have already collected the purchase price in dividends. When I place a winning bet in a horse race I do not claim a share in ownership of the horse. I know from my political economy that my position is the result of labor and sacrifice. Whose? Not mine. Obviously the enormous mass of wealth represented by the capitalization of General Motors, repeatedly enlarged by split-ups and stock dividends, is the surplus resulting from the toil of millions of workers over many years. Obviously they have not shared fairly in the wealth they have produced.

Some years ago I gave in the New Republic an account of the effort to mobilize the stockholders of the textile mills of New Bedford in support of the strikes against a wage cut. The strikers drew up a powerful plea to the stockholders arguing that the plight of the companies was due largely to the graft and nepotism of managers, who were in effect double-crossing both owners and workers. "It would be a less hopeful effort to bring any considerable number of the holders of General Motors stock to intervene in behalf of the workers against the immensely successful management of the company, but nevertheless an appeal from the U. A. W. U. board of strategy to the shareholders, broadcast through the press, would have some effect. We should be informed of the fact that since the settlement arranged by President Roosevelt three years ago there has been constant chiseling by some of our employees to the disadvantage of others. In the Chevrolet plant men are dismissed for wearing badges, for speaking of the union in the lunch hour. At the A. C. spark-plug works girls are entitled to pay increases based on the length of their employment, but they are dismissed when they rise too high in the scale. They may be taken back after a time as beginners.

It is absurd to pretend that either the company or the government under whose auspices the agreements were made has provided any practicable means of rectifying these grievances of the workers. The managers to whom we pay grotesquely huge salaries act the part of ownership, and their behavior is an insult to the intelligence and humanity of those to whom they are legally responsible. They interpose objection to dealing with the U. A. W. U. on the ground that it does not represent all the workers. I should judge that at Flint it was pretty nearly their unanimous choice. In any case it does represent the only effective form of labor organization applicable to a gigantic and far-flung industrial aggregation such as General Motors, and the only practicable method of forcing the elimination of unfair practices under which the workers suffer. As such it deserves the support of the public and especially of that not inconsiderable number who hold the legal responsibility of ownership of the corporation.

Germany's Economic Impasse

BY ALEXANDER VIDAKOVIC

How Hitler Pays His Arms Bill

THE fourth anniversary of Nazi rule finds Germany engaged in a frenzied effort to turn butter into cannon, while the world anxiously speculates on three questions. How far has German rearmament really gone? How has Germany found the means to rearm? How far can it still go without risking collapse or explosion?

To answer the first of these questions with absolute certainty is of course impossible in view of the jealous secrecy surrounding armaments and the suppression of budget figures. A fairly accurate estimate may nevertheless be obtained from a study of uncontested figures published in Germany itself, provided we bear in mind that changed methods of bookkeeping and "ideological computations" frequently render even official German figures misleading. Thus, for instance, debt statistics include neither "employment creation" nor armament bills, because they are not yet "actual" debt. Similarly, any calculation of military expenditures must depend on the inclusion or exclusion of expenditures for semi-military organizations and industrial investments for army purposes. Finally, the outlay on armaments cannot be regarded as their actual value unless account is taken of the real value of compulsory labor or of labor at less than normal working wages.

Hitherto the money to finance rearmament has been obtained by Nazi Germany in four ways: (a) by short and long-term debts, (b) by the appropriation for military purposes of funds dedicated to other needs, (c) by the sale of public assets, and (d) by outright confiscation of private property. The first of these, short-term debts, according to the German Institut für Konjunkturforschung, amounted at the end of 1935 to about 8,000 million gold marks. These short-term debts were contracted at an ever-increasing rate, rising from about 3,000 million for 1933 and 1934 together to 5,000 million for 1935 alone. Assuming an unchanged rate of velocity in 1936, an assumption which is more than justified by the evidence, short-term debts alone would have reached 13,000 million gold marks at the end of 1936. These short-term issues are complemented by several long-term issues which amount to about 4,500 million marks, giving a minimum total of Reich indebtedness of 17,500 million gold marks at the beginning of 1937. The correctness of these figures is attested by the official statement that the Reich's debt at the end of June, 1936, was 14,375 million gold marks, which figure did not at the time include tax certificates worth 1,040 million or the two loans of 1,300 million marks issued in July and December.

It is interesting to note, however, that at the very time when official statistics put the Reich indebtedness at something over 14,000 million, Schacht's organ—and Schacht ought to know—put the total at somewhere between 18,000 and 19,000 million marks. Also, that the official figures cited above do not include liabilities for armaments and work creation, which at the end of 1935 were officially stated to be about 9,000 million marks, of which 5,000 to 6,000 millions were contracted after 1933. If we therefore allow only for a similar proportion of armament and work-creation bills in 1936, that is, 2,000 million, we get an officially admitted minimum for the Reich's debt of about 28,000 millions; Schacht's figures, inclusive of later commitments, would put the total debt nearer 35,000 million gold marks, nearly all of which was contracted during the period 1933 to 1936.

It is not disclosed, naturally, how much of this money and how much of the regular budget of about 25,000 million marks for the period 1933-36 was spent directly on armaments, how much indirectly on strategical road-building and industrial investment for arms manufacture, and how much on social measures. There is, however, a valuable admission by the Minister of Finance that reduced unemployment and increased revenue had expanded his resources during the same period by about 5,000 million marks. It may not be doubted that much of this money found its way into armaments.

Thus, if from the total of 55,000 to 60,000 million marks collected from budgetary sources and from loans we deduct the debts contracted before 1933, the regular budgetary needs, and extraordinary expenditures for social relief, and if we allow for the difficulty of exactly allocating to armaments or other purposes sums devoted to certain types of industrial investment and road-building, even so we obtain a minimum spent on armaments of not less than 20,000 million marks, while an estimate of around 30,000 million is probably much more realistic.

In addition to long- and short-term loans the Nazis have raised money from the sale of industries owned by the state. These industries, and also many industrial shares acquired by the German Socialist government, are now being sold off in increasing quantities, and a recent official statement implies that the Reich may sell even more of its undertakings in order to obtain means for "extraordinary expenditures." It is needless to ask what these "extraordinary expenditures" are.

Such "regular" methods of obtaining cash as budgetary receipts, debts, and sale of property are complemented by "ideological" methods, which means the confiscation of the private property of opponents. The latest addition to these "ideological" methods is a decree issued in December, 1936, by which private property can be sequestrated and put under a sort of bankruptcy receiver-

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

Copyright by Inter-Europa Press

DES CANONS OU DU BEURRE ?

ship if suspicion arises that the owner intends to remove his property from the Reich. During the first month of this law's operation no fewer than thirty-nine persons were dispossessed, and it can hardly be supposed that Nazi naivete goes to the extent of dispossessing the poorest of the citizens. In fact, considering the number of Jews in Germany from whom a few drops may still be squeezed, the inventor of this law may have opened to Nazi Germany sources of untold and untapped wealth.

But leaving aside the last two methods of raising cash, it is impossible to view without concern the economic condition of a state which not only spends 12 to 13 per cent of its national income on regular budgetary purposes but finds it necessary to raise the total government expenditure to a level where it equals about 30 per cent of the national income. This income was 46,500 million marks in 1933, something over 50,000 million in 1934, 57,300 million in 1935, and 61,000 million in 1936, making a total of about 215,000 million marks. The increasing state indebtedness incurred, mainly for the creation of capital goods and with no effort toward funding, is rapidly driving the German banking system into an inflationary cycle. Private saving stopped long ago; bank deposits in the five leading Berlin banks, for instance, have declined since 1933 from 6,800 to 6,140 million marks. German citizens who can afford it prefer immovable property to cash. Hence Germany is now entering a housing boom.

All this puts a special strain upon the banks, which have to meet increased demands from the state, industry, and builders without any corresponding increase in their real assets. The cyclic race between rising prices and the rising demand for money has begun in earnest. The Reichsbank's bill holdings—of rediscounted government bills—already exceed its note issue, and since there is no increase in its gold holdings, further rediscounting can be financed only by a further expansion of its fiduciary issue. The only visible alternative is a cessation of state borrowing and a switch from the manufacture of production goods to that of consumption goods—in other words, the complete abandonment of the present high speed and volume of rearmament.

Government policy is even more disastrous to industry than to banking. In order to obtain the liquid capital necessary for armaments, the government has put an embargo on the issue of shares and debenture flotations by private companies, thus preventing the expansion of any industrial concern without special consent. This consent is primarily given to industries directly or indirectly occupied with the manufacture of arms. Thus of the total capital investment, which in 1933 amounted to 5,300 million marks, in 1934 to 8,700 million, in 1935 to 11,600 million, the government claimed officially 48 per cent, while another 30 per cent was in industries concerned with armaments.

This withdrawal of funds for the needs of the government or favored industries has left insufficient funds for replacement of wear and tear. Thus the Trade Research Institute stated in the autumn of 1936 that "after more than three years of continuous and intense utilization of the industrial apparatus, there is need for replacement of plant and for new industrial equipment." This need for replacement of depreciated plant the institute put at about 4,000 million marks.

German machinery and plant may still last for some time. But eventually German industry will reach a point at which high-pressure armament manufacture must come to a standstill, unless all of industry is converted to war uses. It is then that the Reich will have to shoulder the almost superhuman task of reconstruction under the double burden of exhausted liquid capital and arbitrary and misplaced industrial investment.

The present German prosperity has been achieved, and rearmament financed, in a threefold way—by using all the means of the present, by pledging much of the earnings of the future, and by spending the capital inherited from the past. No nation can go on indefinitely with such a policy, not even the Third Reich. The only question is how long? And we shall be able better to answer it when we have considered two other factors—the German position in raw materials and the sacrifice in human material which the Nazis are making at present on their highest altar, that of armament.

[This is the first of two articles on Nazi economics and rearmament. The second will appear next week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Germany and Ethics

WHATEVER else may be said about the European dictatorships, they are compelling us to test anew our standard of values in ethics as well as our political beliefs. They are, for example, presenting us at every turn with the age-old question as to whether the end can ever justify the means. Hardly a day goes by that I do not meet somebody just returned from either Germany or Italy who tells me how marvelously happy and prosperous the people are. "You may say what you please about Hitler," is what they say, "but Germany never looked so well. The people are polite. They go out of their way to be nice to foreigners. There seems to be no discontent whatever. Of course the dictator does many things of which I disapprove, but you must be fair and give him credit for the good things he has accomplished. It's not all bad."

I find it hard to reply politely. I am tempted to imitate Dorothy Thompson, who usually says: "I will not debate with anybody the exact merits of a bloody-handed murderer." I, too, am not interested in an effort to evaluate the exact ethical worth of a man who had no less than 1,254 men and women and youths killed in one night and then stood up in the Reichstag, swore that there were only seventy-seven murdered, and assumed in emphatic language the complete responsibility for their deaths. "I assumed the supreme power." I cannot be enthusiastic over the good manners of the Germans toward foreign visitors, for I think of the 25,000 men and women still confined in concentration camps and often horribly tortured and maltreated. I deny emphatically that the man responsible for these and many other crimes against humanity can in the slightest degree atone for those crimes by building a magnificent stadium and superb roads, or by freeing his people from the yoke of the unjust Treaty of Versailles.

Any dictator can build good roads. Any dictator can send 3,000,000 Christmas baskets of food to the destitute and needy with his picture and the words: "Your Leader is thinking of you." Any dictator can enforce outward order and militarize his people. I do not have to go to Germany to know that superficially things look well; that the streets are clean and free of beggars; that there is universal politeness; and that by means of the huge army, the compulsory work camps, the great rearmament orders to heavy industry, and the concentration camps, the number of unemployed has been reduced by the dictator from 6,000,000 to 1,000,000. Nor do I have to go to Germany to know that side by side with this "progress" and the great change in the psychology of the youth of Germany, the whole intellectual life of Germany has been destroyed; that three years have been cut out of the primary educational system and one year out of the university course; that academic freedom is no more; that the press is denatured and dead; that there has been created an atmosphere of fear and domination and of disregard of the most precious human rights in which no creative spirit or instinct can survive.

These things alone seem to me so infinitely worth while and necessary to the spiritual development of a people that I cannot feel that the material achievements of Hitler and Mussolini weigh many grains beside them. Their material advances are in the first place not the sole prerogatives of dictatorships. In the second place, the achievements of both the Italian and German dictatorships have been purchased by a distinct lowering of standards of living; and, finally, we do not yet know whether they will not crash financially. Certainly the regimentation of the whole people in order that what there is in the way of butter and other fats may be evenly distributed does not warrant the belief as yet that even on the material side the dictatorship is a howling success. "Guns instead of butter," is General Göring's slogan. Well, I believe, like Anthony Eden, that for the health, safety, and sanity of peoples the world over and for their future happiness and security butter is preferable to guns.

No outward order or material accomplishment can offset the ethical and spiritual degradation of a people. No roads or other public works and no beautifully drilled armies and navies can possibly counterbalance the misleading of a great people by the doctrine of force, by the teaching that war is the supreme good, by the dissemination of utterly false and unscientific racial theories, and by the assumption that there is wisdom enough in any dictator to guide the intellectual development of many millions of people. Of course the economic welfare of the people must be a government's primary concern; without that there can be no other advance. But the question is simply whether material prosperity is to be vouchsafed to a lot of disciplined slaves or to free men living in that atmosphere of individual liberty and experimentation and self-expression which history has invariably proved to be the sole condition under which humanity progresses.

How any loyal American—loyal not to the flag; the mere symbol of our nation, but to its fundamental principles—can indorse the regimes of the dictators is beyond me. Yet I meet these disloyalists at every turn, with their panegyrics on the great progress of Italy and Germany. Again I deny that the outward material progress achieved by Hitler in any way offsets or compensates for the misery, the injustice, the blood upon which it is built.

BROUN'S PAGE

Laurels for the Living

ANDREW MELLON has given to the government his collection of paintings and will build a gallery to house them. I'm under the impression that Mr. Mellon's art consists largely of old masters, and there can be no question that the value of the gift runs high into the millions. There are many less useful things which Mr. Mellon might have done with his money, but I am going to be pretty impatient if editorial writers begin to point out that such a gift is the complete justification for the capitalist system.

It will be said, I suppose it has been said already, that but for great fortunes there would be no art, no science, and precious little education. But it seems to me that rich men, including Mr. Mellon, have done much less than enough for American painting. The federal projects have come closer to the need. Perhaps I press my point too hard, but I honestly believe that the emphasis placed upon the collecting of old masters does very little to encourage the native painter. It almost handicaps him. Throughout the land there is created a kind of thinking which moves the mind to believe that painting is a thing which once existed but now is definitely dead.

It is a familiar fact that there is no general buying public for paintings in this country. The walls of homes and hotels and schools are mostly adorned with prints and reproductions, some of them good and some simply terrible. As far as the schools go, the so-called boondoggling has been a godsend. Young artists have come in and done some amazingly good murals based on modern themes. For the first time the average pupil is beginning to learn that there can be such a thing as wet paint in the field of art.

Of course, fiction and the drama of stage and screen have done a great deal to encourage the neglect of painting. I might indict the opera as well. We of the general public have held pretty closely to the idea that if a man didn't wear a funny hat, live with his model, and starve in a garret, he couldn't really be a painter. I'm frank to admit that the strength of this tradition has done a great deal to hold me back from following up a natural aptitude in oils. It wasn't the hat which scared me off, and starving in a garret would undoubtedly be good for me, but I've not had the fortune to meet any willing model. As a matter of fact, I never found anybody who would pose for me, let alone share a garret. And so I have lived as a landscape painter and probably I shall die the same way.

But I cite my own tragedy merely as a minor one. I suppose even in a socialist state it might not be feasible for the commissar of art to pick a likely young woman and say, "You must serve as a model for Broun and share his garret. It is for the state and for posterity." You see posterity includes the very people I want to leave out of the equation.

Posterity furnishes the least encouraging of all publics. The man who writes or paints or sings for posterity is really doing a monologue for his own entertainment. Even before the federal government began to scratch the surface in its art projects one American industry had just about solved the problem of discovering and encouraging young talent. I refer of course to the art of professional baseball, and by now college football has begun to follow its example.

I seem to see five young men living in a small town in Texas. One of them is a promising youth who can pitch with his left hand. Another is a halfback of great capacities in a broken field. The third can sing. The fourth could be a sculptor, and the fifth can paint like nobody's business. Let us assume that each of the youths is equally talented in his own line. Which of the five do you think will come first to fame and fortune?

The proper answer is that it will be a nip-and-tuck race between the first two mentioned. Some scout from the big leagues will be sure to take a look at the left-hander while he is still in high school. Mel Ott, the so-called veteran outfielder of the Giants, was lifted out of a little country school in Louisiana when he was sixteen. Farsighted alumni of the better colleges keep themselves informed about which scholars in the preparatory schools can make a forward pass or drop kick.

Once upon a time the coach of a New York State college was driving down a country road in summer. A tall youth with spreading shoulders was putting white paint upon an imitation colonial cottage. They were almost the broadest shoulders the coach had ever seen. He stopped his car and came to the edge of the lawn. "Hey, you," called the football mentor, "how much are they paying you for that job?"

"Four dollars a day," replied the young man.

"Come down off that ladder," said the coach with simple dignity, and the young man passed all his examinations that autumn and went on to become one of the greatest roving centers of all time.

But he happened to be a house painter. If he had gone in for nudes or still life, no passing motorist would have given him a tumble.

All of which brings me back to Andrew Mellon. Mr. Mellon did his scouting in the galleries of the established dealers. He made no discovery. He was not a pioneer. When he bought a painting, the lifetime batting average of the artist was already complete and familiar. Mr. Mellon did not lift up his eyes toward any living person on a ladder. It is a good thumping gift, but it is not enough to justify the existence of swollen fortunes. There should be laurels for the living.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

PSYCHOANALYZING ALICE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MOST readers of The Nation must have seen in their daily paper some account of the adventures of Alice in the new wonderland of psychoanalysis. Many years ago the late André Tridon undertook to explore the subconscious mind of the same little lady, but Tridon was something of a playboy while Dr. Paul Schilder, research professor of psychiatry at New York University, was presumably in dead earnest when he warned his hearers at a recent meeting of the American Psychoanalytical Society against exposing children to the dangerous corruptions of Lewis Carroll. All of Carroll's ten brothers and sisters stammered; "this fact might have made the author unhappy"; and in any event his superficially pleasant fairy stories are the expression of "enormous anxiety."

According to the account of Dr. Schilder's speech printed in The New York Times, most of Alice's adventures are "calculated to fill her with anxieties" of a pernicious nature. "She feels separated from her feet, she is stuffed in and out of small holes, and she never knows from minute to minute whether she will be small or large. . . . There are severe deprivations in the sphere of food and drink. . . . The poem of the Walrus and the Carpenter is of an astonishing cruelty. The Lobster is cooked. Alice herself frightens the birds with tales of devourings. . . . The fear of being cut to pieces comes again and again into the foreground. The head of the Jabberwock is cut off. There is a continuous threat to the integrity of the body in general." Even worse, apparently, is the fact that Carroll plays fast and loose with language and the conception of time. The innocent child may never recover from the shock of "mimsey" or "wabe." "This is a world of cruelty, destruction, and annihilation. . . . One may be afraid that without the help of the adult the child may remain bewildered in it and may not find his way back to the world in which he can appreciate love relations, space, time, and words." Personally I have never heard of a child who confessed to being dangerously terrified by "Alice," or of an adult who attributed his downfall to a trauma received from the book in infancy. But no doubt that proves nothing. The fears inspired are subconscious also.

Now there is not, so it seems to me, any reason for doubting the large general assertion that Lewis Carroll had "complexes" or that his fantasy was to some extent, at least, an expression of them. Even if we leave such esoteric matters as "threats to the integrity of the body" in the hands of specialists like Dr. Schilder, it ought to be evident that his nonsense, like so much nonsense and so much wit, was a device by means of which his intelligence protested against various kinds of cant which his priggish and conventional temperament would not permit him to flout openly. I see nothing far-fetched in the assumption that queens are absurd puppets in "Alice" because Carroll outwardly accepted the absurd legend of Victoria, or that the farce of the trial is largely unconscious satire of the pompous procedure of courts. Nor do I see how anyone can ponder the dilemma in which Alice is placed when she tries to choose between the Walrus and the Carpenter without perceiving a submerged La Rochefoucauld in the mild-mannered don who found his chief delight in photographing little girls. Alice, it will be remembered, thought she liked the weeping Carpenter best because he seemed a little sorry for having betrayed the oysters. But when she was told that it was he who had eaten the most and tried to shift her sympathy to the Walrus, she got a crushing retort—the Walrus had eaten as many as he could get. Only a man who had hidden somewhere in his soul a very cynical conception of human behavior could, I submit, have conceived that incident.

If we go that far we may also, I suppose, take it as a matter of course that Alice's fantastic adventures are none of them quite sane. But that is not the point. Why, of all people, should a psychoanalyst be shocked to find complexes in an artist, or afraid to have children ("polymorphically perverse" by Freudian premise) introduced at an early age to a literature the very secret of which is its successfully playful catharsis of certain all but universal obsessions? As for the satire and the cynicism which Dr. Schilder does not mention, I should say that any child is ready for it as soon as he is capable of recognizing its existence and that he is never too young to begin to laugh at those morbid fears which, the psychoanalyst himself is ready to assure us, he is never too young to feel.

In America the philistine used to be above all else a moral man. The arts had nothing to fear from his fury except when he could discover that they were "impure." Nowadays he is more likely to discover in the most unexpected places some defiling trace of either "bourgeois prejudice" or "psychological abnormality," and to look askance upon anything which does not combine the obsession of a social worker with the "normality" of a boy scout. Some years ago when I first met a certain distinguished psychoanalyst I told him that I had observed in his many books what appeared to me to be a rather serious non sequitur: the first eight chapters were usually devoted to showing how abnormal most of the distinguished people of the world had been, while the last always concluded with a "therefore let us endeavor to be as normal as possible." I asked him if he did not suppose that a too thorough psychic house-cleaning might be undesirable for those who aspired to be something more than merely "normal," and I received a remarkable if somewhat pompous reply. "I would not," he said, "like to give a categorical answer to that question, but I will say one thing. Dr. Freud and I are the only two prominent psychoanalysts who have never themselves been analyzed—and I think we have made the greatest contributions to the science."

BOOKS

Behind the Lines

INVASION. By Maxence Van der Meersch. Translated by Gerard Hopkins. The Viking Press. $3.

THIS is another addition to that most recent phase of war fiction which, in France especially, has been concerned with exhibiting the moral and psychological dislocations caused by modern warfare in the civilian population. It even manages to ring a change on such a novel as Louis Guilloux's "Bitter Victory" by rendering a population that is living under the yoke of an invader. The background is the great textile-manufacturing region of northern France throughout the whole period of its occupation by the Germans. Van der Meersch, who lived through the period as a child, presents a minute, almost day-by-day chart of the war-time temper as it was registered not only in the conduct but in the most intimate psychological adjustments of his fellow-townsmen in the representative small industrial community of Roubaix.

The most fundamental of these adjustments, of course, for everyone—from the starved wives of the mill workers to the ruined manufacturers—was the establishment of some sort of working arrangement with the enemy. There are half a hundred characters drawn from every stratum of society, but the problem in every case is the same. Nearly all the situations in the book's seven hundred-odd pages derive from the conflict between a natural desire for survival and a too drastically challenged patriotism. Although the manufacturers agree among themselves not to keep their mills running for the enemy, some of them do not hesitate to negotiate secretly or to engage in other modes of profiteering. The mayor of the town is forced to play the difficult game of cooperating with the general staff and preserving the respect of his compatriots at one and the same time. As for the women, those who do not sell themselves openly for food or special privileges, seize the opportunity to betray husbands in jail or away at the front. Only a few individuals succeed in keeping their integrity absolutely untarnished, and these are properly rewarded with the contempt and suspicion of their fellow-citizens. Next to the greed, lust, hypocrisy, and general inhumanity of the native population, the transgressions of the invaders seem remarkably mild. Certainly this particular section of France seems to have conducted itself during the last war in a manner that can be anything but reassuring to those patriots engaged in preparing their country for the next. Unquestionably, the success which this work enjoyed in France, and for which its author was tardily awarded the Prix Goncourt in 1936, was to a large extent a succès de scandale.

But since the controversial aspect will hardly exist for the American reader, more will depend on the extent to which shape and significance are given to the unusually rich and fascinating body of material. And, despite several memorable scenes and a number of good characterizations, it must be said that neither of these objects is satisfactorily achieved. A loose chronicle of violent physical actions and often too obvious psychological divagations, cemented together with detail that is almost too absorbing for its own sake, the book falls into the quite common error of reproducing the chaotic disorder of its subject. The reason for this lack of any guiding and selecting focus is undoubtedly the palpable uncertainty of the point of view. This seems to vacillate between the Christian stoicism embodied in the quotation from Thomas à Kempis on the title page, "Here are hearts proved as gold in the furnace," and the kind of historical despair voiced by the disillusioned idealist Henneidyck in the long dialogue at the close. To the latter's "What's the use?" Van der Meersch does respond with what may be taken as his own resolution of the mood produced by the human spectacle:

In me there is a constant struggle between reason and the will, and I am on the side of the will. I want to believe, to believe in something, in progress, in justice, to have faith in the destiny of mankind. Only so can I find a motive for doing anything, a reason to go on living, the promise of final peace. If I lost that belief, there would be for me only the terrors of nothingness and despair.

But throughout the book the evidences of the reason, in the picture given of civilized European society during one of its periodic crises, have been much more convincing than these rather febrile manifestos of the will-to-believe tacked on at the end. It may be that in his more recent writing this important young novelist has come to believe sufficiently in that "divine consciousness" which he invokes to express it properly in terms of his art. Here it is a sudden breath of suspicious mysticism that adds nothing to our understanding because it bears too little relation to what has preceded it, like a moral that does not fit the tale.

WILLIAM TROY

The Constants of Social Relativity

IDEOLOGY AND UTOPIA. By Karl Mannheim. With a Preface by Louis Wirth. Translated by Louis Wirth and Edward Shils. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

DISCOURAGED by the ways in which the perspectives of different people, classes, eras, cancel one another, you may decide that all philosophies are nonsense. Or you may establish order by fiat, as you bluntly adhere to one faction among the many, determined to abide by its assertions regardless of other people's assertions. Or you may become a kind of referee for other men's contests, content to observe that every view has some measure of truth and some measure of falsity. If they had asserted nothing, you could assert nothing. But in so far as they assert and counter-assert, you can draw an assertion from the comparison of their assertions.

Professor Karl Mannheim's "sociology of knowledge" is a variant of the third of these attitudes. He would begin with the fact of difference rather than with a choice among the differences. But in erecting a new perspective atop the rivalries of the old perspectives, he would subtly change the rules of the game. For the new perspective he offered would not be simply a rival perspective; it would be a theory of perspectives. In so far as it was accurate, in other words, its contribution would reside in its ability to make the perspective-process itself more accessible to consciousness.

Faction A opposes Faction B. To do so as effectively as possible, it "unmasks" Faction B's "ideology." Faction B may talk nobly about "humanity" or "freedom," for instance. And Faction A discloses the "real meaning" of these high-sounding phrases in terms of interests, privileges, social habits, and the like. Faction B retaliates by unmasking Faction A's ideology.

Each faction exposes, as far as possible, the conscious and unconscious deception practiced by the ideologists of rival camps. But in the course of exposing the enemy, a faction comes upon principles that could be turned upon itself as well. Hence, it can spare its own members from the general censure only by "pulling its punch." And precisely at this point there enter the opportunities for a "sociology of knowledge," if only the sociologist can so change the rules of the game that he finds no embarrassment in completing and maturing this "unmasking" process.

This he does in the easiest way imaginable. Whereas the ideologists of the opposing factions "point with alarm" to the fact that there is a difference between the face value of an opponent's idea and its real value in social commerce, the sociologist starts out by taking such discrepancies for granted. He begins with the assumption that an idea must be "discounted" by the disclosure of the interests behind it. Hence, he can treat the difference between the face value of an ideology and its behavior in a social context not as an "unmasking" but as an "explanation" or "definition" of the ideology. Thus, instead of being startled to find that an idea must be discounted, and taking this fact as the be-all and end-all of his disclosures, he assumes at the start the necessity of discounting, and so can advance to the point where he seeks to establish the principles of discounting.

Such, at least, is the reviewer's way of understanding Professor Mannheim's point in tracing a development from the "unmasking of ideologies" to the "sociology of knowledge." And his book presents a great wealth of material to guide the sociologist who would define ideologies in terms of their social behavior. Incidentally, in his gauging of the case, he suggests reasons why members of the intelligentsia are not a perfect fit for strict political alignment. Their working capital is their education—and in so far as they accumulate this capital to its fullest, they venture far beyond the confines of some immediate political perspective. He does not use this thought, however, to disprove the value of political affiliation. On the contrary, he suggests that there are ways in which this somewhat "classless" ingredient in the "capital" of the intelligentsia may serve to broaden and mature the outlook of the stricter partisans, and enable them to take wider ranges of reality and resistance into account.

As for the key terms, ideology and utopia, their "discounting" in social textures makes it impossible for the reader to follow them as absolute logical opposites. In general, the term ideology is used to connote "false consciousness" of a conservative or reactionary sort—while utopia stresses the same phenomenon in the revolutionary category. If conditions have so changed, for instance, that the landed proprietor has become a capitalist yet "still attempts to explain his relations to his laborers and his own function in the undertaking by means of categories reminiscent of the patriarchal order," he is thinking by "ideological distortion." And the "spiritualization of politics" in the thinking of the Chiliasts is treated as a typical utopia, surviving even in the thought of anarchists like Bakunin. However, although the conservative is not naturally given to utopian imaginings, being content to accept the status quo, the competitive pressure of revolutionary utopias spurs him to the construction of counter-utopias. Hegel's romantic historicism, erected in opposition to the liberal idea, is given as a prime example. Perhaps the following quotation illustrates the difference most succinctly:

As long as the clerically and feudally organized medieval order was able to locate its paradise outside of society, in some other-worldly sphere which transcended history and dulled its revolutionary edge, the idea of paradise was still an integral part of medieval society. Not until certain social groups embodied these wish-images into their actual conduct, and tried to realize them, did these ideologies become utopian.

The book is concerned with the ramifications and subtilizations of this distinction, and with a theory of knowledge to be drawn from the plot of history as charted in accordance with these terms. The discussion being conducted largely in abstractions, the book will probably not endear itself to the general reader—but anyone interested in the relation between politics and knowledge should find it absorbing. Perhaps we could venture to summarize the case this way: whereas the needs of the forum tend to make sociology a subdivision of politics, Professor Mannheim is contributing as much as he can toward making politics a subdivision of sociology.

KENNETH BURKE

Modern and/or Contemporary

A BOOK OF CONTEMPORARY SHORT STORIES. Edited by Dorothy Brewster. With an Appendix on Writing the Short Story by Lillian Barnard Gilkes. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE assumption here—in itself a very valid one—is that enough has taken place since the publication of the editor's "Book of Modern Short Stories" in 1928 to render necessary a volume of "contemporary" short stories in 1937. Ten years ago, Miss Brewster observes prefatorily, the com-

A Manual for Students and for the General Reader

HIS LATEST BOOK ON THE SEXUAL LIFE

Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime

COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse; Physical Factors; Mental Factors

The Sexual Zones

The Sexual Impulse in Youth

Masturbation

Frigidity: Frequency of; Nature of; Factors in; Treatment of Impotence: Frequency of; Nature of; Temporary; Psycho; Neurasthenic; Treatment of

First Intercourse

Secondary Sexual Characters

The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed"

Sexual Abnormalities

Sexual Irregularities

Exhibitionism

The Sexual Criminal

Analysis of Courtship

Woman's Change of Life: Adjustments; Advantages; Effect on Sexual Desire

The Dangerous Age in Men: Symptoms; Physical and Psychic Aspects

Divorce

Monogamy; Polygamy

The Nature of Birth Control

The Question of Abortion

Frequency of Coitus

The Nation says: "There is probably a better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."

The Sexual Athlete:

Satyrism; Nymphomania

Jealousy

Married Love

Psychoanalytic Concepts of Sex

Pre-marital Knowledge and Experience

Modesty; Nudism

Childbirth: Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after

Sexual Feeling in Women

Sex Practice in Marriage

Methods and Technique of Coitus

Sexual Pleasure and Conception

Positions in Coitus

Sex Life and Nervous Disorders

Sexual Difficulties

Freud's "Unconscious"; "Libido"

Dreams: Their Significance

Sex Life of Unmarried Adults

Sexual Fetishes and Symbols

The Art of Love

Sexual Adjustments

Sex Happiness

Age and the Sexual Impulse

The Sexual Impulse and Love

Love Rights of Women; of Men

The Choice of a Mate

Esthetics of Coitus

Expression and Repression

Substitutes for Sex

Treatment of Sexual Complaints

Medical and Legal Treatment of Abnormal Gratification

Nature and Habits of the Invert: Medical and Legal Treatment of

Bisexual Attraction: Inter-Sexuality

Eonism (identification with opposite sex)

The Marriage Relationship

The Power of the Sexual Urge

Sexual Maladjustments in Marriage

Wide Range of the Sexual Impulse

Relationship of Sex to Happiness in Marriage

Chastity: the Primitive Attitude; the Attitude Today

The Treatment of Sexual Anesthesia in Women

piler of "modern" short stories designed his anthology to "illustrate different ways of handling material"; today, however, he must seek fresh contexts for judgment in the "shifting preoccupation from form to subject matter." Accordingly, Miss Brewster parts the angry waters to Left and Right, distributing her 695 pages equally between the Ivory Tower practitioners—surely a misnomer—"recording physical and spiritual adventures which might happen to almost anybody, anywhere, in any period," and the exponents of the "Red Square," carrying forward revolutionary themes and pointing the direction in which modern society "is going, or might go, or should go."

Yet having parted the waters Miss Brewster does not walk across dryshod; indeed, she is more hard put than one might have surmised to pour her materials into the molds prepared for them. Her ivory towers reveal Russian cupolas, her Red Square opens on formal gardens, and the relative "modernity" of each is computed, in the last analysis, in terms of mere topical immediacy. One is at a loss to understand, for example, why Langston Hughes's Rejuvenation Through Joy, shelved with the Ivory Tower pieces, is to be regarded as any less "modern" than his "revolutionary" Professor, also included; or on what authority, other than the toss of a coin and its publication in International Literature, Isaac Babel's Awakening has been assigned to the Red Square.

As a survey of shorter fiction based on sociological themes, the latter half of Miss Brewster's volume has its value and usefulness; and setting aside for the moment any consideration of categories, the stories by Conrad Aiken, Katherine Anne Porter, Chekhov, Henry James, Lillian Barnard Gilkes, Sandor Gergel, Ignazio Silone, and Yuri Olesha may be read in their own right as distinguished exercises in craft. The line that quarantines the "modern" short story from its "contemporary" neighbors, however, remains written in water until the editor is ready to follow it into the labyrinths of language and technique where it eludes the cartographer's compass and where, at the present moment, it still awaits its discoverer.

BEN BELITT

The Community as a Hero

WHERE THE WEAK GROW STRONG. By Eugene Armfield. Covici, Friede. $2.50.

CERTAIN writers and critics of the left—notably M. Jules Romains—have lately been obsessed with the problem of multiplicity in fiction. Recognizing that a highly organized industrial society implies the spiritual disenfranchisement of the individual, these thinkers have been looking for an art form into which they might translate this economic reality. Specifically, they have been trying to postulate or, more rarely, actually to write a novel which should have as its protagonist not the One but the Many. While a great deal of cerebration has gone into this matter, very little action has come out of it. One thinks of M. Romains's work-in-progress and of Mr. Dos Passos's completed trilogy, but even in these cases the Individual often seems to have stolen the show from the Masses. It is therefore astonishing to find that a young writer, Eugene Armfield, has with his first novel done the trick, and done it so simply and so unpretentiously that it looks easy.

"Where the Weak Grow Strong" has a collective hero—the town of Tuttle, North Carolina, in the year 1912. Mr. Armfield has shattered the community into the multiple molecular lives that make it up, yet the town remains greater says: "Not alone the psychological, but also the biological and medical aspects of marriage, love, and the sexual impulse are discussed, and new light is given on the less universal problems."

Science News Letter

Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases says: "Some of the finest and, in many respects, the most advanced findings in this field."

Birth Control Review

says: "Sums up the phenomena of psychology in their normal relation to life, so that the average person may get sufficient information to both in life and in conversation."

AUTHORIZED $3.00 POSTPAID 5TH PRINTING

389
PAGES

FREE OFFER

SEND NO MONEY

MAIL THIS COUPON

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or

Emerson Books, Inc., Dept. 774-N

251 West 19th St., New York City

Send me a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 plus a few cents delivery charge

when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned within 14 days.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ (CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only

$3 thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

than the sum of its inhabitants. The book is divided into four parts: a morning, an afternoon, a Saturday night, and the day of the town carnival, "Everybody's Day." These sections are in turn composed of innumerable episodes—small, characteristic fragments of the lives of the townsfolk. Many and perhaps most of the hundreds of characters are glimpsed briefly, never to be seen again, yet they have been caught in such natural attitudes that the reader can truly be said to be familiar with them on first acquaintance. Mr. Armfield is clever: each episode, though it be only a few sentences long, is in a sense resolved; so that the reader's curiosity is never whetted to the point where he demands to know more than Mr. Armfield will tell him. The ends of Mr. Armfield's people are unquestionably inherent in their beginnings, and in this connection the author is fortunate in his choice of subject matter. Determinism hangs heavy over the book; the characters move as if on a treadmill; indeed, these keyhole peepings reveal less of the mystery and wonder of life than they do of its predictability. Yet life in 1912 in a Southern town was surely like this. Free will may have been a pious Episcopalian illusion, but practically the element of surprise must have been noticeably absent. Mr. Armfield's subject does harmonize neatly with his method, but to say this and no more would be unfair. Mr. Armfield knows his subject well, knows its social and economic inequalities, its frustrations, its occasional, happy homeliness; and he tells the truth about it. This book is, above all, technically striking; but it is something more than a stunt novel, for it has real humanity.

MARY MCCARTHY

The Economics of Chinese History

LANDLORD AND PEASANT IN CHINA. By Chen Hanseng. International Publishers. $2.

KEY ECONOMIC AREAS IN CHINESE HISTORY. By Ch'ao-ting Chi. Allen and Unwin. (Issued in the United States by the American Council of Pacific Relations.) $2.50.

ALTHOUGH written wholly independently, these books present a consistent and penetrating interpretation of the dynamics of Chinese history. It is Dr. Chi's contention that the development of water resources has played a decisive role in charting the course of dynastic history. He shows that in the frequent periods of chaos when various principalities were struggling for dominance, victory almost invariably went to the side with the best-developed irrigation and canal system, because this alone could assure the production and transportation of food. Vast irrigation projects were of necessity undertaken by the state, since local groups had neither the organization nor the equipment to attempt them. Thus it usually turned out that the strength of the dynasty depended on its energy in initiating and carrying through huge public-works projects, or in developing new "key economic areas" to support the army and the legion of political hangers-on. Water-control activity, according to the account of Dr. Chi, was primarily a political weapon which conferred incidental economic benefits on the poverty-stricken peasants.

This situation persisted until about the middle of the nineteenth century, when a complete new set of economic and political relationships was established by the opening of the country to foreign trade and industrialization. It is at this

THE Nation ANNOUNCES THE POSTPONEMENT OF ITS DINNER

The Department of State has informed The Nation that André Malraux, the distinguished French novelist announced as a guest of honor with Louis Fischer at a dinner in New York City on January 28, has withdrawn his application for a visa. Hence he will not be in New York on January 28.

The Secretary of State pointed out that certain features of Mr. Malraux's case necessitated inquiries before a visa could be granted.

Pending the receipt of information that Malraux has received a visa, The Nation has postponed its dinner. It is hoped that the situation may be cleared up promptly.

THE Nation WITH Reader's Digest

FOR $6 ONLY IF DESIRED, SUBSCRIPTIONS MAY BE MAILED TO DIFFERENT ADDRESSES

Two of America's most outstanding periodicals for $1 more than the price of The Nation alone!

The Reader's Digest affords a delightful but inexpensive means of keeping well informed. Each issue reprints over 30 articles so skillfully condensed they preserve the essence of the original without loss of thought, spirit or style. In its monthly harvest of 112 pages you find the very articles you would mark for reading if it were possible for you to check through all the current periodicals.

As a reader of The Nation you already appreciate its importance in your reading scheme. More than ever before, during the next twelve, tempestuous months you will need The Nation for its truthful account of the significant news and for its fearless, authoritative interpretation.

Subscriptions are for one year. They may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. You need send no money for 30 days. But to assure your receiving this bargain rate we urge you to fill in and mail the coupon at once.

THE NATION,

20 Vesey Street,
New York City.

Name

Send me one year of The Reader's Digest and The Nation for $6. ☐ I inclose my check. OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days. Address

1-30-37

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

point that Mr. Chen begins his analysis, showing the effect of the forces unleashed by the West on the traditional economy of China. The picture is an appalling one. In the province of Kwangtung, where his study was undertaken, foreign commerce has existed for more than a century, but it has reacted only to the benefit of the comprador class. Many of these men have become immensely wealthy, and have invested their money, like all good Chinese, in land. The result has been a serious intensification of what was already the region's most serious problem—landlordism. Today 60 per cent of the cultivated land in the province is leased. Equally serious in its effect on the peasantry has been the development of a "modern" system of political organization which has increased taxes—taxes which are collected from the tenants rather than from the landlords—and given greater power to the local gentry.

As a consequence, Mr. Chen reports a steady and serious decline in living standards, agricultural productivity, and wage levels in the province during the past generation. A large proportion of the men have been driven into the army or to foreign countries, and agricultural labor has been performed to an increasing extent by women. Only about half of the tillable land is actually cultivated. The rest has suffered seriously from erosion and lack of proper care. Yet land is so expensive that it requires the equivalent of the wage of an agricultural laborer working for from ten to forty years to purchase a subsistence plot. On top of this, the handicraft industry has been practically destroyed by the flood of machine-made goods. Being a social scientist, Mr. Chen does not draw the obvious political conclusions from his study. But if the factors described by Dr. Chi still operate, one would expect that the neglect of fundamental resources, particularly labor power, would manifest itself in continuous civil strife and peasant uprisings until a constructive leader or new dynasty emerges.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

A General Tells Some Truths

WE CAN DEFEND AMERICA. By Major General Johnson Hagood. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

GENERAL HAGOOD, who was summarily removed from his position last winter for criticizing WPA expenditures and then restored for a day, has done a great service by writing this book. For once an intelligent general has spoken out. And he has not followed the usual custom of demanding more troops, more money, more barracks, more airplanes, and more preparedness of a wholesale character. Instead, he has sharply criticized the War Department and its methods and made statements which, if they were published by a general in any other country than our own, would result in an immediate governmental inquiry. But when Admiral Sims charged that the educational system of the navy was absolutely bad, called for the complete making over of Annapolis, and asserted that not a single officer on arriving at flag rank was competent to command the fleet in war time, nobody did anything. Hence it is too much to expect that General Hagood's book will receive the national attention that it deserves.

It is true that General Hagood favors the best navy in the world, which we are so plainly not getting. In his own field his thesis is that we can defend America without difficulty with a small regular force. He wants an army conceived, organized, and administered, not as they do it in Europe, but in accordance with the genius of the American people and our own geographical situation. He wants an "essentially defensive army," organized simply to repel invasion, and he points out that it is a thousand-fold more difficult for Europe to make war upon America than to make war upon itself. An army of a million men landed upon American shores would have to unload 20,000 tons of cargo per day to maintain itself. This includes motor trucks, poison gas, ammunition, steel rails, and so on. If we had landed in France during the World War all the materials that we needed, it would have called for 40,000 tons of cargo per day, and there are only five ports in the United States which could handle so much tonnage. Moreover, no country except England has the cargo ships to transport anything like what would be needed to keep even 500,000 men supplied from Europe.

Our seacoast defenses, the General says, are "a pile of junk." As for the air corps, he does not want a large one but a small, thoroughly up-to-date force, organized with some conception of our needs and of the task that an air corps would have to undertake. He thinks it ridiculous to form our air corps on the theory that it can be used to raid European countries behind their military front, and he is sure that if we had 5,000 airplanes, the bulk of them would be antiquated before the newest were completed. The new German army program of smashing an enemy's capital by a huge force of army airplanes and following that up by a forward drive of a small mobile army, he laughs at. "No such force could come across the Atlantic Ocean," are his words. Then he adds: "It could not be a German, a French, or an Italian force, because they do not have the ships. It could not be a British force, because they do not have the men. It could not be a Japanese force, because Japan could not operate so far from its base without a very long period

A Book You Should Read

The GLANDS OF LIFE

By HERMAN H. RUBIN, M.D.

How the Ductless Glands regulate our Mental, Physical and Sexual Health, Personality and Behavior. The vital role they play in our daily life and their contribution to successful living.

Vitality, Sexual Virility, Senility, Rejuvenation and many other important subjects are presented in clear, direct, non-technical language.

Packed with authoritative information, yet as readable as a novel.

Price $1.50

Postage 15c extra

B. B. BELLAIRE, PUBLISHER
420 Lexington Ave., N. Y. Department N

AT THE MOSCOW TRIAL

An inside story

by

D. N. PRITT, K.C., M.P.

English expert on court procedure who attended the recent treason trial in Moscow

This authoritative pamphlet answers all questions about the testimony and confessions of Zinoviev, Kamenev, Radek and others

SEND FIVE CENTS

in coins or stamps to

SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY

824 Broadway, New York City

And the pamphlet will be mailed to you at once of preparation, including the destruction of our fleet in the Pacific."

Another section of the book, devoted to the training of men, constitutes an important argument against long periods of training and universal military training. General Hagood cites one instance after another in the infantry, cavalry, field artillery, and coast artillery in which bodies of green men were trained by good professional officers in an amazingly short time—in six weeks—not by the methods employed during the World War but by using common sense and doing away with routine drills in barracks.

Next he affirms that America is not seventeenth among the military powers, as the War Department says, but the very first, and that it needs only a very small expeditionary force in case of an emergency. He pokes fun at all the manners and customs of the army, especially at the saluting. He doesn't even believe in uniform clothing for troops, only that they should wear rough clothing suitable for the season of the year; and he is crazy enough to think that dentists and surgeons on duty with the army do not need to wear boots and spurs. The important thing is to give the men the best of weapons and to train them not to become automatons but to use their brains. He thinks it would have been vastly better to have given the 200,000 American troops who landed in France without having fired their rifles a few hours of instruction in shooting than to have wasted weeks in teaching them to salute and do calisthenic drills.

If this is not treason to our whole pompous, autocratic, and utterly unrealistic military system, what could be? It is a conclusive argument for the immediate creation of a civilian board to modernize the whole defense business—if we must have a defense army—and to see to it that a definite program of defending our shores shall be worked out and our whole military effort centered around it.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Shorter Notices

ASPECTS OF WILDE. By Vincent O'Sullivan. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

The bulk of this book deals with Oscar Wilde's last years in Paris, a period of the writer's life that has been far more of a target for criticism and mud-slinging than the pre-jail period itself. We have been given pictures of a fat, beringed personage sinking helplessly into debauchery; Lord Carson, the prosecuting lawyer at Wilde's trial, has described bumping into a "poor, painted creature" in a Paris street, and many others have added their muddy, self-righteous contributions. Mr. O'Sullivan attacks these critics from the standpoint of his acquaintance with Wilde after the latter's release from prison, and the Wilde he presents is in no way a sunken, cowardly personality but rather an alert observer, enduring a tormented life of staring, hostile people with admirable courage. Always the author bears in mind that Wilde is a literary figure and should be considered as such, and so he has detached him from the general mess of moral prejudice and criticized his works and conversation sensibly and without bias. Originally intended as an essay the book was stretched into its present form—an unfortunate thing, as there are many pages in which Wilde is not mentioned at all and the main theme of the book is neglected. Many of Wilde's quips and anecdotes as quoted here are embarrassingly poor and serve only as padding. But in those portions of the book where quantity has been ignored the quality of the writing is very

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(by arrangement with Sidney Harmon)

But for the Grace of God

by Leopold Atlas

GUILD THEATRE. 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday and Saturday 2:45. Even. 8:45

PROSE and POETRY GUILD OFFERS FIVE FIVE-DOLLAR PRIZES for the best unpublished poems and short short stories by known and unknown writers.

POEMS AND STORIES TO BE INCLUDED IN GUILD ANTHOLOGY
Manuscripts cannot be returned

PROSE AND POETRY GUILD, DEPT. IT, 75 FIFTH AVE., N. Y. C.

RALPH BATES

English novelist, author of Lean Men, The Olive Field.
THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Author of I Change Worlds, just arrived from the Soviet Union and from Spain.
THE PEOPLE'S FRONT
IN SPAIN.

ROBERT MINOR

Member of the Central Committee, Communist Party,
U.S.A. AMERICAN NEU-TRALITY AND SPAIN.

MALCOLM COWLEY

Editor of The New Republic and author of Exile's Re- turn, Chairman.

SPAIN in DEFENSE of FREEDOM

Sponsored by The New Masses and The American Society for Technical Aid to Spanish Democracy

Tickets: 35c, 55c, 83c, $1.10, $1.65. Now on sale at: New Masses
(orders by mail and phone filled, CALEDONIA 5-3076), 31 East
27th St.; American Society for Technical Aid to Spanish Democracy
(orders by mail and phone filled, LEXINGTON 2-5039), 31 East
27th St., and all Workers Bookshops.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10TH, 8:30 P. M.
MECCA AUDITORIUM
133 West 55th Street

H
E
L
P

U
S

P
R
E
P
A
R
E

F
O
R

H
I
T
L
E
R

PROTEST

FOUR YEARS OF HITLER TERROR

AT

MECCA TEMPLE
130 West 55th Street

January 31st, 8 P. M.

SPEAKERS: Cong. Emanuel Celler; William Weiner, Pres.
I. W. O.; Moissaye J. Olgin, editor Morning Freiheit;
Isidore Sorkin, Manager Local 9, ILGWU; Kurt
Rosenfeld, Former Prussian Minister of Justice

CHAIRMAN: Ben Gold, Pres. Furriers Joint Council of N.Y.

AUSPICES OF

JEWISH PEOPLES COMMITTEE FOR UNITED ACTION AGAINST FASCISM AND ANTI-SEMITISM
401 Broadway

ADMISSION 50c, 35c

A REAL "ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION"

"ARE WE EVOLVED FROM APES?"

Was Darwin right? Is man a modified monkey?

A momentous debate that will become memorable

YES: Edwin Tenney Brewster, M.A., scientist and author, for the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism

NO: D. J. Whitney, B.Sc., of the Religion and Science Association BEGINS IN THE FEBRUARY 6TH ISSUE OF

THE TRUTH SEEKER (Est. 1873)

38 Park Row

New York, N. Y.

A Journal for Thinkers and Libertarians—issued weekly
Specializing in educational controversy; $3 a year; 10c a copy
Thirty-two page catalogue of scientific and liberal books free good and forms an excellent and much-needed defense of Wilde. There are also comments on many of Wilde's friends and enemies, all of which make good reading.

RICHARD VAUGHAN

THE NOVEL IN MOTLEY. A HISTORY OF THE BURLESQUE NOVEL IN ENGLISH. By Archibald Bolling Shepperson. Harvard University Press. $3.

The importance of Mr. Shepperson's subject is proved by the circumstance that three of his chapters are devoted to Fielding, Jane Austen, and Thackeray, each of whom served an apprenticeship in fiction wearing the cap and bells. Each of them began with parody upon a prevailing style, and each of them built upon that style an enduring one of his own—purified, of course, by a great talent, but purified also in the fires of criticism. For parody is criticism, as Mr. Shepperson perfectly understands, and it was by no means to the disadvantage of these three novelists that they had to start out by using their minds. Mr. Shepperson treats the whole story of burlesque fiction between Fielding and Bret Harte as if it were a chapter in the history of literary criticism, as indeed it seems to be; and only hints the moral that the chapter should not have closed with the nineteenth century, when for one reason or another the art of prose parody declined. Fiction continues to need something of the sort, particularly at a time when the criticism it gets is as absurd in its solemnity as most of the fiction is in its foolishness. Mr. Shepperson writes other chapters on the Frenchified romance, the novel of "feeling," the revolutionary novel, the Gothic tale, and the novel of knighthood as victims of current ridicule; and appends a valuable list of burlesque novels written between 1830 and 1900. His study is both workman-like and graceful, and should continue for a long time to have its uses.

MARK VAN DOREN

DRAMA

Near the Bohemian Coast

ANYONE who came in in the middle of "High Tor," Maxwell Anderson's new play at the Martin Beck Theater, might be pardonably bewildered. High in the air he would see two substantial but sinister citizens imprisoned in the bucket of an idle steam shovel, while upon a crag just beneath, the robustious shade of one of Henry Hudson's men is holding converse with a stenographer from a twentieth-century office. Other things just as odd as that happen quite regularly throughout the play, and yet—if the reader will only take my word for it—they can seem quite reasonable to one who has followed from the beginning the airy and delightful fantasy. Versatility is one of the most conspicuous though not the most important of Mr. Anderson's many virtues, and in "High Tor" he has written a playfully imaginative comedy agreeably unlike anything our theaters are accustomed to house.

Some spectators, to be sure, seem to have fretted themselves into believing that they do not understand everything as precisely as they should; but that is only because they have been looking for a more solemnly detailed symbolism than the author had any intention of providing, and the outline of the story is simple enough. A romantic young man—played with his usual combination of authority and charm by Burgess Meredith—owns a bit of mountain overlooking the Hudson. Living there in refuge from the modern world which he hates, he refuses to sell out to the industrialists who are gradually taking over the region; and during the course of one wild night, while the emissaries of the enemy are imprisoned in the bucket, he holds converse with those same Dutchmen who put Rip Van Winkle to sleep. They are embodiments of his romanticism as well as representatives of a race displaced by his forefathers exactly as he is about to be displaced by new aliens, and they convince him that it is folly to resist new civilizations—partly because they will win anyway and partly because, as an Indian surviving in flesh and blood explains, even the new turns into the quaint if you give it years enough; there is nothing man can build which does not make a very romantic ruin in time.

No one is likely to misunderstand that much of plot and meaning, but to hunt for precise symbolism in all the fantastic details which embellish or enliven the play is to assume a tight allegory when what one has is a freely playful fantasy instead. What one needs is not profundity but liveliness of imagination, and the curtain of the first act will illustrate as well as anything else the spirit of the piece. There has been some talk of the legendary Dutchmen, whose existence our hero will neither affirm nor deny, but who are said to appear in stormy weather. As dusk falls, he is facing the audience when suddenly one sees their silhouettes, schnapps keg and all, advancing across the crest. As the young man turns, we wait for the cry of astonishment. Nothing happens for an instant, and then he remarks calmly, "Well, it's going to rain all right." Now that, of course, doesn't mean anything except that the Dutchmen are a familiar sight to the hero. But at the moment when it comes, it is surprising and funny and delightful.

Using the word merely to define and not to evaluate, "High Tor" is surprisingly Shakespearean—or Beaumont and Fletcherish—in the sense that its immediate ancestors seem to be not any of the symbolic plays of recent years but the freer romantic fantasies of the Elizabethans, dominated by poetry and playfulness rather than by allegory. Nor could I help feeling that one of the most striking things about the performance was the happily receptive attitude of an audience which, I feel perfectly sure, would even five years ago have felt it a duty to resent anything so devoid of "sophistication." Perhaps the scene in which one of the Dutchmen mistakes two men under a blanket for a double-headed monster is a bit too directly Shakespearean (vide "The Tempest"), but Mr. Anderson modernizes the incident very amusingly, and his whole play may help accomplish something which the modern drama needs as badly as it needs anything else. It may help limber up the imagination.

I have already mentioned the engaging performance of Burgess Meredith. Considerably less expected is the richly humorous one by Charles G. Brown as one of the Dutchmen. All of us who had seen Mr. Brown in a long series of hard-boiled roles knew that he was a good actor, but we had about given up hope that he would ever be intrusted with anything except the comic relief in detective mysteries and the like. Now he emerges as the possessor of a real style which seems to fit perfectly the role of a half-comic, half-romantic ghost. I nominate him for almost any of the low-comedy roles in Shakespeare—anything from, say, First Grave-Digger to Sir Toby Belch.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

Black Is Black

IT HAS been said by at least one newspaper that "Black Legion," the film which Warner Brothers have made out of a recent American scandal, is "vastly important" and should be seen by everybody. To say this is to indict most Americans of a grossness which I think they do not possess. Most Americans disapproved of the doings in Michigan last spring, and the film can only underline their disapproval, since it keeps the night riders in a bad light throughout and sends a dozen of them to the penitentiary for life sentences at the close. But this is an easy moral triumph—kicking an obvious villain when he is already behind the bars. A subtler and perhaps more valuable triumph would consist in making us see a villain where we thought we had seen a saint, on some social level so high above that of the Michigan morons that many of us suppose it to be beyond criticism. We might learn something from such a film, whereas we are told by this one that black is black, and we knew that a long time ago. The film is not even excellent in its own terms; it is full of stock figures, it moves with a barren obviousness, and in general it has about one-tenth as much art in it as "Fury" had, to name a predecessor which itself was imperfect.

The frontier beyond the law is with us likewise in "The Plainsman" (Paramount), which brings Gary Cooper to his millions of adorers under the name of Wild Bill Hickok. The director, Cecil B. De Mille, has handled the inevitable Indians with a surprising restraint; the story is substantially true; and the march of events is very stirring. I say that the story is substantially true in spite of the fact that the original Hickok managed to get along without Calamity Jane (Jean Arthur) and, while certainly a killer, was always on the side of the law. It was perhaps a sound instinct that touched him here with irregularity, for it gives us a chance to see him softening under the influence of a woman. As for Gary Cooper himself, let it suffice that all biographers of Hickok report him as "handsome and fascinating." Mr. Cooper has never been more of either.

The Museum of Modern Art began its second annual series of revivals the other evening with a program which included one of the most famous of the early German films, "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari." It seemed to me a little less horrible than it was in 1921, partly perhaps because it had not been cut to the brilliant length it originally possessed in America. But the best of it was still powerful; and one could be sure that this best was exactly what it had once been, since the revival of a film is not, like the revival of a play, a new entity altogether—unless, as in the case of "Broken Blossoms" (Belmont Theater), the film has been remade from the ground up. Griffith's minor masterpiece of 1919 is no masterpiece at all in this English caricature of its celebrated and, of course, exaggerated terrors, the fine work of Dolly Haas as Lucy scarcely compensating for the crudeness of the rest.

While I am on the subject of revivals I should say to New Yorkers that the World Cinema on Forty-ninth Street is always worth watching, since any good film on earth may turn up there from the comparatively recent past.

MARK VAN DOREN

Teachers!

Twenty years ago the idea that knowledge of party politics, the price of electricity and the chance of a student finding a job after graduation belong among the materials of education was a revolutionary, almost sacrilegious notion. Today school walls are open wide to the problems which stretch beyond the classroom. Since 1914 the editors of THE NEW REPUBLIC, and its contributors—such men as Herbert Croly, Professor John Dewey, Professor Charles A. Beard—have been foremost among those who have put their shoulders against stiff academic walls and pushed them open. An important part of the audience of the weekly New Republic is composed of teachers and students. More than 100 colleges and schools use the paper today for supplementary reading.

The classroom rate of
The New REPUBLIC is 25¢ a month

per student, for orders of ten or more copies weekly, sent to one address. Desk copies free.

What students say

"I have found The New Republic the most informative of the socially conscious periodicals."

. . .

"I signed up in September for a course in Current Economic Problems. The textbooks are The New Republic and The New York Times. The type of material discussed in The New Republic had never before interested me, until I received my first two issues. I could not, at that time, see myself as interested, deeply interested, observer of political situations. Yet, after enjoying several of your issues, I feel that I have missed something really important, and am genuinely thankful for your so-excellent publication."

Address orders to
THE NEW REPUBLIC
40 East 49th Street New York

Letters to the Editors

A Seaman Does His Bit

[The following letter is reprinted from the Voice of the Federation, the lively newspaper published weekly by the Maritime Federation of the Pacific.]

Brothers: I'm second in command of a converted British yacht. . . . We picked up our boat in an unnamed Baltic port—crew were Danes and Esthonians. Now (November 29) we're off the Catalan coast, near Cape Ras, I believe. We'll slip into a little French port, Port Vendre, or maybe anchor off Banyul-sur-Mer. I'll try to slip ashore or send this ashore along with a few other "important" letters.

The weather has been thick, luckily for us, but the blockade is bad. Italy may not be in this thing officially, or Germany either, but the Dago subs are as thick as mourners at a rich Gee's funeral. And we saw several Heinie destroyers off Barcelona, where we did not go in.

Not that all this matters to you back there in the states. But it's pretty grim and pretty dirty business to the Spiks over here. It's the same sort of high-handed tactics sometimes used in the states by owners fighting the workers. And the lesson we can learn by watching the outcome of this mess may help the workers and the union men when a similar crisis comes to the United States.

I suppose I'll be blacklisted in the states as a damn Communist. I can alibi that I'm running arms—for that's our job—for the dough and the kick I get out of it. Put it down that way. But you can also hint to any comrades in the states that I'd see myself burn in hell before I'd run guns for that "Bastid" (as Hemingway calls it) Fascist Franco.

If and when we get this load through, and if and when we finish this business, I may stay and enlist with what is left of the workers' army—fighting in whatever country the battle is being waged. Or I may return to the United States and enlist in the battle that is going on there all the time. Maybe with what I've learned over here I can be of some help. If you want me, that is.

So—Hasta Luego, as the Spiks say.

Off the Coast of Spain,
Thanksgiving Day, 1936

R. B.

Monroe and Roosevelt

Dear Sirs: I accede unreservedly to Mr. Hallgren's superior knowledge of naval and military possibilities in a future war in which the United States may be involved. I admit my ignorance about the strategic importance of Guam and sincerely hope that my fears that New York or San Francisco may be bombarded by enemy airplanes are entirely unfounded. Mr. Hallgren may be assured that I am not a press agent for any of the aviation firms. That, so far, there are no bombing planes which can fly 3,000 miles and back with a full load, I readily admit.

Rereading my article, however, I somehow cannot discover the passage in which I said that the United States could be conquered by submarines and airplanes. Mr. Hallgren would have saved sixteen lines of his argumentation in the valuable space of The Nation if he had not overlooked the fact that, at the beginning of my article, I said that these bombers could be launched from airplane carriers. Airplane carriers can be protected by warships and submarines. Twenty years ago German submarines were able to come to American shores and there sink American ships. Moreover, I do not see why an expeditionary force of "volunteers" from Japan or the European fascist powers could not be landed, for instance, during a civil war in Mexico, and then marched to the United States border. It is not farther from Europe to America than from America to Europe, and twenty years ago America was able to land one and a half million men in France to fight against Germany.

Though I must dispel Mr. Hallgren's doubt that I had ever read Monroe's original message to Congress, I looked it up again in the "World Almanac" and I remain under the impression, which I happen to share with the spokesmen of all the reactionary Latin American governments, as well as with those of their extreme leftist opponents, that Monroe's message was a unilateral declaration. Roosevelt's address appeared to me, as to most commentators, to be a departure from the idea of the original Monroe message by its implication of a multi-lateral agreement in the mutual interest of all countries, which of course means also in the interest of the United States.

Mr. Hallgren's statement to the effect that Roosevelt's intention is to prevent the Latin American republics from "fighting on the other side" is not only no refutation of my interpretation but practically identical with what I said on the subject, namely, "Roosevelt's speech was apparently also a warning to those Latin American countries which flirt with the idea of aligning themselves with the European fascist countries." And the American desire "to protect the sources of certain raw materials that America might need in the war" is quite obviously implied in that idea and needs no special emphasis. I also grant Mr. Hallgren that another objective may have been the furtherance of "peaceful economic penetration." But this is also so obvious that, probably for this reason, a very similar passage in my original manuscript was left out by the editors of The Nation, because of lack of space.

True, from the point of view of uncompromising traditional pacifism and radicalism, the intentions of the Roosevelt Administration fall undoubtedly under the category of imperialism, but I shamelessly admit that I believe that as long as the millennium is still in the offing, the workers of these semi-colonial countries might be better off within the sphere of an enlightened economic imperialism, Roosevelt style, than under the heel of Hitler, Mussolini, or the Japanese war lords.

STEPHEN NAFT

New York, January 23

The Honor Is Ours

Dear Sirs: The Nation itself, and an Associated Press release, brought me the news that you had seen fit to include my name on your 1936 honor roll. I sincerely appreciate this honor. Since I started to college I have been a regular reader of The Nation, and I give the magazine and its staff a large part of the credit for any liberal outlook that I may have.

In your citation you refer to the dark regions of Mississippi. It is true that my native state is backward in many ways, but this particular section, northeastern Mississippi, more especially the Tupelo area, is the most liberal area in the mid-

South. The chief factor helping to create a measure of liberality in this immediate section has been the coming of the TVA. We have a long way to go, but I sincerely believe, and I say it advisedly, that if the TVA is allowed to go through with its broad program, this immediate area will take the lead in progressive measures in the South.

Your recognition of my work is the greatest honor that I have ever received, and I want to say again that I greatly appreciate it.
GEORGE MCLEAN
Tupelo, Miss., January 2

Another Durruti

Dear Sirs: Your issue of December 26 carried a letter signed by Max Nomad, Stephen Naft, Carlo Tresca, and others which said that Buenaventura Durruti, leader of the Anarchist column in Spain, "is the same Durruti whom the New Masses of June 9 accused of working with the fascists."

This is not the case. The New Masses of June 9 published an article from Spain by Ilya Ehrenbourg which said that "the police arrested a certain Anarchist, Marcelo Duruti, who was planning in league with the fascists quite an underhanded affair." Obviously Marcelo Duruti is not the same as Buenaventura Durruti.

As for the "cowardice" of the Spanish Anarchists, one is surprised that anyone should miss the point. What originally made the Anarchists a menace to the defense of Spanish democracy was not their cowardice. They always have been and are to this day extremely brave men. But their Anarchist principles nullified their courage. Several months ago they plastered the walls of Spain with posters saying: "Let us organize indiscipline." The practical application of this doctrine was disastrous. In war the most exalted personal courage is no substitute for that discipline which the Anarchists at first rejected in principle.

That much the Anarchists themselves learned from bitter experience. Today one of their leaders, Juan Peyro, says to his comrades: "It is necessary that you, lovers of indiscipline, realize that now we must have a war discipline. . . . The members of the National Confederation of Labor did not go into the government to represent indiscipline, but on the contrary to demand discipline and unified command."

It is true that "for the last sixty years the Spanish Anarchists have been the romantic daredevils of their country's labor movement." It is also true that romantic daredevilry by itself can never solve fundamental military and political problems. For the last sixty years the Spanish Anarchists have been following a false theory which the experience of the civil war has caused the best of them to abandon.

JOSEPH FREEMAN
New York, December 28

On Buying ■ Used Car

Dear Sirs: Some time ago my wife and I saw an advertisement that looked good to us: "1934 Ford Coupe, good condition, $425, run only 21,000 miles."

"Mary, that's the car we need. I can use it going to work, and then you can have it the rest of the day." "Do you think we can afford it, Jim?" "Well, we will go down and look at it."

After we had signed on the dotted line, I paid $100 down as first payment, then $1.50 for license transfer. A few days later I received a notice from a finance company that they held my notes, having bought them from the used-car dealer, and that the interest on the unpaid balance was $70. In the same mail was a copy of my contract from the used-car dealer, with insurance papers covering fire, theft, and collision. The insurance cost me $56 down, and my monthly payments were $29.33 a month on the unpaid balance.

One week after we bought the car two cylinders started to pump oil. After trying to remedy this by new plugs, I had to have the valves reground. This cost $7. Then my coil unit burned out, and the brakes refused to hold; the complete bill this time was $22. About a month later I noticed a bulge in the rear. It looked like a paint blister, but when I tried to sandpaper it down, the whole piece fell out. A hole had been knocked in the back and then patched up with wood filler. I had to take it to a body mechanic, who repaired it and painted it—for $6.

A week or so later I noticed a knock either in the engine or the clutch housing. On examination I found one gear worn and a piston ring broken—cost $32. I had to have a complete set of new rings put in, as well as other parts for the clutch. By this time my tires were down to the fabric. I tried to get by with some second-hand tires, but after two months they were just as bad as the others, so I went to Sears, Roebuck and got a complete set for around $45.

I still must pay $150 on the car before I can get the title; by this time the car has depreciated in value, so that if I sell it for $150 I will be doing well. Pro-

Waiting

By Raphael Soyer

Genuine, Signed, Original ETCHINGS of Museum Quality

Works Like These Regularly
Sell for $18, $36 and UP
NOW ONLY $5 EACH

Fifty-one of America's foremost artists have agreed to permit a limited sale of their personally signed, original etchings and lithographs at only $5 each—as part of a new nation-wide art program. The offering includes genuine, signed originals by such famous artists ■ Thomas Benton, George Elmer Browne, John Steuart Curry, Luigi Lucioni, Louis Lozowick, Philip Kappel and John Costigan—men whose signatures on some works of art are valued at hundreds, even thousands of dollars. Many of the originals here offered would regularly sell in the galleries for many times this remarkably low price!

Includes Five Prize-Winners

Every work is guaranteed perfect, and is in strictly limited edition, after which the plates are destroyed. In ■ cases the etching is so delicate that editions are limited to far less than a hundred original prints. These are not small originals. Plate sizes average ■ by 11 inches. Mat sizes average 14 by 18 inches. This is the same group from which more than a score of art museums have obtained works for their permanent collections. In addition to five prize-winners, four in this new group have just been selected by America's leading art critics as among the "Outstanding Prints of the Year."

Many Already Doubled in Value

A survey indicates that many originals have already more than doubled in value (some even tripled) because of the unprecedented demand, which quickly exhausts editions. We suggest that you act promptly in order to give yourself the broadest selection.

Send for Free Illustrated Catalogue

An interesting catalogue has been prepared, illustrating the works available, and containing biographical data on each artist's career and awards. Send only 10c in stamps to cover mailing costs and a copy will be sent to you at once. Through our special mail order service you can select the originals you wish at home. All selections are shipped with the understanding that your money will gladly be refunded if not delighted in every way. Address:

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN ARTISTS
Studio 431, 420 Madison Ave., N. Y.

vided I don't have to make any more major repairs in the next three months, the car will have cost me $708.46. If I ever have enough money ahead I believe I will become a used-car dealer.

CORBILCO

Richmond, Va., January 11

Pilot, Retired

Dear Sirs: "Twenty-seven people were killed last month in airplane crashes." You start the paragraph on aviation in your issue of January 9 with a shock; and I am glad of it. But you do not mention that one of these twenty-seven was Juan de la Cierva, the inventor of the autogiro. His death in an airplane was certainly an "irony of fate."

Your recommendations for air safety are sound. After flying as a professional pilot for fourteen years it dawned on me that it was a hazardous business; so in 1931 I got a mechanic's job with the Pitcairn Autogiro Company. Carrying mail with a parachute as life preserver, as I did in 1919, was okay, but to have a load of passengers trusting in my good luck seemed a bit too much.

It was not long before I was flying the "whirligigs" and liking it. In the navy it was a pleasure to fly over the water in a good old flying boat, but I had never been really happy over the land, wondering where to "land" if—

The air lines have done wonders, but

I doubt if they pay big dividends until flying is proved to be not only faster but also safer than other forms of transportation. I believe this can be done with the autogiro and the dirigible. I trust that you will give aviation more notice. Its progress will aid unity among nations as other forms of fast transportation have done.

JOHN MILLER

Upper Montclair, N. J., January 11

Rivera's Frescos

Dear Sirs: Many of your readers have doubtless seen Diego Rivera's magnificent series of twenty-one frescos painted for the people of New York by the great artist as a voluntary labor, and housed by him in the auditorium of the New Workers' School. The building is now to be torn down, and the New Workers' School has received a dispossession notice.

We have found a new home, a big trade-union and labor center at 131 West Thirty-third Street, but the rent is more than three times as high as in the ramshackle old building we have been occupying, and the cost of proper moving and installation is above $900. A minimum sum of $1,500 raised promptly will cover the moving and some of the additional expenses thus incurred. The murals have now been crated and moved into the building, where they will be kept on permanent exhibition when sufficient funds have been raised.

The New Workers' School is a non-profit, volunteer-operated institution with no funds of its own. Will you help us save the murals and make them accessible to many more thousands? Make checks payable to Mural Fund, New Workers' School, 131 West Thirty-third Street.

BERTRAM D. WOLFE

New York, January 15

Objection Allowed

Dear Sirs: Max Nomad, Stephen Naft, Carlo Tresca, Anita Brenner, and J. M. Escuder are right in protesting against my unnecessary and undesirable indiscretion about the column which allowed the Spanish rebels to enter the university suburb. This is the time for an armistice among anti-fascists which may offer the opportunity for greater understanding, closer cooperation, and perhaps ultimate fusion.

LOUIS FISCHER

Paris, January 15

CONTRIBUTORS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is professor of applied Christianity at the Union Theological Seminary and author of "Reflections on the End of an Era."

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT, professor of English literature at the University of Chicago, is the author of many works of literary criticism and of several novels. With William Vaughn Moody he wrote "A History of English Literature," a standard textbook. He was at one time editor of the Dial and is at present an editor of the New Republic.

ALEXANDER VIDAKOVIC, London correspondent of Politika, the leading journal of Belgrade, also contributes to the London Economist and the New Statesman and Nation. He recently spent six months in America covering the Presidential campaign and other events for his paper.

KENNETH BURKE is the author of "Permanence and Change," "Counter-statement," and "Towards a Better Life." He will give a series of lectures on literary criticism during the spring term of the New School for Social Research.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One Year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

"ESSENTIAL READING
FOR ANYONE WHO WISHES
TO UNDERSTAND THE
PROCESSES SHAPING
THE WORLD TODAY"

—The Baltimore Sun

In this book, written not to frighten, but to warn, the author of Hitler Over Europe answers the question that overshadows the world of 1937. Will the next twelve months witness a fight to the finish between the forces of Fascism, led by Germany, and the forces of Socialism, led by Russia? Here is the documented, considered, relentless analysis of a brilliant political analyst. Price $2.50.

HITLER OVER RUSSIA?

The Coming Fight Between the Fascist and The Socialist Armies

BY ERNST HENRI

SIMON AND SCHUSTER, Publishers, 386-4th Ave., N. Y. C.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 6, 1937

NUMBER 6

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	141
EDITORIALS:
THE SOVIET TRIALS	143
MR. KEYNES AND WALL STREET	145
A PROGRAM FOR LABOR	146
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	147
A CHALLENGE TO PACIFISTS by Vera Micheles Dean	148
BOETTIGER—HIS MASTER'S VOICE by Ellen McGrath and J. P. Dallas	150
THE SUPREME COURT AND CIVIL LIBERTIES by Isidor Feinstein	151
GERMANY'S ECONOMIC IMPASSE by Alexander Vidakovic	153
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	155
BROUN'S PAGE	156
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
A BELIEVING THOMAS by Joseph Wood Krutch	157
ICHOIR OF IMAGINATION by Marianne Moore	158
LOVER'S INDULGENCE by Michael Sayers	159
A CENTURY OF HISTORY by Clara Gruening Stillman	160
THE USABLE PAST by Lee Simonson	161
MODERN DANCE IN AMERICA by Francis Fergusson	163
NEW NOVELS by Caroline Smith	163
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin	164

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

BLOOD HAS AGAIN BEEN SHED IN FLINT, IN the course of the General Motors attempt to reopen its plants. Twenty-five men were hurt in clashes of strikers and company guards, and General Motors had to concede Plant No. 4 lost to the strikers. While the strikers were coping with one strike-breaking method, company guards, counsel for the C.I.O. was fighting another, the court injunction. General Motors is basing its plea on its property rights, but it ignores the fact that the most important property right involved is the right of the workers to have their jobs under decent conditions.

★

SENATOR BORAH'S ORATION OVER NBC IN defense of the Supreme Court was played up beforehand as a masterpiece by the tory press. It added nothing to the debate on the Constitution except to strengthen the conviction that the tories will oppose any curbing of the court's power and will insist on change (if any) by constitutional amendment, on the theory that they will be able to block an amendment more easily than a Congressional curb. And with this speech Senator Borah clinches the role of the Daniel Webster of his time. Meanwhile the court, in a decision which will have more influence than the Senator's speech, outlawed the Washington state utility tax, and showed that it is still operating on its old five-to-four basis.

★

IF THE SECRET OF HITLER'S SUCCESS HAS been his ability to do the unexpected, his fourth anniversary message was the least successful of his career. On internal policy there was little that he could say that had not been repeated a dozen times. The four-year plan will be pursued until national self-sufficiency is achieved, even though the food shortage is aggravated. But on foreign affairs he had a choice between meeting Blum and Eden halfway and thus alleviating the tension created by his Spanish adventure, and a bold gesture of defiance which would have electrified his supporters at home. In doing neither he revealed a weakness which may ultimately prove fatal for fascist leadership. The repetition of his demand for colonies meant little to his German hearers but profoundly disturbed the British, who looked in vain for a conciliatory note in answer to Eden's pleas. Similarly, his attempts to drive a wedge between France and the Soviet Union by asserting that there "are no humanly conceivable points of dispute" between France and Germany fell on deaf ears as far as the French government is concerned. The repudiation of the war-guilt clause stood as a lone reminder of the audacity by which Hitler has captured German confidence. With no further surprises possible except through violating the sovereignty of other countries, it remains to be seen how long Hitler can without war divert the people's attention from their empty larders.

★

THE PAST WEEK'S REPORTS FROM THE MADRID front indicate that the government is once more on the offensive. Despite almost continuous rain or fog, the loyalists followed up their success at the Cerro de los Angeles with a brilliant advance in West Park which threatens the rebel position in the University City area. Government forces have also advanced in the vicinity of Bilbao and are said to be menacing Granada. At Malaga the situation remains critical, but the rebel advance appears to have been halted by government reinforcements. The increasing strength of the loyalist forces is largely due to improved morale, better discipline, and a development of the war industries in government territory, but it also reflects a steady deterioration in the rebel forces. The insurgents have already lost the better part of two armies—the regular Spanish army, which never could be trusted in fighting against the people, and the Moors, who have suffered terrific losses. As a last resort Franco has some 20,000 Germans to draw on, but he has hesitated to use them, possibly because he fears to alienate such sections of Spanish middle-class opinion as still believe in the patriotic motives of the rebels. If the insurgent army continues to deteriorate, Hitler and Mussolini will be hard put to carry through the first step in their program for world fascism.

★

ACTION BY THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD increasing the reserve requirements of member banks by one-third reduces but does not eliminate the danger of credit inflation. As the board points out, the total amount of deposits in banks and the Postal Savings system, plus currency outside the banks, is already two billion dollars larger than in 1929. If the turnover on these deposits were comparable to pre-depression levels, they could support far greater business activity and considerably higher prices than exist today. Even with the new reserve requirements, there will be at least a half-billion dollars in excess reserves, which might be transformed into four or five billion dollars' worth of new credit. While it is true that the Federal Reserve Bank could further cut these reserves by selling its holdings of government bonds, such action would probably lead to an undesired increase in interest rates and impair the government's borrowing power. And if business activity increases very rapidly, some banks are likely to desert the Federal Reserve system in order to free themselves from the stringent reserve requirements. Yet some action was imperative, and it was well to take such a step before pressure from business groups made it impossible.

JUDGE JULIAN W. MACK HAS AGAIN SHOWN his talent for economic realism and judicious statement in a decision of the first importance in the Electric Bond and Share case. Our readers will recall the furor which was raised in holding-company circles by the so-called "death sentence" clause of the Public Utility Holding Company Act—a furor which was nourished by the hysterical opinion handed down by Judge Coleman in the famous Burco case and which, on what Chairman James E. Landis of the SEC calls the "bad Liberty League advice" of well-paid counsel, was extended into a bitter fight on the part of the big holding companies against registering at all under the act. The holding companies proceeded to tie the government up in a tangle of suits, and thus divide its strength. The government's strategy in turn has been to push the Electric Bond and Share case because it presents the issues most clearly. Judge Mack has decided that the registration provisions are separable from the rest of the act, that registration may itself be viewed as a regulatory device through the publicity of accounts which it achieves, and that it was not up to him to pass on the merits of the rest of the act, which can be decided by the courts after the companies register. The decision is as clear and admirable as any which has recently emerged from the lower federal courts.

★

TO HERR GOEBBELS, GERMANY'S MINISTER OF Public Enlightenment, we happily recommend the following etymological item lifted from a French newspaper: The word Sanhedrin is defined as "the supreme council and tribunal of the Jews, presided over by a president, the Nazi."

★

TOM MOONEY HAS LOST THE FIRST ROUND of his new fight for freedom. Early in 1935 an application for a writ of habeas corpus was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that Mooney's conviction was in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court denied the writ, holding that Mooney had not exhausted the resources of the California courts. The proper steps were promptly taken, one by one. An appeal to the Superior Court of Marin County was denied without a hearing. An appeal to the Appellate Court of the state was denied in a two-to-one decision. In July, 1935, the California Supreme Court appointed as referee an attorney named Shaw to report to the court on Mooney's charges of perjury and frame-up. After lengthy investigations, hearings began. They lasted 135 days and were marked by bitter wrangling between the referee and Mooney's attorneys and by the dramatic appearance as witnesses of both Mooney and Billings. And now the referee has at last handed down his expected "findings." He reports that the trial was not a frame-up, that perjured testimony was not introduced, and that evidence favorable to Mooney was not suppressed. The state Supreme Court will soon hear arguments on the report and will render what will also undoubtedly be an adverse decision. Whereupon the case will again be taken before the Supreme Court of the United States and the real fight for Mooney's freedom and the righting of a historic wrong will there be waged.

★

THE DETAILED PICTURE OF A RACKET WHOSE tentacles reach into organized labor is being unfolded at the trial now going on in New York City on the basis of material dredged up by Thomas E. Dewey and his staff of investigators. The courage of one Benny Gottesman, secretary of Local Number One of the Waiters' Union, in resisting the illegal advances of racketeers armed with money, guns, and, allegedly, the support of a Tammany leader stands out against the sordid evidence of bribes, shakedowns, and betrayals involving officials of other locals and the agents of "Dutch" Schultz. Some trade unionists have accused Mr. Dewey of using his investigations to discredit labor, though this hardly jibes with his well-known political ambitions. There is genuine danger in the new wave of agitation for laws to "protect" labor unions which the trial has set in motion. There is no reason why unions should not be subject to laws giving the public access to their accounts. But both labor and liberals should be wary of legislation going beyond this. The Nation has consistently pointed out that ultimately the only cure for racketeering in unions is rank-and-file control. In more than one union in New York City this cure has been effected in the last few years. If the industrial-unionism movement succeeds, it will be more potent than any legislation in sweeping labor's house clean.

★

THE MUDDY WATERS OF JAPAN'S CABINET crisis have not been appreciably cleared up by the formation of the new government. General Hayashi's appointment as Premier is clearly a makeshift which does not resolve the situation definitely in favor of one side or the other. Nor does it indicate any change in foreign policy, although it was dissension over foreign policy that caused the downfall of the Hirota Cabinet. From the point of view of the army extremists, two distinct issues were involved. One, the maintenance of a unified control and the elimination of factionalism within the army, was a matter affecting the military. The other, involving dissolution of the Diet and the establishment of an authoritarian government, was a question of national politics. Starting a drive to settle the second of these issues, the army extremists blundered into raising the first over the question of General Ugaki as Premier. A man of wide experience, strong mind, and independent convictions, Ugaki was distinctly out of favor with the ruling army clique because of personal clashes in the past. Neither issue has been settled by the choice of General Hayashi. Although he is a solid army career man, he represents the moderate conservative group rather than the extremists, and this does not help the cause of army unity. And with the army still in control, the struggle between the military and the Diet is bound to recur.

Behind the Soviet Trials

IT IS possible that it will be another hundred years before all the actual facts about the recent Soviet trials are known. That is true of any complex event that involves clashes of national policy and the ambitions of individuals. Meanwhile it is the task of progressives all over the world to appraise, without any political or emotional commitments, the meaning and implications of what has happened in Russia, to separate legal procedures from political realities and both from matters of faith. Russia is the laboratory in which the success of a workers' state is being tested. And when there is an explosion in the laboratory, the whole world watches the results.

The foremost question in the recent war of the pamphlets has turned on how authentic the confessions are and how fair the judicial procedure. The other big question is the relation of the trials to the struggle for power going on in Russia. Both questions must be viewed in the context of Soviet law and revolutionary history.

Soviet public law differs from ours in several essential respects. In a regime of Socialist construction such offenses as sabotage and wrecking, which in other regimes would be classed merely as property crimes, are considered crimes against the state. Moreover, Soviet judicial procedure is patterned more on the Continental model than on the Anglo-American. A man is held for a political crime after an initial investigation by the Department of State Security. There follows an elaborate examination by the State Prosecutor, witnesses being called and a verbatim report of the evidence taken down. All this is secret. Finally comes the trial itself, in which the defendant is given the right of counsel (whatever may be its value in the hostile atmosphere of the regime) and of utterance, and in which he has a chance to deny or withdraw confessions or testimony given in the preliminary examination. Like other Continental trials, the Soviet trial is informal, both prosecutor and defendant being allowed to make speeches which we should consider as belonging on the hustings rather than in a courtroom. The tribunal is the Supreme Court of the U. S. S. R. and from it no appeal lies. Death penalties are provided for a whole series of political and economic crimes against the state. Nor is there anything unusual, even outside Russia, in basing a conviction upon confessions. In both English and American law all that is needed to prove treason is two witnesses to the overt act or a confession in open court. The heart of the difference between Soviet and Anglo-American law lies rather in the meaning assigned to "open court." With us the trial is the thing itself, with the burden of proof resting upon the prosecution; with the Soviets it is the final stage in a series of investigations, and the defendant's safeguards lie not in the sifting of every scrap of testimony and documentary evidence but in his chance to challenge or repudiate any testimony. According to Soviet law, the government is under no obligation to publish documentary evidence, and seems in these cases to have lived up to its own judicial procedures. But the prosecution's failure to produce and publish such evidence has profoundly disturbed everyone brought up in the Anglo-Saxon concept of due process.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The first reaction of liberals to the trials was one of sheer incredulity. Surely the thing was not possible! Given crimes so monstrous, how explain the fulness, even the fulsomeness of the confessions? To the credit of most liberals, they did not place much stock in the theories advanced by the Hearst papers, the American Mercury, and their close runner-up, the now reactionary Time—theories of the use of torture or of some strange and hypnotic "confession gas." The first trial had a bad press, both in England and America. If the second has had a markedly better press—and we believe it has—one reason is that the incredulity has decreased before the relentless piling up of the testimony. Another reason is that the defendants in the second trial, especially Radek, Piatakov, and Serebriakov, were men of more stubborn strength and greater integrity than those of the first trial, and their confessions were therefore more impressive. Finally, the suspicion that the confessions might in the first trial have been extorted by a promise of freedom was weakened when the executions were carried out and when it became clear that the defendants in the second trial made their confessions while facing what they believed to be certain death. It would have been possible for Radek to say a few words of repudiation in open court in the presence of foreign correspondents and the diplomatic corps, and with those words to electrify the whole world. That he did not do so carries considerable conviction.

This leads us from the realm of judicial procedure to that of political reality. It must be clear that the two recent trials do not stand alone. They are best viewed as rounding out (of course there will be other trials soon, but they will be sequels to the last two) a chain of judicial prosecutions of political offenses that stretches back over the last fifteen years. In 1922, after the attempt on Lenin's life, twelve Social Revolutionaries were condemned to death at proceedings attended by Vandervelde and Liebknecht, but their sentences were commuted. From 1926 to 1933 there was a succession of trials of Soviet and foreign technicians, among them the Shakhty trial of Russian technicians in the Donetz coal mines in 1927-28, the Kharkov trial of Ukrainian intelligentsia in 1930, the trial of Professor Ramzin and other Soviet engineers in the same year, the 1931 trial of the Menshevik professors, and the 1933 trial of the Metro-Vickers engineers that caused such a furor in England. In 1934, however, a new phase was reached by the Kirov assassination, followed by a series of reprisals including the round-up and secret trials at Moscow, Leningrad, Minsk, and Kiev of some two hundred persons charged with being implicated in the murder, and the execution of more than a hundred. The two recent trials are thus part of a sequence in which the Soviet regime has fought its internal enemies, economic sabotage, and the danger of foreign intervention. But they differ from those that have preceded in that the defendants have been "Old Bolsheviks" who served with Lenin and occupy an important place in the calendar of revolutionary heroes.

This whole sequence of sabotage and conspiracy on the one hand and ruthless judicial prosecution on the other is best explained in terms of the struggle for power that has been an inevitable part of the consolidation of the revolutionary regime—a struggle that has involved both men and ideas. To understand this struggle it must be remembered that most of the defendants in the last two trials were, along with Lenin and Stalin, the leaders of the October revolution. It was difficult for these men, as Stalin moved into power, to take subordinate positions to one whom they considered their intellectual inferior. One must understand the bitterness of men who were once giants in the revolution and who now felt that their opinions were ignored and their talents wasted in minor administrative posts. One must understand also the bitterness of Stalin and his following, who believed that these men would stop at nothing to displace them from power. One must remember the long sequence of secret maneuvers, arrests, exile, repentance, and pardon in the cases of Zinoviev, Kamenev, and several of the others. And one must see these personal conflicts and hatreds, finally, in the context of a struggle between two theories of revolution—between the belief that the social revolution all over the world must be put ahead of everything else, and the belief that the best contribution to the revolutionary cause was the defense at all costs of the hard-won Socialist gains in Soviet Russia. This struggle was exacerbated by events in Germany and China, and it came to its highest pitch in the belief of the anti-Stalin group (now seen to be mistaken) that Russia would leave the Spanish masses to their fate.

The part of the charges most difficult of belief is the part that has to do with conspiracy with fascist powers. Here one can only suspend judgment. That the opposition group, seeing the economic gains that the Stalin regime had achieved, seeing also the massive administrative machine and the fabulously strong army that it had built up, and realizing that it had intrenched itself in the opinion of the masses—that in the light of this the group should have turned to terrorism and conspiracy is quite plausible. It is less credible that they should have gone so far as to negotiate with hostile foreign powers, although it may be made to fit into the same pattern. For it has been part of the creed of world revolution that national boundaries are less important than revolutionary gains. Lenin himself used the permission of the Kaiser's government to pass through Germany on his "sealed train" in order to reach the scene of revolution. And at Brest-Litovsk he was less concerned with the territory he had to cede than with the task of building up the revolutionary regime. Minds convinced of the rightness of their cause might even have gambled with a possible war between Russia on the one side and Germany and Japan on the other, especially in the belief that such a war would be a certain prelude to world revolution.

From the side of the Soviet government it is probable that the trials have been not only judicial prosecutions but also publicity exhibits. In the present position of Soviet Russia, threatened as it is by war, the health of the state consists in complete unity, and the discrediting of "Trotskyism" by connecting it with terrorism, sabotage, and fascist conspiracies may have seemed an effective way of removing the last vestige of opposition. In foreign affairs the Soviet policy of forming a popular front with the democratic forces and against fascism is threatened by similar opposition. The charges of foreign conspiracy and attempts to restore capitalism in Russia may therefore have been emphasized for their effect upon mass opinion.

A final question remains—whether the whole episode indicates a political weakness inherent in the Soviet system. The passing of a handful of men, however important as revolutionary figures, is of minor importance and in itself cannot touch the inner fabric of the regime. But the trial itself and the conspiracy from which it emerged, even assuming as true the most extreme charges of the government, are both disturbing. The plain fact is that under a proletarian dictatorship men who differ fundamentally from the government cannot express their differences through political action. When a regime makes opposition illegal it sows the seeds of conspiracy; the inevitable result is the growth of plots which find their sequel in ruthless repression and in trials like the one just concluded. This circle can probably be broken only when stability—domestic and international—has existed long enough to allow the realization of the democratic aims embodied in the new Soviet constitution, and by further additions of democratic procedures in ever larger doses in the future. Ultimately in a proletarian dictatorship, as distinguished from a fascist state, no ruling group can remain in power unless it uses its energy and strength for purposes of which the working class approves. That must be the final test of the Soviet system. Meanwhile the sympathetic outside observer must offer the Russian government a measure of that criticism which a legal opposition provides the government of a democracy. He must point out the dangers inherent in a prolonged dictatorship, while refusing to use the trial as the enemies of the Soviet Union are using it—as a curtain which they draw down upon Russia's positive achievements in building a collective economy and a culture.

Keynes and Wall Street

JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES, the most gifted and provocative of contemporary economists, has written a series of articles in the London Times calling upon the British government to take immediate steps to protect the country against the next depression. He is no alarmist; but he insists that the time to prevent a slump is while the economic curve is upward. Action taken after the onset of depression will be palliative at best.

Mr. Keynes's program is consistent with the one he has been advocating—more or less vainly—for four years, but it is adapted to a different stage of the economic cycle. He believes that the time has passed for the government to try to stimulate business activity and that it should now devote its efforts to the contrary policy—a deliberate attempt to slow down the forces threatening boom conditions. But he rejects the weapon by which this has traditionally been achieved—dear money, which he says must be avoided "as we would hell-fire." Instead, he suggests a cessation of public works, an increase in taxes, and a reduction of the public debt. To supplement this, he suggests that the creditor countries permit a flow of gold to the raw-material-producing states to fortify them against the next crisis. As a final recommendation, Mr. Keynes proposes the establishment of a board of public investment which would make plans now for socially justified public works that should be undertaken upon the appearance of the next slump.

Perhaps the most striking thing about Mr. Keynes's program is the fact that it is almost the direct opposite of that proposed by the more conservative Wall Street interests in this country. The financial pages of our press have been filled recently with statements calling for a return to "normal" interest rates. It is true that Wall Street would like a reduction in the public debt, but it has fought bitterly against all proposals for an increase in the income tax (which is what Mr. Keynes means when he calls for increased taxation). The recently adopted policy of sterilizing gold imports is likely to hinder a normal deflation in our fantastic gold reserves, and a board of public investment is about the last thing that Wall Street would tolerate in its present mood.

But the fundamental difference between Mr. Keynes's economics and those of Wall Street lies far deeper. Wall Street assumes that any policy which increases profits and benefits the wealthier elements in the population is automatically beneficial to the country as a whole. Keynes believes that the primary weakness in the capitalist system is to be found in the failure of the wealthier groups to spend their incomes on consumption goods and in their tendency to "overinvest" savings in needless productive enterprises. Thus an increase in prosperity which, like the upturn of the past year, chiefly affects the property-holding classes, lays the basis for the next slump.

A word of warning is necessary to those who would apply Mr. Keynes's theories directly to this country. In contrast to the situation in Great Britain, American consumers' incomes have been maintained in recent years primarily by governmental expenditures. And despite a certain amount of new capital construction, it is probable that buying power would immediately bog down if public works and other government expenditures were severely curtailed. Doubtless Mr. Keynes would be the first to recognize this, for he advocated vigorous governmental enterprise in the depressed areas of England, where a volume of unemployment comparable to that of the United States still exists. It also must be remembered that American taxation is but a fraction of British taxation of moderately high incomes, and that America's provision for maintaining mass purchasing power through social insurance is far less extensive than the British program. When the London Times repeats somewhat approvingly Mr. Keynes's fundamental plea for "a gradual reconstruction of our social system, with the object of providing everyone with the means of maintaining a decent level of consumption," it is asking for something far more comprehensive than our New Deal. Can anyone imagine the New York Times in a similar role?

A Program for Labor

WE HAVE presented in these pages in the past few weeks recommendations to Congress and to the Administration for promoting the public welfare in such a way as to consolidate the forms and the reality of democracy, carry out its avowed and socially necessary aims, and at the same time insure efficient operation of the vast mechanism of government in a country three thousand miles square. It is a relatively simple matter to project specific legislative programs for social security, for relief, even for reorganization of the administrative mechanism. In the field of labor relations, however, we come up against the whole problem of economic and political power whose shifts determine, and are never determined by, laws. As a consequence recommendations can only be relative.

It is a truism that the forms of government reflect the organization of economic power. The Supreme Court and its accretions of power during 150 years are firmly grounded in private ownership and capitalist property claims; the National Labor Relations Board is no less a reflection of labor's power; and the disparateness of their strength and prestige is a not inaccurate gauge of the relative political strength of big business and labor, of ownership and, essentially, non-ownership. At the moment, the dominant characteristic of the political landscape is the fact that non-owning labor, by organizing its mass, is beginning to challenge owning big business. Labor, as Mr. Lewis says, is on the march. Concurrently the Administration, for a variety of motives ranging from the desire to spread purchasing power to a sentimental and hence not reliable attachment to the democratic ideal—not to mention the practical necessity of catching votes from an increasingly class-conscious electorate—is encouraging the march of labor at least to the extent of putting no obstacles in its way. The two developments are of course related, and both owe their present importance to the business cycle which has recently completed one of its most vicious circles. In a word the forces represented by the National Labor Relations Board are challenging those represented by the Supreme Court. (No wonder the Supreme Court instinctively reaches for a constitutional club with which to destroy the NLRB.) And the Administration for the moment is egging on the aggressor. Or rather it seems to be egging labor on. In reality, its encouragement has consisted in supporting such laws as the Wagner Labor Relations Act and allowing the National Labor Relations Board to function freely even if it means that some of our best corporations are shown to be in league with labor-spy agencies. The Administration has not yet taken steps to insure the enforcement of the laws it has allowed to pass, and most of them have broken against the high stone wall of Supreme Court opposition. This will continue to be so until labor has organized its economic power so well that its political battering ram can level that wall.

In a period of shifting power, with industry intrenched but on the defensive and labor potentially strong but not yet organized, what may we expect in the way of legislative proposals, what are we likely to get in the way of laws, and what should labor seek to obtain?

We have already had a wide sampling of proposals from the right. They include facsimiles of the British trades-disputes act and a law against sitdowns. The most disingenuous is the suggestion that labor unions be incorporated—which by making them suable would hand them over, securely trussed up, to a system of courts expensively dedicated to defending the rights of property. It is unlikely that the present Congress will take any of these proposals seriously. It will almost certainly pass the bills that emerge from the discussions now going on in Administration quarters. The burden of these discussions is the revival of the basic principles of the NIRA in a form which will not be declared unconstitutional. Labor will of course support the general trend toward the establishment of minima of wages and hours and the drive for reemployment. It would be fruitless to review the various proposals in their present indecisive stage, but the labor lobby would do well to support the plan offering the least scope for the direct or indirect regulation of its activities. It should also realize, taking the longer view, that legislation modeled on the NIRA will tend to increase monopoly. This being so, labor must take up the cudgels for the consumer, who is ultimately only a wage-earner in reverse. The best way to judge the merits of any bill on the first count—that of regulation—is to consider what uses it might be put to by a reactionary Administration. As for the dangers of monopoly, the only effective protection, in the long run, will prove to be the socialization of basic industries.

The only legislation on the horizon relating directly to labor is the pending bill to give the Secretary of Labor power to subpoena parties to a controversy such as the present deadlock between General Motors and the United Automobile Workers. William Green is against it; John L. Lewis presumably favors it. In a way it illustrates the dilemma of labor and legislation. A weak, unaggressive labor movement (the A. F. of L. and Mr. Green) would either have no use for such a law or would have reason to fear it might be used to labor's disadvantage. A potentially strong, aggressive labor movement (the C. I. O. and Mr. Lewis) might find it a useful weapon in bringing to terms an employer (Mr. Sloan) whose plants are already shut down. Paul Ward points out that the bill has little chance of being passed because Congressmen feel that to support it would be to vindicate the sitdown.

The moral is clear—and we have drawn it often before. Labor's first job is to get ahead with organization. It should use the existing laws to the full as, for instance, it has used the Wagner Act and the NLRB to foster a favorable climate for collective bargaining. It should pay close attention to legislation in general, for in a period of shifting power every law is a labor law. It should advocate new laws warily, keeping always in mind the fact that where political minorities are concerned even good laws do not achieve gains but only signify that gains have been made.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Vladimir Romm

Washington, January 31

THE General Motors strike has vied with the bewildering Moscow trials for the center of the conversational stage here these last few days; so that a number of other vital developments—such as the President's TVA stand and the further disclosures of the La Follette and the Wheeler committees—could not get the space they deserved. No matter how bewildering and contradictory the Moscow trials were, they would not have captured the attention of the body of office-holders and journalists who are the nation's capital had they not involved in Vladimir Romm a man who until last November was Washington correspondent for Izvestia. Romm had fascinated a great number of the local journalists and civil servants. He was the only dyed-in-the-wool revolutionary that most of them had ever seen at close range. Whereas Troyanovsky and his staff held themselves aloof except for the precise social contacts of embassy receptions and musicales, Romm had circulated freely. The men found him likable and the gals found him charming. He had an Oriental suavity, courtly manners, a lean figure, curly black hair, and handsome, if slightly protuberant, brown eyes. I knew him, I am inclined to think, better than most and lunched with him many times. He had been a student and had entered the army at the time of the revolution. His wife had been a school teacher and was, it always seemed to me, a stauncher revolutionist than her husband. He was a more intellectual and therefore more troubled being.

I should like to do something to help Romm out of his present peril. So would many other members of the Washington press corps. A group of them recently interviewed Troyanovsky, leaving behind a note of intercession that somewhat naively suggested Romm could not have been a conspirator because he never let any of his friends here in on any of the alleged plotting. That move was made before the trial court let Radek and two others escape the firing squad. On the day the sentences were announced, the correspondents' unit of the Washington Newspaper Guild, at a meeting which only fifteen of its nearly seventy members saw fit to attend, adopted a resolution expressing "solicitude for the welfare of Romm in the court proceedings at Moscow" and sent the resolution to the State Department. The vote, taken after heated discussion, was nine to five. One or two members of the opposition were Stalinists. The rest fought the resolution on the ground that the Guild was a trade union and should confine its attention to trade-union matters. This type of opposition had caused a full meeting of the Washington Newspaper Guild held a few days earlier to refer the Romm case to the correspondents' unit, which has no members from the chains, press associations, or local papers.

While I knew Romm well and received from him a farewell letter written aboard ship as he returned to Russia, I can contribute little bearing upon his innocence or guilt. I know that he was unhappy here. I know, too, that his wife was eager to return to Russia and that he was not. His feelings on the matter were obscure; he frequently was vague in his speech. He was particularly vague about his recall, conveying at times the idea that he was being sent to London and at other times that he was being recalled to Moscow. He seemed moody and tense, and I was morally certain he was returning under a cloud. But it never occurred to me—perhaps because the embassy gave him a jolly farewell party—that he was in trouble politically. I thought that his work, perhaps, had been unsatisfactory. He frequently consulted me about events in the United States but, with one exception, I could never get him to go out with me and see those events taking place. The exception was the time I got him to attend a United Mine Workers' convention. He was inclined to shun active contact with news events and to prefer to read about them in the seclusion of his apartment. He was preoccupied most of the time with the Far Eastern situation, perhaps merely because he had represented Izvestia at Tokyo. If he was either a Stalinist or Trotskyist zealot, he concealed it well. I never heard him say anything even remotely critical of the present Russian regime, and his intellect was such that it is as hard to associate him with the fantastic plot Vishinsky laid bare as it is to associate Radek with it.

The most startling development of the last few days has been the sudden restoration to Frances Perkins of the spirit that flared all too briefly in her in that early New Deal day when she spoke her piece at the NRA steel-code hearing. A rapid search of the records fails to reveal that any of her predecessors as Secretary of Labor ever spoke out so bravely and to such good effect as she did this past week after General Motors' Sloan defied her summons to a peace conference here with John Lewis. When she voiced her belief that Sloan's refusal "must make it clear to the American people why the workers have lost confidence in the General Motors Corporation," she was talking as a Secretary of Labor should talk. And she has continued talking in this vein, for she is fighting to recover her lost prestige and has at last been made to realize that labor expects the head of the Labor Department to be its champion and not merely a referee with a social-work complex. Unfortunately, she is trying so hard that she seems to be cracking under the strain.

She was nearly in hysterics when she had to announce Friday night that Sloan had "run out" on her a second time, and now she has had to let the peace negotiations be switched back again to Governor Murphy and chalk up a failure for herself. As this is written, her White House boss still is afraid to take a hand openly in the General Motors strike beyond publicly rebuking Sloan for his recalcitrance. Precisely what happened here Friday—whether Sloan did agree to a peace conference and then recant—is a matter of dispute between him and Miss Perkins. The weight of the evidence, however, favors the Secretary. The evidence also indicates that it was not Mr. Sloan who made the final decision for General Motors.

Miss Perkins's proposal of legislation giving her department power to subpoena records and witnesses and prosecute fact-finding inquiries into the causes of major labor disputes seems to have little chance of becoming law. Efforts to line up Congressional support for it revealed only that a large block of Congressmen were averse to taking any action that might be construed as supporting the General Motors strike and defending the sitdown technique. Labor Department lobbyists found Southern Congressmen particularly opposed to the suggestion; they fear adoption of the sitdown by share-croppers. For that matter, the proposal has none too vigorous support from labor, for it obviously can be twisted to labor's detriment. But a labor movement committed to reliance on the federal government can ill afford to balk at this point. Furthermore, the dangers involved for labor are more theoretical than real. Such disclosures as labor has to fear can always be laid bare by employers without the aid of new legislation; they have only to turn to the courts and the injunctive process. Publication of Miss Perkins's proposal was followed immediately by efforts to depict it as a proposition without Presidential sanction. The A. F. of L. was the only sucker caught by this bait. Bill Green issued a statement attacking the Secretary's plan. He got it off the mimeograph and into distribution just as the White House put its official imprimatur on Miss Perkins's proposal.

At the same time that Roosevelt rebuked Sloan and designated Miss Perkins as his personal representative in the General Motors peace negotiations, he called strike three on Dr. Arthur E. Morgan and the "power pool" plan by which the utilities hoped to end the TVA. The President's new Power Policy Committee is virtually the same in personnel as the old National Power Policy Committee that gave us the Wheeler-Rayburn public-utility holding-company bill. All that has happened is that General Markham, T. W. Norcross, and David E. Lilienthal have been dropped, and Frederic A. Delano has been added to say yes at proper intervals. Benjamin V. Cohen remains the committee's general counsel, and Joel D. Wolfsohn continues as its executive secretary. There is no need to fear that these boys will hoist a white flag with the fight against the power trust at last swinging in their favor.

A Challenge to Pacifists

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

THE Spanish crisis, by crystallizing the struggle in Europe between fascism and communism, has raised the question whether the democracies should passively view this struggle from the sidelines or meet the challenge of aggressive dictatorships even at the risk of war. This question has been complicated by the fact that the Western democratic governments regard both fascism and communism with suspicion and avoid a clear-cut alignment with the Soviet Union against fascist powers.

At this stage of their history the peoples of France, Britain, and the United States—the so-called "satiated" countries—have little love for militarism, are reluctant to become involved in any incident which might provoke war, and are eager to substitute pacific methods for the arbitrament of force. But they are profoundly divided and confused in their ideas of how a peaceful world should be achieved. Many pacifists, while abhorring the violent and arbitrary character of dictatorships, would rely on persuasion, generous treatment, and the satisfaction of just grievances to wean dictators from the use of force. They apparently assume that peoples living under dictatorial rule not only share their desire for peace but are free to advocate a pacific policy—an assumption disproved by the treatment which men like Ossietzky have received in Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. Some pacifists who condemn the use of force in international affairs attack the French and British governments for failing to supply Spanish loyalists with arms, the very production of which they had previously opposed; or they advocate economic sanctions against an aggressor without facing the risk of war that sanctions imply. Others, believing that the peace settlement of 1919 sowed the seeds of existing unrest in Europe, demand revision of the treaties as the first step toward organization of collective security; and contend that the democratic governments, whose past records bear the stains of imperialist aggression, should not cast the first stone at armed dictatorships. Nor are pacifists united in their political views. Some believe that peace cannot be secured until the whole world is ruled by socialism or communism; other revolt at the idea of cooperating with communism against fascism, and seek perilous refuge in strict isolation. In this maelstrom of contradictory ideas it is essential for those concerned with the preservation of peace to ask themselves a few searching questions, and to determine what policies may serve to prevent war.

It must be recognized at the outset that, so far as political technique is concerned, the government of Stalin is no less a dictatorship than that of Hitler or Mussolini, and that the new Soviet constitution, significant as it is for its bill of social and economic rights, fails to transform the Soviet Union into a democracy in the Western sense. But two important distinctions—rooted in the history and geography rather than the political theories of Russia, Germany, and Italy—should be drawn between fascist and Communist regimes. The Soviet government, through its efforts to raise the economic and social level of a backward people which had known only the rule of a reactionary autocracy, constitutes an important step forward in Russia, while the dictatorships of Germany and Italy represent a setback for the forces of liberalism in countries once considered standard bearers of Western civilization. Moreover, Hitler and Mussolini, claiming that they need land and natural resources for their expanding populations, openly threaten European peace, while the Soviet Union, which has no such needs, has displayed an unmistakable desire to avoid war.

Can the democracies prevent war by adopting a passive attitude toward the encroachments of fascist dictatorships? Spain's experience proves that a policy of non-intervention, unless strictly enforced, plays into the hands of potential war-makers. The pacific nations in their desire to avoid war observe the restrictions, while the dictatorships disregard them. France and Britain have sought to justify this policy on the ground that the non-intervention agreement, with all its loopholes, has so far prevented the war from spreading beyond the confines of Spain. They assume that without such an agreement Germany and Italy would have openly supplied the rebels with war material and forcibly tried to block Soviet or other aid to the loyalists, thus creating immediate danger of a European conflict. This assumption, based on a number of imponderables, is as difficult to prove or disprove as the British government's conviction in 1935 that oil sanctions against Italy would involve Europe in war. It may be asked, however, whether the democratic governments, by taking it for granted that resistance to dictatorships must inevitably cause war, are not simply rationalizing their reluctance to face the prospect of another war.

Would the democracies, by resisting the demands of dictatorships, precipitate another world war? The danger of war is always present in a world armed to the teeth, where not only bodies but minds are daily schooled in military drill. There is no reason, however, to believe that war will follow more readily if the democracies take a determined stand against unprovoked aggression than if they pay any price the dictators may demand for the maintenance of peace. Continued truckling to the threats of potential aggressors may temporarily avert conflict, but it fails to remedy the international maladjustments which eventually produce war.

Would the dictators carry out their threats of aggression if warned in advance that they would meet with resistance on the part of democracies? By skilful propaganda the dictatorships have sought to convince the world that, unless their demands are met, they will use force. Much of the bellicose atmosphere created by fascist spellbinders is sheer bluff, which succeeds only because the democracies are paralyzed by fear of war. General de Bono in his book on the Ethiopian campaign reveals that, had Britain shown signs of resistance as late as 1935, Italy might have renounced the offensive preparations it had begun three years before. The real danger is that the democracies, ultimately goaded into resistance, will fail—as did Britain in 1914—to make their attitude known until the eleventh hour, thus encouraging the dictators to take up positions from which they cannot retreat.

What will the dictators do if they encounter no resistance? Obviously they will not squander men and money on war if they can achieve their ends without it. Europe can have peace indefinitely, provided it bows to the will of the dictatorships.

Can peace be negotiated with dictatorships? No informed person denies the injustices of the Versailles treaty or the legitimacy of German demands for revision of its territorial clauses. If it were merely a question of reexamining the status of the Polish Corridor, Danzig, and Eupen and Malmédy, and of giving Germany a share in the administration of African mandates, this question, difficult in itself, would not defy solution by international negotiations. Nazi Germany, however, lays claim to territories which were not torn from the Reich at Versailles: it would absorb Austria, detach the Sudeten region from Czecho-Slovakia, dominate the Balkans, and unite all Europe under Hitler's leadership in a crusade against communism, with the ultimate objective of securing the Ukraine and possibly the Urals for German agriculture and industry. Do Germany's legitimate grievances against the former Allies, or the fact that these grievances fostered the growth of National Socialism, justify a scheme of expansion that aims at German hegemony in Europe? For the democracies to acquiesce in this scheme would be to purchase a short-lived respite by abandoning all countries east of the Rhine to Hitler.

If negotiations with Hitler and Mussolini offer little hope of any but a dictated peace, what is the alternative? Should the democracies jointly resist the expansion of dictatorships, even if their resistance may ultimately involve the use of force? Democracy achieved its hold on Western Europe by fearlessly combating feudalism, monarchy, and hereditary privilege. Today, as a result of their long tradition of compromise, free speech, and respect for the rights of the individual, democratic governments use the threat of force only in exceptional circumstances. They tend to rely on diplomatic negotiation and the exchange of concessions. But they are beginning to learn that in dealing with fascist dictators these tactics meet with undisguised contempt. If the democracies seriously intend to oppose the avowed aggressive aims of the dictators, they must be prepared to meet force with force. Those who deplore the encroachments of fascist dictatorship and demand sanctions against aggressors, yet condemn armaments, reveal a dangerous confusion of thought.

It may be argued that the use of force—which might have been justified if collectively applied by the League of Nations—is not admissible today, when all states are arming and the League shows signs of disintegration. Might not armed democracies, in cooperation with the Soviet Union, merely organize a new Holy Alliance designed to suppress the dictatorships and freeze the status quo, thus recreating the conflicts of the pre-1914 period? This danger exists. But the alternative—the unopposed expansion of German and Italian rule—is even less to be tolerated. The only course open to realistic pacifists is to support strong resistance to aggressive dictatorships while urging an honest attempt to remedy their legitimate grievances. Pacifists and radicals who prefer the continuance of democratic methods of government to the ruthless techniques of fascism must be prepared to defend their choice. Democracy must not be left unarmed.

Boettiger—His Master's Voice

BY ELLEN McGRATH AND J. P. DALLAS

Seattle, January 26

THE spectacle of William Randolph Hearst in sheep's clothing does not deceive organized labor in the Northwest. Here labor is wise in the ways of employers who have lost a strike. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer, closed for three and a half months by a strike of the American Newspaper Guild, was reopened in true Hearstian style. Public meetings were called by the Chamber of Commerce. Fireworks were set off in the streets at night. And John Boettiger, President Roosevelt's son-in-law, was hired to manage the paper.

Assurances were given to the public that Mr. Boettiger would have a "free hand to run things as he saw fit." Organized labor was told that chiseling on contracts and other unfair practices of the past would be stopped. These practices and the incipient fascist attitude of the paper had driven labor into a unanimity of action never before witnessed in this part of the country.

The craft unions of the printing trades had contracts of many years' standing with the Hearst management. Yet when the newly organized guildsmen struck, the printers, the pressmen, and other organized crafts closed the plant and kept it closed for the duration of the strike. This was done in spite of the opposition of their principal international officials, who outlawed the strike and refused to grant strike benefits. A plan for a settlement sponsored by William Green, after a conference with Hearst representatives, was promptly turned down by the striking unions and the Seattle Central Labor Council. Only when Hearst came through with an offer embodying practically all the Guild's demands was a settlement arranged.

This, then, was the scene upon which Mr. Boettiger appeared as Hearst's peace offering to the people of Seattle. There were some who regarded the hiring of the President's son-in-law as sure proof that Hearst and the Post-Intelligencer had turned over a new leaf. Others, more critical, pointed out that Hearst had used this same kind of tactics before on his Chicago paper—that W. V. Tanner, former publisher of the P.-I., was still retained as an official, and that perhaps Mr. Boettiger was merely to be window dressing. The majority, however, viewed the whole matter with a healthy skepticism.

Skepticism is fast disappearing. The first conference between Boettiger and union officials resulted in a disagreement. When invited to meet jointly the executive boards of all the unions involved, he at first declined. He preferred to meet each union separately. But the Maritime Federation of the Pacific has taught the value of solidarity to all Northwestern labor, and the lessons of the picket line have not been forgotten either. Mr. Boettiger met the unions jointly.

Mr. Boettiger has an engaging personality. He turned the full force of it on the new union with a plea not to raise labor issues at present but to give him time to get his feet on the ground. Yet at this very time a company union was being formed, and it has continued to exist with his knowledge. A majority of Seattle labor is fast coming to believe that his feet are not only on the ground but stuck in the mud. Dave Beck, one of Seattle's most powerful labor leaders, recently had a conference with Boettiger on the company-union issue. Exactly what Beck said is not known, but reports agree that he told the young publisher that company unions were not wanted here.

The real issue facing the Guild in Seattle as the result of the successful Post-Intelligencer strike is the company union. To persons not familiar with the situation this may seem a paradox. A victorious union with a company union still to deal with—how can that be? The answer is that at the time the settlement was made there was no company union. It has been organized and grown to be a menace since Boettiger became manager of the paper. When the Guild members went back, they got recognition but not a closed shop. A wage raise and improved working conditions were granted. The Guild expected to organize the unorganized members of the staff with ease.

Backed by Hearst's organization and millions a company union is a serious matter to any labor organization; for inexperienced white-collar workers it is particularly serious. It is a standard policy of Hearst's to pay well a few key men in the organization and to underpay the rest. He counts on the privileged few to stem the rising tide of organization. Throughout the strike certain "loyal employees" were paid their salaries. These men now head the company union. When the local Guild chapter was being formed, they remained aloof. With brand-new fat contracts in their pockets, they are the spearhead of Hearst's strategic move to prevent unionization of his white-collar employees. "Wouldn't I be a sucker to join the Guild when I can get a week off any time for any writing I choose," said Doug Welch at the hearing of the Labor Relations Board.

The Roosevelt family connection with Hearst's Post-Intelligencer does not stop with a mere son-in-law. Anna Roosevelt Boettiger, the President's daughter, has become associate editor in charge of the women's department. Her actions in this post have strengthened the suspicion that the Boettigers were bought by Hearst to cover the licking he took in the strike and the Presidential election, and to give a liberal front to his reactionary policies. Among the chief supporters and advertisers of the paper had been the members of the women's Republican groups—Pro-America, Women of Washington, and other similar organizations. Anna Roosevelt Boettiger's job was to win back the support of these women for the paper after the post-election headache. One of her first acts was to organize the Homemakers' Club for Post-Intelligencer readers. Women who a short time ago were extolling the democracy of Mr. Landon over the sovietism of Mr. Roosevelt are now hobnobbing with the President's daughter down at the Homemakers' Club, where they ponder various ways of using a biscuit mix made by one of the paper's biggest advertisers.

Word that President Roosevelt's wife had applied for membership in the American Newspaper Guild came over the teletype, but it was not given space in her son-in-law's newspaper. When Mrs. Boettiger was invited to join the Guild, she said she knew nothing about it, and as the wife of the publisher was unwilling to take any action that might be contrary to the policy of the paper.

As one Guild member put it, "Hearst, the old leopard, still has his spots." Chiseling started the day the strike ended. Richard Seller, president of the Guild, was shunted to the night beat at the police station. By-lines of active guildsmen were conspicuous by their absence from the paper. Not until pressure was applied by the Guild and associated unions was Mr. Seller restored to general assignment and by-lines to active guildsmen.

These incidents, while minor in themselves, did not strengthen confidence in John Boettiger. In fact, they tended to prepare members of the Guild for his response to the Labor Board's decision. The strike was called originally when the Hearst management fired Frank (Slim) Lynch, fifteen years a staff photographer, and Everhardt Armstrong, seventeen years a dramatic critic on the paper, both active members of the Guild. During the strike their cases were placed before the National Labor Relations Board. The strike settlement provided that "all striking employees shall return to work without discrimination or prejudice" and that the cases of the two staff members whose discharge precipitated the walk-out "will continue in the hands of the National Labor Relations Board." Labor accepted the settlement in the belief that Hearst would abide by the then pending decision of the board.

On January 15 the National Labor Relations Board published its decision against Hearst and for the two discharged employees. It ordered Hearst and the management of the Post-Intelligencer to reinstate Lynch and Armstrong. On January 16 over Boettiger's signature the paper repudiated its obligation to comply with the order and announced that it was going to fight the decision and appeal to the federal courts. This will mean interminable delay. It will mean an ultimate appeal to the Supreme Court, with the risk that the whole Labor Relations Act may be invalidated. Northwest labor is unwilling to have the issues languish in a long-drawn-out court fight. The Guild, backed by the Seattle Central Labor Council, is considering further action.

The Supreme Court and Civil Liberties

BY ISIDOR FEINSTEIN

THIS year we celebrate the 150th anniversary of the signing of the Constitution. The Bill of Rights will figure in after-dinner speeches, and newspapers will repeat the noble phrases that have come from the Supreme Court in defense of civil liberties. Few will mention that these phrases come almost entirely from dissenting opinions and that the Bill of Rights—under the expert manipulation of the federal courts—has never been what it was thought to be. The Constitution is 150 years old, but the decision in De Jonge vs. Oregon handed down on January 4 happens to be the first in all that time in which the constitutional guaranty of free speech, press, and assembly was applied by the Supreme Court in a case involving a radical. That the court has always—or almost always—been ready to defend the liberties of conservatives will remain of merely academic importance until police begin beating up members of the Union League for criticizing the government. A decision setting aside the conviction of a Communist, De Jonge, under the Oregon criminal-syndicalism law is genuinely a victory for civil liberties.

Even this victory may be overestimated. De Jonge was arrested at a meeting called by the Communist Party in Portland, Oregon, to protest against the illegal raids made by the police in their effort to break the longshoremen's strike in 1934. He was sentenced to seven years in jail for "criminal syndicalism." Despite the capacity of the judicial mind to befog the simplest issue when fog is advantageous, De Jonge's conviction could hardly be regarded as other than a clever invasion of fundamental liberties. It is indicative of how far we have drifted that we are so pleasantly surprised when the court begins to recognize the obvious.

I say "begins" to recognize. A law that provides the police with any excuse for breaking up meetings of this kind—and the history of criminal-syndicalism cases since the war shows that this was no exceptional occurrence—is a menace to freedom. It is comparable to a law which would enable the police to make a practice of confiscating automobiles on the excuse that they were trying to prevent fatal accidents. Would the court order a seized automobile returned but leave standing the law which permitted its confiscation? The court does not exercise forbearance in dealing with property rights. In the Schechter case, though it was only called upon to decide the constitutionality of federal supervision as applied to the purely intrastate poultry business, the effect of its decision was to void the NRA in its entirety and to lay down principles which would seem to bar federal wage, hour, and trade-practice regulation in any business. The court is more circumspect where fundamental liberties are concerned. It did not hold the Oregon statute unconstitutional. It merely set aside this particular application of it. "We hold," the court said, "that the Oregon statute as applied to the particular charge as defined by the state court is repugnant to the due-process clause. . . ." Would the court were as cautious in dealing with social legislation!

The De Jonge decision may even have drawbacks. Liberal decisions have often been won in the past at the expense of establishing restrictive principles which bear evil fruit in later cases. The Supreme Court in this case decided only that no man could be found guilty of criminal syndicalism merely for participating in a meeting held under Communist auspices. The court goes on to tell what offenses De Jonge might have been convicted of: ". . . while the defendant was a member of the Communist Party, he was not indicted for participating in its organization, or for joining it, or for soliciting members, or for distributing its literature." De Jonge's case was "remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion." Do these words mean that if De Jonge were now to be indicted and convicted of joining the Communist Party, or recruiting members for it, or distributing its literature, the court would be ready to uphold the conviction? Some price must have been paid for the acquiescence of Sutherland, McReynolds, Butler, and Van Devanter in this opinion. Has the court laid the basis for greater restrictions than ever on civil liberties under our state criminal-syndicalism and anarchy laws?

Nor is it pleasant to find what seems to be an implied acceptance of the idea of surveillance over the exercise of the rights of speech and assembly. In dealing with property rights the court has held that freedom is the rule and restraint is the exception. In the matter of fundamental liberties it has been held—though the principle has been more honored in the breach—that only an overt act or clear and imminent danger justifies limitations on the exercise of free speech, press, or assembly. The court in one part of this decision speaks a new language. "The broad reach of the statute as thus applied," the court says, "is plain. While defendant was a member of the Communist Party, that membership was not necessary to conviction on such a charge. A like fate might have attended any speaker, although not a member, who 'assisted in the conduct' of the meeting. However innocuous the object of the meeting, however lawful the subjects and tenor of the addresses, however reasonable and timely the discussion, all those assisting in the conduct of the meeting would be subject to imprisonment as felons if the meeting were held by the Communist Party." And if all those who participated were adjudged Communists and if the object were not "innocuous" and the discussion were not in the court's opinion "timely" or "reasonable" and the "tenor" of the addresses were to be considered unlawful, what then?

Past experience underscores the necessity for vigilance. The Bill of Rights is prominent in the official portrait of the court, but plays an inglorious role in its actual history. The federal courts were enthusiastic in their enforcement of the Sedition Act under Adams. The Supreme Court was ineffective in its one puny gesture of protest against Lincoln's suspension of habeas corpus, and with it of all basic rights, during the Civil War. The court helped to forge new instruments of repression in its interpretation of the immigration laws. It was ready to find excuse in far-fetched analogies for the use and abuse of the Espionage Act during the World War. It has consistently upheld criminal-syndicalism laws, product of the post-war red scares. The De Jonge case and its predecessors disclose the wide gap between myth and fact even in a civilized community. Our legal soothsayers have succeeded in portraying as a tribune of the people a governmental organ whose most consistent and conspicuous function has been the adaptation of our basic law to the needs of corporate enterprise. Not a few timid liberals still fear curtailment of the court's swollen powers lest it be unable to protect us from fascism. In their visions they see Justices Sutherland, Butler, McReynolds, Van Devanter, and Roberts manning legal barricades in defense of Messrs. Norman Thomas and Earl Browder. This is pure fancy.

Even Justice Holmes (in the war-time Schenck case) drew from the illegality of advocating murder and the wickedness of shouting "fire" in a crowded theater constitutional non sequiturs that place powerful instruments in the hands of those who may some day seek to regiment the American people. No construction has been too broad when property rights were before the court. It has been ready to enlarge on the Constitution and to invoke the divine order of things to legalize some of the greatest steals in our history, notably in the Yazoo frauds and the Crédit Mobilier scandal. But it looked the other way when the Chicago anarchists were hung, Debs was jailed, Mooney framed, and Sacco and Vanzetti sent to the chair. It will cut through all procedural difficulties and overturn well-established precedents to review both law and fact when a utility company appeals from a rate-cut order, but it falls back on extremes of legal punctilio when human lives and basic liberties are at stake, especially those of radicals, that is, of those who most need protection. Far from being a bulwark against fascism, the court may serve a double function in its rise. If the court continues to hamstring Congress and state legislatures, it will play directly into the hands of the fascist demagogue who sneers at the "inefficiency" of democratic processes. If fascism comes and the court should, by some miracle, seek to block it, Der Duce will not play Alphonse and Gaston with the court. On the other hand, a fascist regime will find material in past court decisions to provide itself with legal, nay, "constitutional," justification; even in two decisions handed down by liberal justices.

The Fifth Amendment guarantees due process and trial by jury, but in the Ju Toy case Justice Holmes held that this did not give the right of appeal from an administrative order barring a man from this country, even though a lower federal court had decided that the man was a citizen of the United States. The decision, providing as it does the basis for arbitrary administrative action, would be a blessing to the director of a concentration camp. Justice Brandeis's decision in the Dorchy case may yet—though he himself was innocent of any such intention—provide the basis for serious restrictions on the right to strike. And the criminal-syndicalism cases, notably the conviction of the Socialist editor, Gitlow, will make easier the process of finally suppressing free speech, press, and assembly. I have a sneaking suspicion that when der Tag comes, if it does, the "liberal" De Jonge decision will have its uses, too.

Germany's Economic Impasse

BY ALEXANDER VIDAKOVIC

Raw Materials and Food

IF GERMANY'S financial and industrial problems were merely internal, there is no saying how long the economic Bedlam in the Reich might continue. The people's ignorance of the real situation, the financial wizardry of Schacht, and the discipline of Nazi rule combine to prevent an explosion. The internal problems are complicated, however, by Germany's dependence on foreign raw materials and food. It is this that forces the Reich to maintain a system of economic life and interchange which, if not exactly normal, cannot deviate from the normal beyond a certain point.

Germany's ability to obtain goods from abroad is restricted by two facts. One is that in buying foreign raw materials and food it cannot, as in its internal economics, rely on the sale of property, because it has no property which is convertible into means of payment acceptable to foreign sellers. Its colonies have gone. Its pre-war investments abroad, estimated at about 25,000 million gold marks, have been lost, confiscated, or sold. The few crumbs of private foreign holdings which may be picked up through the threat of the death penalty can hardly make any difference. The 28,000 million marks borrowed from abroad during the early post-war period have all gone for reparation payments, for internal reorganization, or to offset the unfavorable trade balance of those years. All that Germany has inherited from the past is 7,000 million frozen marks from its creditors and a reluctance on the part of foreign investors to freeze more cash into the German economic structure. Therefore all Germany's purchases must be made from current resources.

The second restriction is the fact that the country's resources are strictly limited. Not only did the Nazi regime come into power at a time when foreign trade, after the 1931 financial débâcle, was at its lowest, but the Nazi philosophy, with its gospel of self-sufficiency, has rendered the situation even worse. By deliberately cutting imports in order to obtain a favorable trade balance which might be used for armaments, Germany also cut down its export capacity, and no subsequent efforts to increase exports have met with any success. During the four years of Nazi rule German exports have remained practically stationary—4,871 million marks in 1933, 4,167 million in 1934, 4,270 million in 1935, and 3,853 million during eleven months of 1936. Such surplus as is created, moreover, is largely earmarked for repayments under the standstill agreement, since most of German trade is now carried on through clearing accounts. And the standstill debt, although it was reduced by 500 million marks in 1934 and by 350 million in 1935, is still 1,750 million marks. Even these meager results—meager because they represent no more than 30 or 40 per cent of the export volume of pre-Nazi days—were obtained at great sacrifice. Export subsidies are estimated to have cost Germany about 1,000 million marks in the last four years.

Instead of pursuing the policy of an active trade balance against the gold-owning countries of the West, Germany pursues a policy of a passive trade balance against the raw-material and food-producing countries of the East. Huge debts have been run up on clearing accounts with the object of forcing those countries to receive in exchange any kind of German goods, wanted or unwanted. Even this ingenious arrangement, however, seems to be doomed to failure: first, because many of those states, having found that Germany was buying goods from them on credit which it was reselling for solid cash, are now endeavoring to reach the cash-paying countries directly; secondly, because Germany tried to exploit trade connections for political influence; and, thirdly, because much of the merchandise foisted on these states was poor in quality as a result of the use of substitutes and the deterioration of the German industrial plant.

In short, with the diminution of its gold reserve under the Nazi regime from over 400 to 66 million gold marks, the cessation of industrial deliveries to Russia, and the decline of its competitive strength in the agricultural countries of Eastern Europe, Germany has little prospect of an export trade which will bring in the solid cash required for foreign purchases. The only means left of increasing the quantity of imported raw materials, therefore, is to cut down food imports. This the government has done ruthlessly. Wheat imports, which in 1927 were 2,530,000 tons, were cut in 1935 to 145,000 tons, and during eleven months of 1936 to 23,000 tons. Maize imports for the same periods were cut from 2,105,000 tons to 282,000 and 166,000 tons respectively; barley was cut from 1,996,000 tons to 158,000 and then to 47,000.

Such a reduction of food imports might be justified if Germany in the meantime had succeeded in increasing its food production. But this it has not done. To take the two most important cereals, the production of wheat in the present Reich area has increased from the 1913 figure of 4,000,000 tons to an average of 4,700,000 tons for the 1934 to 1936 period, while the production of rye has actually declined from 10,000,000 tons to an average of 7,500,000. In the current winter the country faces a production of bread cereals of 12,420,000 tons, which is admitted to be insufficient, and a poor estimate for the winter rye. In live stock there has been some increase, although not of a spectacular kind. During the period 1927 to 1936 horned cattle increased from 17,200,000 to 18,900,000, and pigs from 19,400,000 to 22,800,000. With domestic food production more or less stationary and food imports from abroad drastically reduced—as against an increase in population—the German nation must consume less per capita now than it did in pre-Nazi days. The reduction, indeed, appears to have been about 15 per cent in 1935 and to have approached 20 per cent in 1936.

The slogan, cannons instead of butter, has thus become a reality. The German nation under Nazi rule is paying with privation for the future honor of becoming cannon fodder. Even this might be bearable if the reduced standard of living were borne equally by the whole nation, and if the reduced expenditures for food were releasing more cash for other articles of consumption. This, however, is not the case. In order to make up somehow for increased production costs, workers' wages have been kept down severely; they have even been reduced 3.2 per cent since 1932. The average weekly wage in the steel-and-iron industry, which employs 151,000 men and pays comparatively high wages, is 44.25 marks before "voluntary" and other contributions have been deducted. That in the textile industry, which employs 197,000 workers, is as low as 23.12 marks. Most of the other industries range between these two. The average weekly wage in the chemical industry is 37.77 and in the paper industry 31.18 marks.

With wages stationary, the German worker has to contend not only against a general rise of prices in the last four years from an index of 93.3 to 104.3, but also against a surreptitious increase in retail food prices of anything from 10 to 25 per cent above the official price. It is no wonder therefore that the demand for consumption goods has not kept pace with that for production goods. During the last year, indeed, the production of consumption goods has dropped a further 2 per cent against an increase in production goods of 26 per cent. And since even this diminished amount of consumption goods includes 30,000 private cars and many luxury articles, we are forced to the conclusion that there is plenty of money in the hands of a small and select minority, while the workers have to meet the costs of armament with tightened belts.

From whatever angle we look at conditions in Germany they appear precarious. With most of the available capital frozen in government hands, with an incipient inflationary movement which can be counteracted only by contraction of credit, with an unreplaced wear and tear of plant which must lower its competitive power abroad, with an inability to increase purchases of raw materials beyond a certain point, and with a vanishing margin for the reduction of food consumption, Germany is piling up for the future a cumulative debt of threatening dimensions. Substitutes (Ersatz) can hardly extricate the nation from this predicament, as their production is too costly for a nation with lowered earnings and would require also a reorganization of finance and industry such as Germany is no longer capable of carrying out. Nor would devaluation help, as the mark is already devalued to all intents and purposes, and further devaluation would only increase the cost of raw materials. The Reich Institut für Konjunkturforschung definitely states that "a rise of only 1 per cent in the price of raw materials would mean an increase in expenditure in foreign exchange of about 3,000,000 marks per month for imports."

This does not mean, however, that the end is in sight. There are still numerous means of prolonging present conditions. A reduction of interest would lessen state obligations. Confiscations and the sale of assets can continue for some time. Maintenance of the wage level may still delay a rise in costs even though it cannot prevent the growing gap between the internal and the foreign price level. Finally the Nazis do not hesitate to use force to back up argument or bolster waning enthusiasm.

But such delays do not imply a solution. There are only two possible solutions. One is that Germany receive back its colonies or be given easy access to raw materials. This, of course, could be contemplated only under a stipulation that the raw materials were not acquired simply as a means to further armament. The other would require a complete reversal of the present armaments policy and a return of finance, industry, and labor, through a series of painful adjustments, to normal productive activities. Such a reversal of policy would be tantamount to abandoning the tenets of the Nazi philosophy. If neither of these methods is tried, the result must be collapse or explosion.

[The first part of Mr. Vidakovic's article, How Hitler Pays His Arms Bill, was published last week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE most disappointing feature of the President's plan for a reorganization of the government is his failure to combine the army and navy under one head. I am well aware that there is a difference of opinion as to the desirability of this consolidation. Major General Johnson Hagood has come out against it on the ground that it has never been done in the United States, and that the army and navy cooperated efficiently during the Civil War and during the World War. He dislikes it also because it is a European idea. But surely it is significant that all the foreign governments are moving in this direction, the last being the French government under Prime Minister Blum. Certainly if any country has a difficult and dangerous defense problem it is France. The proposed reorganization, moreover, was not a product of scheming politicians but, if the press is correct, originated with the military themselves. Some American army men would take direct issue with General Hagood. They point out that whatever may have happened in war time, there is no coordination whatever in peace time and no joint planning for future eventualities. To the lay mind it is an extraordinary thing that the army has one air fleet and the navy has another, and that the Marine Corps and the Coast Guard also have their own fliers. I have heard an officer of high rank say that if war should come suddenly the army and navy air fleets might go off at tangents or perhaps even get in each other's way. Today they do not communicate with each other or even buy their planes cooperatively.

From the point of view of saving money it seems as if enormous economies could be made by coordinating the army and the navy. Both departments have to buy boots, clothing, food, motor cars, and many other articles of equipment. Is there any question that savings could be made by placing joint orders? General Hagood is terribly concerned about the waste of public funds by the army. In his new book, "We Can Defend America," he has an entire chapter entitled Pity the Poor Taxpayer, but the economy of combining the two departments does not interest him at all. It is true that the problems of army and navy are quite different, but the plan provides for separate under secretaries in charge of the army, the navy, and the united air corps. At least under this arrangement we should have an end to the present preposterous situation in Washington, with the War and Navy departments in sight of each other and yet utterly ignoring each other's existence. Perhaps if both were under the same head, there might be some decrease of the intense antagonism the two military services cherish for each other—an antagonism that does not come to the surface very often but is there none the less.

But the important thing is that there should be some planning for the future. At present national defense policies are not coordinated with the policies of the Chief Executive. For this the army and navy are not to blame; the responsibility rests with the White House. As a result, so far as the country is aware, no actual defense program has been laid down. President Roosevelt, like his predecessors, keeps saying that our army and navy are for defense only, but both arms buy offensive weapons meant for overseas use and do not limit themselves to purely defensive measures. What does defense mean? Nobody knows. Does defense mean an attack on Japan's coast, or does it mean defending the line from the Aleutian Islands to Hawaii and thence to Panama? On the Atlantic Coast does it mean defending our shipping lanes between the United States and South America, or does it mean only actual defense of our harbors and shores? The army, if all reports are true, is still thinking of war in terms of 1917 and is again planning to land some say two million, some say three million, men in Europe. General Hagood says that our coast defenses "are a pile of junk." He says that no progress of any kind has been made in improving our harbor defenses during the past twenty-five years. Yet we have spent billions and billions for defense. Why must this be? And would this continue if there were one head responsible for the whole situation?

Last year Congress authorized a number of new air stations. Was this in accord with a long-studied and carefully worked-out national program. Obviously not. Are we building coast-defense vessels? No, indeed; the two new battleships that are to be laid down are meant for long voyages and overseas fighting and are not coast-defense vessels. And so it goes. What the President ought to do is obtain authorization from Congress to set up a civilian board to study this defense problem and map a course which would make this country invulnerable so far as armaments can do it. I don't believe it can ever be done and I am personally opposed to armaments and to the waste of funds involved, but as that seems to be the policy of the country at the present time, let's at least do it efficiently. I was the first daily journalist in the United States to urge the formation of a general staff in the hope that that would make the army a little more efficient. General Hagood's book says that it is woefully inefficient and wasteful and that it will take years and years to make over the War Department into an effective instrument for the purposes for which it was created. Why not try putting all the defense under one head? If the General is right, we could not be much worse off even if consolidation should fail.

BROUN'S PAGE

Louis and Lewis

ONE of the products of the American genius for organization is the prize-fight game. Of course, industry would be a better word. Boxing flourishes in some other countries and we imported it from England, but no other nation has ever devised anything to match the ballyhoo which is put on here in preparation for an encounter. It seems to me that the newspapermen assigned to cover the sport are among the most talented of reporters. The average managing editor in handling his forces uses his brightest workers for baseball and for boxing. Floods and strikes are covered by the second stringers.

Any ambitious youth on a newspaper welcomes the assignment to the sports department. His pay is likely to be higher, and he will have more space and a greater amount of freedom from interference. Occasionally there may be such a thing as paper policy in regard to some promoter or club owner, but there are fewer sacred cows on the diamond or in the ring than graze along the meadows of the world outside.

The result is a somewhat lopsided sort of journalism. A year or so ago an instructor in a Middle Western college tested his class with, "Identify John L. Lewis, Joe Louis, and Sinclair Lewis." Somewhat unfortunately the Negro pronounces his name precisely as the labor leader does, and this was sufficient to cause a great deal of confusion among the students. At any rate, the net result was the discovery that only a small fraction of the class had ever heard of John L., while the recognition of Joe was practically 100 per cent.

To be sure, the president of the United Mine Workers of America has made giant strides in the last few months. His name has been pretty constantly on the front page, and a good many editorial writers seem to be under the permanent instruction, "Begin each day with a denunciation of Mr. Lewis." Nevertheless, I rather suspect that Joe still leads in popular recognition. And that is a pity, because Lewis is actually a far more interesting figure than Louis. Indeed, John L. can even challenge comparison with his rival in the latter's own line of endeavor. The punch which felled Hutcheson was a more important blow than any ever delivered by the "Brown Bomber." I think that Mr. Sloan's best friends ought to warn him that when John L. knocks a man out he stays knocked out. Although more than a year has passed, Hutcheson still appears to be inarticulate and glassy-eyed.

I seem to see preliminary symptoms that American journalism may be coming of age. I am thinking specifically of the interesting case of Paul Gallico. Mr. Gallico was the sports editor of the New York Daily News. He was particularly well known and widely quoted as an authority on prize fights. His post was just about top in his field. A survey revealed the fact that he was the most popular sports writer in New York City. He took a year's leave of absence to devote himself to magazine work, and when he returned everybody was surprised to hear that Gallico had asked to be taken off sports and put on general reporting. Thus while his old companions were down at Pompton Lakes, New Jersey, watching Joe Louis knock out stooges in training, Gallico was in Flint observing the far more interesting battle between John L. Lewis and Kid Sloan, the Harry Greb of fighting tactics in the industrial ring.

It seems to me that Paul has chosen the better part, although I will admit that as yet the crowd at Dempsey's does not say as frequently as of old, "Did you read Gallico today?" That will come in time. We need to be educated. Indeed, we need to unlearn a great deal of persuasive writing which has been set before us every day for a number of years.

One of the curious things about the trade of writing sports is that the practitioners sometimes succeed in fooling themselves. When Schmeling knocked out Joe Louis, he jarred the experts mightily. Almost without exception they had picked Joe to win. Indeed, he had been hailed by many as the super-fighter of all time. Since I was one of those who had joined in the chorus of acclaiming Joe Louis as the outstanding heavyweight of the age, I cannot afford to put on superior airs. My apology must contain the admission that I don't know very much about boxing and that I never did.

To me at the moment Louis is more interesting as a social phenomenon than as a ring technician. In spite of his vast hitting power he is too mechanical in his methods. One feels the hand of his trainer, Blackburn, always upon his shoulder. Joe does what he is told. In person he seems to me to be shy but affable. Of course he had no great opportunities of education in his early life. What native shrewdness he possesses is still debatable. Generally he dodges questions such as those bearing on his attitude toward the Scottsboro case and other vital problems affecting the Negro. As a rule when a sports writer talks with Louis, he deals only in such stock questions as "How do you feel today, Joe?" "Who do you think will win the pennant in the American League?" Or "Have you seen any moving pictures lately?" You can't really figure out a man's I. Q. on any such meager test.

But I do think it is unfortunate that many Negroes in America should have adopted Joe Louis as a hero and to some extent have overlooked the real leaders of the race. John L. Lewis through the organization of Negro workers in the mass-production industries has done more than Joe. Indeed, I ask leave to change my original estimate. I think that Lewis is the greatest heavyweight of our day.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

A BELIEVING THOMAS

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE character of Tom Paine was built upon that framework of cast-iron rectitude—unassailable but not always lovely—typical of the reformer pur sang. Drink, so often the vice of those who permit themselves no other, got him at last; but like most professional freethinkers in the days before freethinking became respectable, he seemed to feel that public repudiation of Christianity necessarily entailed the practice of all those Christian virtues which Christians so commonly feel it enough to believe in; and the "practical" revolutionists found his stubborn adherence to principles as inconvenient as conservatives ever had.

It is true that—again after the common fashion of those reformers whose high opinion of the human race makes them unspeakably cruel to its not always unamiable weaknesses—this defender of the rights of women contracted a marriage he had no intention of consummating because he believed a convenient marriage would put him in a better position to improve the lot of woman in the abstract. But he was sentenced to death by successful revolutionists in France and cold-shouldered by successful revolutionists in America because he was naive enough to insist that a revolution ought to achieve its professed aims, and was yet to learn that no one is likely to turn more suddenly "realistic" than a revolutionist who has just succeeded in getting the upper hand. When he pleaded for humanity at a meeting of the convention, Marat protested that Paine was a Quaker whose "mind is contracted by the narrow principles of his religion; he is incapable of the liberality requisite for condemning men to death."

Hesketh Pearson's biography* does not pretend to present any new facts or anything startlingly new in the way of interpretation. It is sympathetic both to Paine as a man and to his ideals, though the point of view is distinctly that of one who is ready to anticipate the disillusionments which so obviously came as a surprise to Paine himself. Though hardly more than a piece of solid journalism for the occasion of the bicentenary, it is, nevertheless, pleasantly readable and informative. One discovers Paine, the corset-maker, overmastered by passion for his various convictions. On Franklin's advice he goes to America, where he stiffens and unifies the purpose of the colonists so successfully that he has been credited with doing more than any other man to make the revolution a success. After that he is alternately in England and France—wherever he can get in the most trouble—and he ends almost literally in the gutter, partly at least because he had the bad judgment to provide his attacks on the Bible as a convenient excuse to those who would have felt less easy in their minds had they been compelled to persecute him for his political sentiments alone. Mr. Pearson stresses the practical effect of "Common Sense" and "The Crisis"; he does not say much about something which may have been quite as important. The American Revolution was in part a phase of eighteenth-century "enlightenment," in part a specific quarrel between England and a group of colonists who were by no means philosophers first of all. Paine probably did as much as any single person to supply these colonists with what is now called an "ideology," and to organize practical American discontent along the lines of eighteenth-century liberalism.

Paine was, of course, neither a scholar nor a littérateur. Something of the limitations of the typical village atheist, of the faddist who sees certain things so clearly that he does not see anything else, clung to him always, and his writing is about as devoid of overtones as any writing could be. Few great pamphlets have been so little more than pamphlets as his, and the only excuse—a good one incidentally—for the unimaginativeness of his treatment of Biblical literature is the fact that this "reasoning" of his was at least no more unimaginative than what we should now call the "fundamentalism" of his clerical and respectable opponents.

It must be admitted, on the other hand, that several bits of table talk quoted by Pearson have a bite and an irony more finished than anything I can remember from the formal works. "There is no body of men more jealous of their privileges than the Commons—because they sell them." "If I were obliged to accept a title it would be that of knighthood, as the infamy of it would not descend on my family." Or a bit of economic interpretation which anticipated Anatol France's famous remark about the prohibition against sleeping under bridges: "The law is equally open to the poor and the rich; so is the London Tavern." Pearson also tells a delightful story about how Paine once insisted upon putting to the vote of a company his opinion that, since the ignorant are more numerous than the wise, the minority should govern all assemblies. All agreed with Paine except "Peter Pindar," who thereupon insisted that by Paine's own contention he, Pindar, must be right. Paine's proposition may seem a strange one for a democrat, but the explanation is, I suppose, that in those days democrats were in the minority, and that the opinion which most of us hold concerning the "wisdom of the majority" is pretty likely to depend upon whether or not the majority is with us.

Just how deep Paine's final disillusion went I am not myself sure, but Mr. Pearson seems to think that it went pretty deep. Contemporary Marxists will of course insist that in so far as the movement of which he was a part failed to achieve the "free" and beautiful society he looked forward to, the failure was due to the fact that economic democracy was not achieved along with political democracy. That inequalities of wealth are among the immediate causes of the difference between what actually resulted and the results which idealists like Paine hoped for, no one can well deny. But to say that is by no means to prove that, to put it bluntly, nothing except "capitalism" stands between mankind and Utopia. One may admit that Paine was insufficiently aware of the power of wealth to corrupt society, but one may also state his mistake in general terms. Paine was one of that large class of reformers who assume that nothing stands between mankind and the good life except human institutions. He refused to admit, or at least to take sufficient account of the fact, that human nature also is somewhat less than perfect, and finds a way of expressing itself even under institutions which perfectionists have drawn up on paper. The real question is whether or not Marxists also are insufficiently aware of the fact.

* "Tom Paine, Friend of Mankind." By Hesketh Pearson. Harper and Brothers. $3.

BOOKS

Ichor of Imagination

THE INFERNAL MACHINE. By Jean Cocteau. Introduction and English Version by Carl Wildman. Oxford University Press. $3.

IN "The Infernal Machine" Jean Cocteau is as he was in "Orphée," a "fantaisiste" on a known theme." Fulfilling the prediction of the oracle, as in Sophocles, Oedipus kills his father Laius (by accident, not knowing the victim), thwarts the Sphinx (the devourer of the young men of Thebes), is rewarded by marriage with Jocasta (queen, and his own unrecognized mother), and having been made aware of his guilt puts out his own eyes. "He solves riddles, becomes king and an object of affection, is envied of all, yet suffers a desperate end; never call a man happy until you have read the last chapter," is the summary by Sophocles, and with it one compares "The Infernal Machine" by Cocteau, also Carl Wildman's statement in the introduction: "He has dived with the greatest ease into the heart of the legend and brought back the almost sacred characters stiff with glory, brought them back to life, humanized them." Act I lacks contagion, but the play does gradually compel in the reader an author-forgotten, self-forgetting, participating suspense.

A potent device in fiction or drama is that in which one character describes another to that other, unaware that he addresses the person of whom he speaks. This principle, inherent in the original Oedipus, Cocteau has made the most of; as in Jocasta's remark, "What a courteous young man! He must have been taken care of by a very kind mother, very kind"; and where, misconceiving the recoil of awareness with which Jocasta recognizes the scars on his feet, Oedipus says they were "from the hunt, I think." This principle is extended by Cocteau in the encounter of the Theban matron with the young girl in white whom she warns against the Sphinx. Sophocles's device of the corroborating shepherd who confirms Oedipus to himself is matched by Cocteau in the episode of the talisman returned to Oedipus by Tereias—the belt Oedipus had given the Sphinx, saying, "This will bring you to me when I have killed the beast." It is a good and dramatic moment in Act I in which Laius's ghost calls to Jocasta and the soldiers—undiscerned by them while they commiserate one another on its non-appearing; and there is drama in the mockery of Oedipus by Anubis, in the nightmare, Anubis repeating the words which Oedipus had naively spoken to the Sphinx, "Thanks to my unhappy childhood. . . ."

"Logic forces us to appear to men in the shape in which they imagine us; otherwise, they would see only emptiness," Anubis is made to say—a statement of which the invisible ghost of Laius is an illustration; also a strong clue to the mind of Jean Cocteau himself. The extra character, Anubis—death's orderly—is an invention particularly characteristic of Cocteau—cognate to Azrael and Raphael, death's assistants in "Orphée." In that preceding play "darkness has been shown in broad daylight," Mr. Wildman says; and always it is as the poet we must think of Cocteau—the person who says "a thing can rarely at the same time be and seem true," who says he is "incapable of writing a play for or against anything"; and warns one that "it is not the poet's role to produce cumbersome proofs." M. Cocteau is haughty and dictatorial, he does not spread his cloak on the mud, he does not make promises, and his temperament permeates all his concepts; but he is fervent. His ardor of imagination, voracity of presentment, inexhaustible fund of metaphor, and crisp fastidiousness comprise an apperceptiveness rivaled only by that of the animals.

Aphorism is one of the kindlier phases of autocracy and is used from time to time in "The Infernal Machine." Creon says, "The most secret of secrets are betrayed one day or another to the determined seeker," and the Soldier says, "A word of advice: let princes deal with princes, phantoms with phantoms, and soldiers with soldiers." But going beyond mere incisiveness, M. Cocteau sometimes imparts to a word a kind of lovable neatness, such as we have in Aristophanes where he speaks of the man who whiled away the time making frogs from fruit skins. We have it in Corbière and in E. E. Cummings; and in Clarence Day where "l'hippopotame" is introduced as an equivalent for the Biblical behemoth.

Cocteau's vituperative tendency of superficial contentiousness appears in the soldiers' banter; and as Mr. Wildman notes, in the Sphinx. Yet more marked—as an asset however—there is the tendency to incantation. One sees it in Le Grand Ecart, in the Narcissus passage, where the river "cares nothing about the nymphs or the trees it reflects—longing only for the sea"; and here, in the Sphinx's self-characterization: "A judge is not so unalterable, an insect so voracious, a bird so carnivorous, the egg so nocturnal, a Chinese executioner so ingenious, the heart so unpredictable, the prestidigitator so deft, the star so portentous, the snake sliming its prey, so intent. . . . I speak, I work, I wind, I unwind, I calculate, I muse, I weave, I winnow, I knit, I plait. . . ."

The author has invested the play with modern emotion, and reveling in verisimilitude, causes Jocasta to say to Oedipus as she lifts him in the nightmare, "Don't make yourself heavy, help me." Oedipus, successfully vivid, pants and arrests the eye, Jocasta half infatuates, the Sphinx—symbolizing the machinery of the gods' injustice—inspires fear, though her literal femininity and emphasized claws point to a crochet on M. Cocteau's part. He appears to have an unfeminist yet not wholly detached attitude to woman; Jocasta being, like the Sphinx, "of the sex which is disturbing to heroes." Burdensome yet seductive, she asks, "Am I so old then," and adds, "Women say things to be contradicted. They always hope it isn't true." But also as part of the author's mental tendency, she is "poetic" and has the aspect of sculpture—dead, white, beautiful, with closed eyes.

At the end of the play, instead of a somber dimming of personality as in the Greek play, there is an allusion to "glory," as completing the destiny of Oedipus, and horror is relieved. Ought it to be?

One must not put hic jacet on a living person; Jean Cocteau gives the effect of concentration, rapid communication, self-amused satire, of suitably interesting creatures, of haberdashery, and of colors grayed by lime. Convinced of his liveliness and energy, aware that imagination with him is not an appurtenance but an ichor, as it was shown to be in "Le Sang d'un Poète," one has, nevertheless, the sense of something submerged and estranged, of a somnambulist with feet tied, or a musical instrument in a museum, that should be sounding. He is like a person of valor in a fairy tale, changed by hostile enchantment into a frog or carp, compelled to sequestration in a well or pool. There is here a riddle for him to solve, because great art must obsess one; it is not a thing which can be left and returned to at will. In myth there is a principle of penalty: Snowwhite must not open the door of the dwarf's house when the peddler knocks, Pandora must not open the box, Perseus must not look at the gorgon except in his shield; and Jean Cocteau, in refusing to be answerable to any morality but his own, is in the Greek sense impious and unnatural. But he is a very fine inhabitant of the Underworld. In anything he writes he realizes an atmosphere of his own, is willing to be betrayed as well as supported by his congenial appetites, and reaffirms himself in sundry psychic weather vanes and favorite fancies.

MARIANNE MOORE

Lover's Indulgence

REPERUSALS AND RECOLLECTIONS. By Logan Pearsall Smith. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THOUGH the author has nothing new to contribute to our critical understanding of literature, and though his whole intention seems to be to exhibit a rather obvious and academic personal taste, yet there remains a quality of charm in these essays, a flavor of leisurely good gossip, which gives them readability. In the matter of pure appreciation of previously ascertained literary values, Logan Pearsall Smith is already famous. Now he writes well, if wordily, on many subjects: on the English aphorists, on Carlyle as the "Rembrandt of English prose," on Jeremy Taylor, on the sermons of Donne, on Sainte-Beuve and Montaigne and Madame de Sévigné and others—including, inevitably, Walter Pater. At his discursive best—as in the essay on the quaint diary of his American Quaker ancestress, Ann Whitall—Mr. Smith is neat, informative, and entertaining. But what can we, schooled to a scientific appraisal of letters, say of a critic who writes of "the glories of our literature" and complains that there has been no interesting or beautiful prose composed since the later "glories" of Henry James? I think that we can only

SPECIAL SALE OF BOOK BARGAINS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order House
These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 75% of their regular retail price. Each book is brand-new in condition stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. In many cases the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 53-year-old MONEY BACK GUARANTEE.

1. WHILE ROME BURNS. By Alexander Woolcott. "A generous selection of his best horror stories, anecdotes, personal portraits, legendary tales and reminiscences." Over 150,000 sold. Original $2.75 edition. Our Special Price: 98c

2. THE WELL OF LONELINESS. By Radclyffe Hall. Complete and unexpurgated. 506 pages. ($5.00) Our Special Price: 98c

3. VAN GOGH'S MOST FAMOUS PAINTINGS. 4 Magnificent Full-Color Reproductions, size 14" x 16½"; excellent for framing. Together with Introduction Booklet by Gertrude Benson, containing 17 Van Gogh half-tones. ($10.00) Our Special Price for all: $1.98

4. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOS. Twelve prints in full color. Size 9 by 12 inches. Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued, they were sold at FROM $5.00 to $8.00 PER PRINT. ($7.50) Our Special Price for the Twelve Prints: $1.49

5. FAMOUS REMBRANDT ETCHINGS. The Three Trees—The Mill—Faust—measuring 15½" x 12½", 12½" x 10¾", 10¾" x 12½" respectively. Ideal for framing. Originals of The Three Trees have fetched $6,000 at Art Auctions. ($5.00) Our Special Price, for the set of 3, only 98c

6. ORIGINAL SIGNED ETCHINGS by foremost Foreign and American etchers. Many of these exact same originals are in the world-famous galleries at The Louvre, British Museum, Metropolitan Museum of Art, etc. Retail at $5.00 to $20.00 each. Our Special Price, each 98c

With each order amounting to $9.80 for 10 original signed etchings ($9.80) we offer you free AN ORIGINAL JOSEPH PENNELL ETCHING of The Bridge of Alcántara (not offered separately), which has sold as high as $36.00 alone.

7. THE THEATRE: 3,000 Years of the Theatre. By Sheldon Cheney. Profusely illustrated with 204 interesting illustrations. 558 pages. "A thoroughly readable, well-documented and beautifully illustrated history of man's whole adventure in the theatre."—Outlook. Chataqua Edition. ($10.00) Our Special Price, only 98c

8. DON QUINOTE: By Cervantes. With over 400 Gustave Doré illustrations. 855 pages. ($12.50) Our Special Price: $1.98

9. The Complete Writings of BRANN, THE ICONOCLAST. His entire works, formerly in 12 volumes, now complete in two. Formerly available only at ($35.00) Our Special Price, the set, only $2.98

10. MILTON'S "PARADISE LOST." Including All His Other Poems. Profusely illustrated by the famous Gustave Doré. "Second only to the Bible and Shakespeare."—Encyclopedia Americana on "Paradise Lost" contained in this volume. 688 pages. ($10.00) Our Special Price: $1.98

11. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. Translated by Henry F. Carey. With 130 full-page illustrations by the famous Gustave Doré. Contains "Inferno," "Purgatory," "Paradise." With complete notes. 652 pages. ($10.00) Our Special Price: $2.98

12. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor. Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New." ($3.00) Our Special Price: $1.58

13. This Work Won THE PULITZER PRIZE: MY EXPERIENCES IN THE WORLD WAR. By John J. Pershing. FIRST EDITION. Illustrated with 69 reproductions from photographs and numerous maps. In 2 large vols. 836 pages. Boxed. "General Pershing has not only written THE MOST AUTHORITY, the most penetrating and most decisive account of our own part in the war, but has presented a finer spirit in narration than any of the others."—Pulitzer Prize Committee. ($10.00) Our Special Price, the set: $2.98

14. PECULIARITIES OF BEHAVIOR. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Fascinating analysis of impulsive acts, disorders of instincts and emotions, etc. The textbook of psychoanalysis. ($10.00) Our Special Price, the 2 volume set: $2.98

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

N-14

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $_____ for which please send me the books I have circled below: delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 276-N, Just off press!

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

As Much As $75,000,000 Worth Of Radium

THIS single x-ray tube produces as much radiation energy as would radium worth $75,000,000. This tube—one of several developed and built by G-E scientists—is helping medical science to make further and more rapid gains in the battle against disease.

For more than 25 years, General Electric research scientists have led the steady improvement in x-ray development. From their work—with thousands of volts from giant transformers, with tanks of purified oil—have come better and ever better x-ray tubes. Physicians and surgeons have gained more compact and more powerful tools for diagnosis and therapy—better tools with which to safeguard your health.

Other developments in the Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, also work for better health. There is the inductotherm, which permits medical science to produce, at will, curative fevers in the patient's body. There are sources of ultraviolet radiation for the treatment of rickets in children. And in all these aids to medicine, the results of years of scientific investigation are being applied to the relief of suffering, to the treatment of disease, to the improvement of the health and well-being of millions of people.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric adapt a metaphor from Amiel, and call Mr. Smith a gardener rather than a geologist. He cultivates the earth for its flowers; he does not dig deep enough to understand it.

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

"There are readers—and I am one of them—"Mr. Smith confesses on page one, line one, "whose reading is rather like a series of intoxications. We fall in love with a book. . . ." So we follow Mr. Smith's infatuations; the most notable, as well as the most constant, object of his highly articulate affections being the Purple Passage. He even presents a spirited defense of what he calls Fine Writing (the sort of thing Pater did), making his points against some puritanical moderns, like Herbert Read and Middleton Murry, with all the fire and some of the unscrupulousness—to apply Mr. Smith's own figure—of a lover or a drunkard. But perhaps Mr. Smith's passion for Fine Writing ought better to be described as an addiction to it. Here, at any rate, is the result: "Deep in the male bosom, from before the dawn of history, there has persisted an almost religious awe of the unsullied chastity of the other sex." In one frightful sentence four frightful clichés. Positively, Mr. Smith, this is debauchery!

Criticism apart, though—and who expects criticism from a lover—there are many excellent passages of appreciative insight in these essays. They are the product of a cultivated mind, soaked—one might almost say, sodden—with the phrases and rhythms of great books. Mr. Smith will add little to your understanding, but his essays may be numbered among your pleasures.

MICHAEL SAYERS

A Century of History

THE HUNDRED YEARS. By Philip Guedalla. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

MR. GUEDALLA'S performance is always brilliant, and in this instance he has been brilliant enough not to undertake "the despairing enterprise" of trying to cram a century into a volume. What he gives us is "the leading moments . . . as they affected the leading units of the Western world," a discontinuous method applied to a consecutive plan, not a "peepshow of picturesque events, but an unwinding panorama in the last scene of which we are living." Within "the strictest limits of historical precision" he has striven for a living presentation of scenes, situations, and forces, and tried to see them through the eyes of contemporary witnesses.

But though scenically and psychologically they have the look and accent of their time, inevitably, because of the underlying plan, the last scene in which we live colors our sense of the earlier scenes. When the dawn rises over the Western Hemisphere on a summer day in 1837, we already feel the tug of the unwinding scroll. It rises over Kensington, where a young girl will awake to be queen of a country she will not fully know and will give her name to an epoch she will not understand; over St. Petersburg, slumbrous twelve years after the Dekabrist revolt; over Vienna, more interested in dancing and Schlagsahne than in the explosive possibilities around its frontiers; over the "uncomfortable mosaic" of the German Federation; over Paris, where Louis Philippe sits stolidly on a volcano; over Spain, already stormy; over the United States, where the terrible depression is in full swing, having burst on the astonished citizenry one month after President Van Buren's inaugural speech celebrated "an aggregate of human prosperity not elsewhere to be found." In 1848, year of revolutions and dictators, the Chartist demonstration collapses miserably at Kensington

Common, the inability of the English to apprehend general ideas, Mr. Guedalla holds, combining with the climate to make revolution impossible; but in France ideas and musket shots "almost imperceptibly" ease out the Second Republic and a few months later usher in the Second Empire; in America the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo ends the Mexican War with the cession to the United States of vast territories which change its shape, possibilities, and sectional relationships. Henceforth its destinies will be continental, molded by transportation, and the first freight carried out of Chicago in this same year by the Galena and Chicago Union Railroad is more important historically than all the European alarms and excursions. Such evaluations, however arrived at, are Mr. Guedalla's obeisance to the economic aspects which he indicates here and there in telling paragraphs, but the reader must bring a good deal of predigested knowledge to their elaboration and criticism. In 1861 Russians cease to be serfs but do not become free men, and at Charleston, South Carolina, the firing on Fort Sumter ushers in the long process toward a similar result. In Europe it is becoming painfully obvious that there is a German point of view, and in '71 the dramatic scene in the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles subsumes the whole Machiavellian policy of Bismarck and the precarious equilibrium of Europe. The swaggering figure of William I frightens France into the arms of Russia and England into the arms of France. The portrait of the German emperor is the conventional one, but it is done with such verve and virtuosity that he disputes only with "that formidable man" Lenin the foreground of one's memory after the book is read.

The emphasis is mainly on politics and personalities, the point of view liberal and British, the method pictorial. Mr. Guedalla is a scenic artist. If he has somewhat novelized and personalized history, he has done so within the framework of historic events and with better balance and greater erudition, charm, and wit than we are likely to get from any other popular historian. But in making pictures much must be sacrificed to composition. There is almost nothing about the development of industry, either technically or socially, nothing about emigration. Social movements, arts, and sciences hardly come within the scope of the book, and though there is an underlying plan, and many acute observations, there is no underlying philosophy. A small atlas of maps showing the progressive changes in the boundaries of Europe and the United States is a valuable feature and a welcome exception to the inadequate cartography of most historical narratives.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

The Usable Past

SCENERY THEN AND NOW. By Donald Oenslager. W. W. Norton and Company. $5.

IT CAN be said, I think, without pulling the Woolcott over anyone's eyes that American scene designers show a surprising aptitude for expressing themselves in prose as well as in paint. Aline Bernstein has just trekked with the "American Caravan" to its latest oasis. Robert Edmond Jones's occasional prose pieces have the smoldering elegance of his best costume designs. I have been a part-time journalist and author since 1914. Donald Oenslager now continues the tradition in a fluently written volume that analyzes the relation of the theater today to its past, and demonstrates with a good deal of critical acumen and theatrical imagination how the modern designer can make use of the traditions

HEAR THE WORLD'S Finest Music
WHENEVER YOU WISH!

RCA Victor Phonograph-Radio, 9U-2; incorporates new RCA Victor Higher Fidelity Phonograph—and latest RCA Victor Magic Brain Radio $300

EMOTION is the stuff of music . . . and twice delightful is the music that harmonizes with your emotions . . . your most beloved symphony when your mood is keyed to it...a sentimental love song when you're feeling romantic. Any new RCA Victor Phonograph-Radio offers you the entire world of music from which to choose the one selection that is tuned to your mood of the moment...the all-embracing scope of Victor Records as well as world-wide radio. 5 different instruments begin at $69.50, go to $450.00. Hear them at your dealer's.

RCA presents the Metropolitan Opera every Saturday afternoon. Also "The Magic Key" every Sunday, 2 to 3 P. M., E. S. T. Both on NBC Blue Network.

RCA Victor

RECORDS AND
PHONOGRAPH-RADIOS

A Service of the Radio Corporation of America

"An exciting and extremely valuable document . . . giving the best picture now available of what is going on in Spain." says JOHN GUNTHER of

BEHIND the SPANISH BARRICADES

By John Langdon-Davies. "No one can read this book and not understand why Mr. Langdon-Davies believes it a crying shame that the remaining non-Fascist countries allow the Spanish Loyalists to suffer under Franco's attack. And to put it skimpily and far too simply, a victory by Franco means another Germany, even more weak."—Boston Transcript. Illustrated with graphic photographs taken on the spot—and a large relief map of Spain. 3RD LARGE PRINTING. $2.75

The 'Land of the Free' in 1936

AMERICAN HURLY-BURLY

By Ernest Sutherland Bates, editor of The Bible, Designed to Be Read as Living Literature, and ALAN WILLIAMS. Here are the highlights of the past year illumined by brilliant satire and deft irony. The late lamented Liberty League, the behavior of the Supreme Court, the break-up of the Republican party, Red-baiting, the new "Conservative" policy of the Communists, etc. A book that will keep you chuckling as you review one of the most extraordinary years in American history. "A searching, biting, provocative interpretation."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2.50

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & CO., 116 E. 16th ST., NEW YORK

War or Peace in Europe?

To form sound judgments on the crucial events in Europe, you need complete unbiased news from abroad and courageous interpretation by the most astute liberal journalists in England. You get both in The Manchester Guardian Weekly which now offers you a trial subscription.

For more than a century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on a great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weekly indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of 26 weeks for $2—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home. Mail the coupon at once!

TAKE ADVANTAGE OF THIS TRIAL OFFER OF ENGLAND'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY—26 WEEKS FOR $2

Manchester Guardian Weekly

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, 224 West 42nd Street, New York City.

I enclose two dollars for your 26 weeks' trial offer of The Manchester Guardian Weekly.

2-6-37

of the theater's heyday, in Aristophanes's Athens, Plautus's Rome, Gozzi's Venice, Molière's and Racine's Paris.

Mr. Oenslager has too acute a sense of theatrical presentation to become a pious revivalist. With all his enthusiasm for the accepted glories of the theater's past, he has no interest in academic resuscitation. "Convention in art," he points out, "is flexible experiment tightened by constant practice into common procedure." Historic methods of staging plays "may open up a new world of invention for the scene designer if he will put its ancient traditions to new uses."

Being a first-rate scene designer, he treats scenery as part of the dynamics of production, as only one element in putting a play over. He revives the past by giving his reader a sense of what it may have been like or must have been like to witness a performance at Athens, Rome, or Versailles. The "classic" play, whatever its period, is to him always a good show, and as a historian he recreates the impact of a particular type of play on a particular audience, its vitality and glamor, the particular emotional tingle it aroused and sustained. His successive obeisances to historic models are imaginative reconstructions of performances that have all the excitement of successful opening nights.

The revival of Plautus's "Casina" is played against a comic backdrop of a Roman street that is a vaudeville backdrop in "one," and the comic business is put over with all the slapstick directness of vaudeville. "The Birds" becomes a fantastic revue about aviators, an "Attic Follies." It needs "a strong tonic of all the most vigorous elements of modern production. It must be pitched to the tempo of burlesque and vaudeville with the variety of a three-ring circus and the new dimensions of radio and even the movies—Gershwin music, and scenery with newfangled lights—for actors, the Marx Brothers, Victor Moore, Beatrice Lillie, and a chorus that can mime as well as dance." A revival of Gozzi's "Love of the Three Oranges" with Prokofiev's music "must be completely exposed to the contagion of theatrical combustion. First the scenario must be translated into the satiric idiom of our own day. Scenery and costumes may have as many styles as there are comic artists to draw them. Ask Thurber and Disney, Dali and Fox to design the production. . . . The King belongs to Soglow. Smeraldine is a black-faced Topsy. The giantess is a Macy's Thanksgiving Day parade gollywog balloon whom the fearless Prince deflates and mortifies in no time."

Mr. Oenslager is not solely interested in cutting Max Gordian knots or outflaunting the Billy Rose. He revives "Egmont" with somber affectedness and fills the fjords and fields of "Brand" with romantic chiaroscuro, relying on what he calls "the miracle of light," electric light that in the modern theater "is an emotional and dramatic medium capable of infinite expression and as subtle as a whispered phrase or as obvious as a comic strip." Mr. Oenslager's most original contribution is, I think, his restaging of "The Emperor Jones," in which the tree trunks of a shadowy forest gradually take shape as African totem poles, symbols of atavistic fear, and Jones's final terror is dominated by a gigantic jungle idol.

Unfortunately the technique of Mr. Oenslager's drawings, dramatically interesting and imaginative as almost all of them are, is the least original element in the volume, being derived from the type of black-and-white rendering that Robert Edmond Jones made his own a number of years ago in his drawings for "The Jest," "Richard III," and "Hamlet." But the fact does not detract from the originality of the volume.

which as a whole demonstrates how ■ repertory theater today, in the hands of directors and designers as imaginative as Mr. Oenslager, might be made continuously exciting even to Broadway audiences.

LEE SIMONSON

Modern Dance in America

AMERICA DANCING. By John Martin. Dodge Publishing Company. $3.

THIS is the most complete account we possess of the modern dance in America. The first part is a statistical survey of the growth and present status of the dance movement. The number of groups that practice this art is truly impressive, and Mr. Martin makes the most of it as evidence of a popular awakening to the dance. There is a good account of the influences which formed the present generation; Isadora Duncan, Delsarte, and the Denishawn group are regarded ■ the most important. Mr. Martin thinks ballet has had no influence except ■ negative one, and he minimizes the importance of the Continental modern dance in the formation of the American modern dance. In the final section he gives the training, artistic credos, and principal works of some two dozen of the better-known dancers. This part contains useful information but lacks critical discrimination. Everyone turns out to be "unique" and "the greatest living" something or other. In ■ work of description and propaganda this may pass, but the omission of Louis Horst's work in the training of Martha Graham's group is harder to justify. Mr. Horst and Miss Graham's group give ■ demonstration of this training and of the relation of the pre-classic musical and dance forms to the modern dance which is the best rationale of the modern dance that I have encountered.

In the theoretical and critical part of his book Mr. Martin becomes very confusing. He attacks such questions as tradition, the nature of a national art, and the relation of dance to music, literature, and the theater, as though he had never pondered the words of the standard critics. He writes heatedly, but I could not discover that he had a consistent critical position; he repeats popular battle cries, but sheds no light. Where he excels is in his acquaintance with all the facts of the movement. Mr. Martin, indeed, as dance critic on the Times, organizer of the New School series on the dance, member of the Bennington School of the dance, as lecturer and tireless propagandist, is himself one of the leaders of the movement. He knows the work of teachers, organizers, and propagandists as well as that of the celebrated performers. It is pleasant to find work of this kind recognized.

FRANCIS FERGUSON

New Novels

NOT ALL RIVERS. By Adriana Spadoni. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THE question of what shall be the political position of honest liberals faced with the facts of oppression and violence is a legitimate subject for novelists today. Miss Spadoni, in the last third of ■ longish novel, confronts her heroine with one of the California growers' strikes. Pickets are beaten, vigilantism is riding high, workers' makeshift homes are burned, and as a last straw the heroine's husband, ■ liberal lawyer unsuccessfully defending the workers' cause, is beaten by the local "Committee of Safety." What shall a liberal do if he cannot quite join his ranting direct-action friends? Miss Spadoni is ■ little muddled in her answers,

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by

C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.S., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

3-WAY
GUIDE:

including
charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M. D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital.

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

■ upon Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the ■ Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via ■ Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; ■ Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sex Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that ■ physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—*Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View ■
The Internal Sex Organs ■ The External Sex Organs ■ Female Sex
Organs, Front View ■ Entrance to

Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or in
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 797-N
251 West 19th St., New York

■ me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name
Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(by arrangement with Sidney Harmon)

But for the Grace of God

by Leopold Atlas

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday and Saturday 2:45. Eves. 8:45

SCOTTSBORO

HERNDON

BALL

FRIDAY,
FEBRUARY 12th
(Lincoln's Birthday)
SAVOY BALLROOM
140th St. & Lenox Ave.

Tickets 75c
HURRY! GET THEM!
156-5th Av., Rm. 534
Auspices: Nat'l Com.
for the Defense of Political Prisoners

Eye-Witness Reports on Spain

ROBERT MINOR

Member of the Central Committee,
Communist Party, U. S. A.
AMERICAN NEUTRALITY AND SPAIN.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Author of I Change Worlds, just arrived from the Soviet Union and from Spain. THE PEOPLE'S FRONT IN SPAIN.

RALPH BATES

English novelist, author of *Lean
Men, The Olive Field*. THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN.

MALCOLM COWLEY

Editor of The New Republic and author of Exile's Return.
Chairman

SPAIN in DEFENSE of FREEDOM

Sponsored by The New Masses and The American Society for Technical Aid to Spanish Democracy

Tickets: 35c, 55c, 83c, $1.10, $1.65. Now on sale at:
Now (orders by mail and phone filled, Caledonia 5-3076), 31 East 27th St.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10TH, 8:30 P. M.
MECCA AUDITORIUM
133 West 55th Street

LET THE TRUTH BE KNOWN!

CHICAGO MASS MEETING ON THE MOSCOW TRIALS AND TROTSKY

Speakers: Norman Thomas and Albert Goldman
Frank W. McCulloch, Chairman

at the CAPITOL BUILDING (Drill Room)
159 N. State St., Chicago, Ill.

on Sunday, February 14th, at 3 P. M.

Auspices: Socialist Party of Cook County
Admission 25 cents

THE CASE HISTORY OF THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY

By Charles R. Walker

COMING SOON IN THE NATION

but she states the problem with force and considerable passion. The first part of her novel, in which her heroine grows up as a woman, is less impressive. Growing up, in this case, seems to mean a realization that love and sexual desire are not the same thing. This momentous conclusion seems unimportant and irrelevant in the light of the real intellectual conflict offered in the latter part of the book. Which does not mean that the relationship of loyalty to sexual passion is a less interesting subject for fiction than is society, but merely that Miss Spadoni is better equipped to describe it than to resolve the difficulties which society presents.

LANCER AT LARGE. By F. Yeats-Brown. The Viking Press. $2.75.

Mr. Yeats-Brown, the incurable lancer, returns to India after fifteen years. His travels take him to Meerut, to Calcutta, to Madras, to Bombay, to Peshawar, and to various places in between. He considers India's ancient past as well as its disturbed present. He is fascinated by Yoga and gives explicit directions for meditation, including breathing exercises which have to be undertaken with care or they may be dangerous. He interviews government officials, Swamis, gurus, untouchables, Brahman priests, Hindu mystics, women, and Mr. Gandhi, and watches at the Allahabad fair the procession of naked bhairagis on their way to the holy Ganges. India, he says, is a land of paradoxes, "cynical, credulous, coldly ascetic, madly passionate," its people are "experimenters with the most delicate and devastating of vices, and practitioners of the most absolute purity!" And there are 350,000,000 of these people. A book about such a country and such a people cannot fail to be in some degree interesting. But the traveler's chitchat, interspersed with his own mystical yearnings, which Mr. Yeats-Brown offers his readers is not interesting enough. India deserves a better book.

TOLD WITH A DRUM. By Edward Harris Heth. Houghton, Mifflin Company. $2.

What happened to German-Americans during the World War has been told often enough. That, of course, is no reason why it should not be told again, if in the telling the author presents some important artistic conception to give his story meaning. Mr. Heth has merely been realistic, sympathetic, and clear. This is enough to make a novel pretty good but not first-rate.

CAROLINE SMITH

RECORDS

VICTOR'S new recording of the music of "The Mikado" (11 records, $16.50), made by the D'Oyly Carte Company, is well sung and clearly recorded and should give pleasure to many people. But it disappoints those who know the old set which it replaces. The words of Ko-Ko as sung by Henry A. Lytton in the old set had a sharpness, a sting, that is essential to their meaning and effect, and that is lacking in them as Martyn Green sings them in the new set; and this may be said also of the words of Katisha as sung by Bertha Lewis and now by Josephine Curtis. What it is that is lost one can hear in the singing of Darrell Fancourt, who is the superb Mikado of both sets. And there is in fact a loss of spirit in the entire performance. Also the new set is issued without a libretto.

Possibly the failures of American composers should be recorded, but they should be offered to the public as failures, not as successes. I hate to think of anyone deciding to see what there is in cultivated music, and deriving his idea of it, as a result of Victor's selling talk, from the records of MacDowell's Piano Concerto in D minor, and particularly from a performance in which the solo pianist, Jesus-Maria Sanroma, does not play the music but attacks it in the steel-fingered manner appropriate to Stravinsky or Toch. And the crowning ineptitude is to include in the same album two records of a Divertissement by Ibert—presumably because it, too, is played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler (5 records, $7.50).

Flagstad's recording of Elsa's Dream on a single Victor record ($2) is her best so far, and better than "Dich, teure Halle" on the reverse side. But these other Victor items I do not recommend: Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, played by the Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter (2 records, $3); Balakirev's "Islamey," played by Simon Barer (1 record, $2); the Brahms-Dvorak Hungarian Dances Nos. 18 to 21, played by the Minneapolis Symphony under Ormandy (1 record, $1.50); "The Heavens Are Telling the Creation" and "Achieved Is the Glorious Work" from Haydn's "The Creation," sung by the Royal Choral Society with the London Philharmonic under Sargent (1 record, $1.50).

In most of the performances on Victor records by Benny Goodman's large band one hears a great deal of the brilliance and verve of the band as a whole, and not enough—for my taste—of the individual quality of certain fine players. Krupa's drumming is of course always prominent, there is no performance without its phrase or phrases from Goodman's clarinet, and occasionally there is a trumpet or saxophone solo, but almost never does one hear Stacey, who is a pianist of unusual delicacy and taste (he contributes the piano solo in "Blues of Israel," which I mentioned a few weeks ago). The recent performances of the large band that I have enjoyed are "St. Louis Blues" (Victor 25411) and "Alexander's Ragtime Band" (25445); but I have derived most pleasure from the marvelous performances by Goodman and Krupa with Teddy Wilson at the piano and Lionel Hampton at the vibraphone (my pleasure has not come from the vibraphone): performances of "Tiger Rag" (25481) and "Exactly Like You" (25406) by the trio, and of "Dinah" (25398) by the quartet. The playing of Goodman and Wilson grows constantly richer in style, and in these performances there is an astonishing increase in the richness of Krupa's contribution—its intricacy, and withal its subtlety and integration with the work of the others.

Good things on Bluebird records are "Casey Blues" and "I'se Just a Bad Luck Man" (6519), sung by Casey Bill with superb accompaniment of guitar, piano, and bass; "Shreveport Farewell" (6733), a piano solo by Little Brother; "Washboards Get Together" (6633), by the Washboard Serenaders; and two old Duke Ellington items—"Old Man Blues" (6450) and "Saratoga Swing" (6565). If you don't know them already, investigate Ellington's "Swing Low," "Ducky Wucky," and "Swanee Rhapsody" (Brunswick 6432, 6288).

If you are interested in records made by Battistini, Melba, Sembrich, and other singers of legendary greatness, you will find a collection of them at the Vesey Music Shop, 67 Vesey Street, New York, a catalogue informs me.

B. H. HAGGIN

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

INTEGRATION OF PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SOCIAL WORK

requires a professionally trained personnel in both fields.

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

offers a graduate curriculum leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees, for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills.

For information about requirements for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to

DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

Pushkin

By Ernest J. Simmons

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

In this first full-length biography, in English, of the greatest poet of pre-revolutionary Russia, Mr. Simmons has presented a brilliant account of a stormy career. The reader follows with breathless interest the love intrigues that Pushkin summarized in his Don Juan list, his heart-breaking days in exile, his persecution by the tsar's secret police, the final duel forced upon him by the frivolousness of his beautiful wife, and the creation of his marvelous poetry, such as the world-classics, Eugene Onegin and Boris Godunov. $4.00 a copy

CHICAGO GOES BROKE
An astonishing article by Milton S. Mayer in THE NATION next week

Save ^{up} to 27% on your magazine Subscriptions

Why pay more than necessary for your magazine subscriptions? Here are the combinations Nation readers prefer at prices you are willing to pay. All subscriptions are for one year. They may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed 30 days.

The Nation and } $6.50
Harpers Magazine } Separately $9

The Nation and } $6
Reader's Digest } Separately $8

The Nation and } $6.50
Current History } Separately $8

The Nation and } $6
Scribners Magazine } Separately $7.50

Your Own Combination

Add to your combination any of the magazines listed here at the prices stated or make your own combination by adding the prices for the magazines you wish.

Atlantic Monthly.....	$3.75	The Nation	$4.75
Common Sense.....	2.50	New Republic.....	4.50
Current History.....	2.75	Reader's Digest.....	3.00
The Guardian (Weekly)	3.00	Scribner's	2.50
Harpers Magazine.....	3.75	Survey Graphic	3.00

Take no chance. Make sure you get one of these bargains. Fill in and mail the order form below today!

Order Form

2-6-37

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Send me for one year the magazines listed below. ☐ I inclose payment in full, ☐ OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

MAGAZINES	SEND TO
_____	_____
_____	_____
_____	_____

Who Wants Peace?

DOROTHY THOMPSON, one of the keenest observers of our time, writes in the current SURVEY GRAPHIC Magazine an interpretation of the peace movement in the United States. This distinctive contribution is based upon a complete exploration, made by Marian Churchill White for the SURVEY GRAPHIC research staff, of every organized, voluntary group whose major activity is the promotion of world peace.

"The peace movement has been scoffed at by the tough minded for its sentimentality and its confused thinking," says Miss Thompson, "But it is clearly bent on keeping America to the American dream: a country... non-aggressive, proudly free, and robustly civilian. More than any movement in the United States, that represented by the peace societies is a cross-section of the American mind."

What is peace? What is neutrality? Miss Thompson's inquiry searches the answers to these eternally urgent questions at a time in history when perplexed plain people and scholars are putting their heads and hearts into various efforts to avert war, to promote peace and good will. Her article illuminates not only the forces of peace, but the forces they combat, twenty years after 1917.

What Can You Do About It?

Who Wants Peace? is typical of the unique editorial scheme of SURVEY GRAPHIC. Here are conclusions, drawn by an outstanding expert, from a set of facts gathered in original research.

Informative on a wide range of topics, SURVEY GRAPHIC is concerned with social interpretation of the world in which we live. It is as forthright in approach as it is tolerant in its judgments. SURVEY GRAPHIC defies the labels "radical" or "conservative"; it is fearlessly objective, and packed with human stuff.

Published monthly, on the 25th by SURVEY ASSOCIATES, INC.

A Cooperative Publishing Society

112 EAST 19TH STREET

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Special Introductory Offer

SURVEY GRAPHIC

112 East 19th St., New York

Please enter my subscription for 6* months:

() $1 enclosed in full payment
() Send a bill

Name

Address

* Subscriptions will start with the February issue containing Who Wants Peace? Subscribers who send cash with order will receive in addition to their 6 copies the preceding issue of SURVEY GRAPHIC—free.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Letters to the Editors

Effective Neutrality

Dear Sirs: There is a confusion of two issues which are best kept distinct in Mr. Villard's Issues and Men, published January 2, and your editorial of January 9, on the subject of neutrality legislation. Question one: Should a neutral embargo by the United States apply to all belligerents in all cases, with no provision for making a distinction even in the clearest of circumstances between aggressor and law-abiding victim? Question two: If there were to be differentiation between victim and aggressor by the United States, should the decision in a particular case be made by the President, by Congress, or by the two jointly?

Of course, the so-called "mandatory" embargo favored by the isolationist Senators would allow for no distinction at all between attacker and attacked, so the second question would simply not arise. But it is incorrect to assume, as Mr. Villard does, that a policy of cooperating with other nations for the purpose of discriminating against clear violators of the Kellogg pact must leave the ultimate decision with the President. Such a policy could be either discretionary for the President or mandatory upon him to report to Congress and obtain its authorization before taking any action.

This latter plan is the one actually proposed in the neutrality bill drawn up by the expert committee of the National Peace Conference in December, 1935. I quote its Section 7:

If the President shall find that one or more of the belligerent countries [to which a temporary embargo has automatically been applied, as provided earlier in the bill] was attacked in contravention of the provisions of the Pact of Paris, and if such finding is concurred in by a majority of other non-belligerent countries parties to said pact, he shall so advise the Congress, and, with its consent, he may revoke his embargo proclamations issued under Section 3 of this act in respect to such country or countries so attacked, and the provisions hereof shall thereupon cease to apply in respect to such country or countries.

Such a policy would maintain the prerogatives of Congress, it would not commit the United States to deciding on the aggressor in unclear cases (as judged by the President and Congress), and it would not put the United States in the position of single-handed action that might lead to attack by the aggressor. It is much more likely to keep the United States out of a major war than the "cast-iron" all-inclusive embargo of all belligerents, for this latter would almost surely prove untenable against the internal economic pressures that would develop after a year or so, and the propaganda for its abandonment would very likely unite with other propaganda making for entry into the war.

EUGENE STALEY

Chicago, January 15

100 Per Cent Organized

Dear Sirs: Milton S. Mayer, in The Nation for January 16, says that the Abendpost of Chicago is 100 per cent organized by the Chicago Newspaper Guild. I wish to call your attention to the fact that the Jewish daily press of Chicago has been 100 per cent organized for some fifteen years. The J. L. Peretz Writers' Union, a federal local (Local 17886), was, until the recent organization of the Guild, the only writers' union in existence. The membership includes not only Jewish writers but also several staff members of the Federationist, the official publication of the Chicago A. F. of L.

MORRIS SILBERT

Chicago, January 25

Dossier on John Toussaint Bernard

Dear Sirs: John Toussaint Bernard, the new Farmer-Laborite from Minnesota's Eighth Congressional District, the only Congressman to vote against the ban on help for Spain, lives at Eveleth, Minnesota. He is a Corsican and extremely proud of it. He was born on the Island of Corsica, March 6, 1893, which makes him not quite forty-four. He reached Eveleth in 1907. The public schools of France and Eveleth tutored him. He is by occupation both a city fireman and a miner. He is a member of the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union and a leader among them in his area. He is a World War veteran, having served twenty-five months in the army, of which fifteen were spent with the A. E. F. in France. He is married and has one child. He got 70,063 votes as against his Republican opponent's 54,067; his opponent was the then incumbent, William Pittenger.

During and since his successful campaign for Congress, he has told his constituents in his public speeches that it doesn't pay to trust any man too much and that, though they trust him, they had better keep checking up on him in his work at representing them here. He says that as a Congressman he proposes to be guided solely by his own mind and conscience, secure in the knowledge that he can always go back to being a miner if political independence brings him political misfortune.

W. L. G.

Washington, January 16

Six Lines' Worth

Dear Sirs: In your issue of December 19 Mr. Gunther writes, "Mr. Luce of Time invented 'snuggery' to describe Fort Belvedere."

"The New Merriam-Webster," latest of our great dictionaries, gives six lines of its valuable space to this word and quotes as authorities William De Morgan and H. Speakman.

D. SCUDDER

Claremont, Cal., January 20

Safety in the Air

Dear Sirs: The letter from John Miller, a former air pilot, in your issue of January 30 reminds me of a story which is told about the famous pianist Leopold Godowski. Mr. Godowski had arranged to make a trip by air. Shortly before he was scheduled to take off, the newspapers were full of the news of a fatal air crash, whereupon Mr. Godowski called the clerk in his hotel and asked him to cancel his reservation. When the clerk called the air line he met with a great reluctance to cancel the reservation and a long argument about the safety of air travel, including the number of miles flown without accident. The clerk was finally worn down and promised to convey these arguments to Mr. Godowski.

When Mr. Godowski remained unconvinced, the clerk, who by this time had been persuaded not only by the arguments of the air-line official but by his own eloquence, resorted to philosophy.

"Everybody has to die some time. And when your time comes you'll die, wherever you are."

"That may be," said Mr. Godowski, "but I see no reason why I should insist on being ten thousand feet up in the air when the pilot's time comes."

ALEXIS CORNFATHER

New York, January 30

Mt. Holyoke Steps Backward

Dear Sirs: This is the last year that we shall have a woman as president of Mt. Holyoke College. Many of us who have seen President Mary Woolley's published statement of her reasons for thinking that a woman should have been chosen as her successor wish to express our appreciation of her courage in saying with her usual farsighted wisdom that the action of the Mt. Holyoke trustees in giving this position to a man has meant "striking a blow at the advancement of women the seriousness of which can hardly be overestimated."

A New York newspaper recently discovered 124 men and 183 women of professorial rank in the seven leading women's colleges and commented editorially that "if women are able to fill the higher teaching and research positions, we should expect more women than we actually find." But those of us who have, over a long period of years, seen able women fail to get well-earned appointments solely because they are women would say that it is wonderful to find so many women actually holding full professorships, especially in view of the fact that two of these colleges—Barnard and Radcliffe—are organized under conditions which make opportunities for women of professorial rank almost negligible, and two other colleges in this group have men as presidents.

Mt. Holyoke, according to the same newspaper, has been "strongly and consistently" generous in its recognition of women, with 4 men and 46 women holding professorships. Wellesley, with a woman president, has also been generous to women, with a professorial staff of 13 men and 52 women. In Smith College, on the other hand, with a man president, the men on the faculty have received full professorships very much more frequently than the women, and the professorial staff includes 44 men and 26 women.

It is important, also, to remember the parsimonious grants of graduate scholarships, fellowships, and assistantships that go to women. After all, every college woman knows that research opportunities in the great centers of graduate study are largely for men—students. The great foundations, research councils, and research funds of all kinds are still administered by men, who make grants, again, almost exclusively to men. Chicago is perhaps the most liberal to women of all the great universities, but no one who looks at the situation here objectively can think that promising women students have equal opportunities with men. Miss Woolley has been the leader of the American Association of University Women, which has been struggling to support a handful of fellowships to try to meet the needs of the large number of able women who are practically excluded from the fellowships provided by the greatest universities. We shall miss Mt. Holyoke's leadership here.

Many of us mourn Mt. Holyoke's step backward. But women are used to disappointments, and we can take some comfort in the thought that education of any sort for women is still a very recent achievement. In my grandmother's day Thomas Wentworth Higginson delivered his well-known address, "Should Women Learn the Alphabet?" And during the last June Commencement season our Middle Western newspapers commended the University of Wisconsin for awarding a degree to a woman aged eighty-seven who had graduated seventy years earlier without a degree because the university did not grant degrees to women in 1866.

EDITH ABBOTT

Chicago, December 15

It's a Cold Winter

Dear Sirs: Contributions of money or warm clothing for men, women, and children are urgently needed by strikers in the mills owned by the Schuster-Hayward Woolen Company in East Douglas, Franklin, and Millbury, Massachusetts. The strike is being conducted by the United Textile Workers of America, affiliated with the C. I. O.

The strike has lasted twenty-two weeks, and in spite of repeated appeals, almost no help has been obtained from local relief agencies for the 1,700 people in need. Whether you are fat or thin, short or tall, your cast-off clothing will keep some striker or striker's children warm this cold winter, a winter made bitter by insufficient fuel.

Please express or mail your contribution to John Chupka, Depot Street, East Douglas, Massachusetts.

JOHN CHUPKA,

President, Local 2260
East Douglas, Mass., January 15

Correction

[In the article Profile of General Motors by Samuel Romer, which appeared in our issue of January 23, it was stated, through an error in transcribing proof corrections, that G. M. "in 1932, when it operated at an enormous deficit, paid dividends of $53,993,330." The corporation just about broke even in that year, earning only $164,979, but it did pay out practically $54,000,000 in common dividends. In 1921, when it operated at a loss of $38,680,770, it paid out $65,459,056.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

CONTRIBUTORS

VERA MICHELES DEAN is editor of the Foreign Policy Association's publications.

ELLEN McGRATH, formerly of the Portland Oregonian and now a writer for the Seattle weekly Argus, is secretary of the free-lance unit of the Seattle Newspaper Guild. J. P. DALLAS is a mechanical engineer and labor leader of Seattle.

ISIDOR FEINSTEIN is associate editor of the New York Post. His article is condensed from a chapter of a book on the Supreme Court which he now has in preparation.

ALEXANDER VIDAKOVIC is London correspondent of Politika, the leading journal of Belgrade.

MARIANNE MOORE, formerly an editor of the Dial, is the author of "Selected Poems."

MICHAEL SAYERS is dramatic critic for the London Criterion, a quarterly review of literature and the arts edited by T. S. Eliot.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN, author of a biography of Samuel Butler, frequently reviews books on historical subjects for the major weeklies.

LEE SIMONSON, author of "The Stage Is Set" and "Settings and Costumes of the Modern Stage," is a director of the Theater Guild and the designer of many of its most successful productions.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One Year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 13, 1937

NUMBER 7

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

169

EDITORIALS:

LAW AND THE SITDOWN

171

SPAIN IS THE KEY

172

PURGING THE SUPREME COURT

173

THANKS, GENERAL FRANCO

174

FLINT FACES CIVIL WAR by Charles R. Walker

175

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

176

CHICAGO IS BROKE by Milton S. Mayer

177

HOW CHIANG WAS CAPTURED

by Agnes Smedley

180

HIGH FINANCE AMONG FRIENDS

by Joseph Edmunds

182

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

185

BROUN'S PAGE

186

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

APPEALS FROM THE SUPREME COURT by Max Lerner

187

THE HUB OF THE WHEEL by Mark Van Doren

188

NEWMAN'S WAGNER: VOLUME II by Elbert Lenrow

189

"ALL QUIET" IN THE FAR EAST by Barbara Wertheim

190

A DISGRACED NAME by Christopher Lazare

191

SHORTER NOTICES

191

DRAMA: IF YOU HAVE TEARS by Joseph Wood Krutch

193

FILMS: CONSIDERING THE SOURCE

by Mark Van Doren

194

The Shape of Things

★

THERE HAS BEEN NO GREATER TENSION IN American constitutional history since the Dred Scott case than exists now between the President and the Supreme Court. Mr. Roosevelt's references to the age of the judges have doubtless hurt them grievously. But since they showed scant respect (within the Constitution) for the feelings of millions of workers and farmers whom their decisions injured, they should not be shocked if the people's representatives in turn show scant respect (within the Constitution) for their feelings. Mr. Roosevelt will have a hard fight, but he should win out. The Nation prints in an editorial on another page of this issue its analysis of the problem.

★

THE LOSS OF MALAGA BY THE LOYALISTS IS, of course, serious; but it is no more decisive than were the earlier losses of Irun, San Sebastian and Toledo. The rebels captured Toledo on September 28, but it took them until November 6 to negotiate the forty-four miles of flat country between that strategic city and Madrid, where they have been stuck ever since. It does not follow, therefore, that Alicante, Valencia, and Barcelona are in any more immediate danger of attack than they have been hitherto. The government military position is always more favorable than it appears on the map, and the final outcome of the civil war will be determined by the numerical strength and armaments of the opposing forces in months to come rather than by the line of demarcation between loyalist and insurgent territory today. The presence of at least 15,000—and probably more—Italian troops at Malaga is therefore the most menacing aspect of the situation, for it proves that, despite the Anglo-Italian "gentlemen's agreement" and perhaps because of the many-act farce called "non-intervention," Italy and Germany continue to pour into Spain all the soldiers and munitions they wish to send. Partly to offset these, the government can obtain valuable reinforcements in the shape of volunteers for the international brigades. It will also speed up the process, now well on its way, of organizing a disciplined Spanish army. The surrender of Toledo was the shock which accounts for the startlingly stubborn defense of Madrid, and the loss of Malaga may also have a salutary effect on the republic's military and internal political affairs.

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

THE INTRODUCTION OF A "CASH-AND-CARRY" neutrality bill by Senators Nye, Clark, Bone, and Vandenberg has clarified the basic issues in the neutrality controversy. In the belief that any trade with belligerents must ultimately involve the country in the same situation that it faced in 1917, the Nye bill would divest American citizens of all right and title to goods of any character shipped to belligerents in war time. The Pittman bill, on the other hand—which has the backing of the Administration—would permit trade in basic raw materials at the discretion of the President. Both measures would prohibit the export of munitions and implements of war and would impose an embargo on loans and credits, and both would ban travel by American citizens on ships of belligerent nations. The Nye bill assumes that peace is divisible; that the United States can be insulated from the fundamental economic and political forces which affect the remainder of the world. It also assumes that the profit-making propensities of important elements in the American population can suddenly be throttled on the outbreak of war. As it stands it would make war more certain by serving notice in advance that we shall deny even normal supplies to the democratic countries in their coming struggle with the fascist powers. There is no assurance that the Pittman measure can keep us out of war, but its flexibility may at least prevent us from digging the grave of American democracy at this time.

★

IN FAR-OFF SHENSI THE DRAMATIC EVENTS described elsewhere in this issue by Agnes Smedley seem rapidly to be approaching a climax. Angered by efforts on the part of the fascist clique to take advantage of the compromise settlement dictated by Chiang Kai-shek, the rank and file of the former Manchurian army recently mutinied and killed four officers who were accused of having sold out to the fascists. Large sections of Chang Hsueh-liang's former troops are reported to have joined the ranks of the Red Army, and others are likely to go over if the government does not make good its promises to resist Japan. There is every indication that Chiang Kai-shek himself has attempted to live up to the pledges that he gave on the occasion of his release from Sian, but that he is being sabotaged at every opportunity by the semi-fascist, pro-Japanese clique led by Ho Ying-chin, the War Minister. Letters from China tell of a veritable wave of terror in the cities under the control of this faction against the advocates of a People's Front. With the meeting of the plenary session of the Kuomintang scheduled for the middle of the month at Nanking, a showdown may be expected, though it is not at all certain that that hand-picked body will reflect the tremendous increase of sentiment throughout China for a common front against Japan.

★

FORTY THOUSAND MEN HAVE GONE BACK to work in the ports of the Pacific after a ninety-eight-day strike which was a masterpiece of orderliness and solidarity. The unions, which did not want the strike, came through without losing any of their gains of 1934—and in fact made further gains. The employers had let it be known that their purpose was to take back what they had been forced to yield in 1934, particularly union control of hiring halls. Their stand hurt the pocket-books but not the prestige of the unions, and they lost, according to one estimate, $700,000,000 worth of business. It is common knowledge that the San Francisco waterfront is a much more orderly place since the unions obtained a measure of control over hiring, which has always opened the way for serious abuses. When it is considered that the strikers made such modest demands as the eight-hour day, cash for overtime, and monthly wages ranging from less than $60 to $125 a month (for engineers), the cry of the employers about "union dictators" loses a good deal of its force. This strike may have convinced them that the union has come to stay—in which case we may expect a long peace. Meanwhile the conduct of the maritime strike by a democratic rank-and-file organization provides welcome evidence that trade unions can be successfully conducted on that basis.

★

RECENT HEAVY PURCHASES OF GRAIN BY Germany have been interpreted by the New York Times as indicating that the Reich has virtually overcome its food problem. As a basis for this it is suggested that the volume of foreign securities taken over by the Reichsbank from private sources, in accordance with a recent decree, has been unexpectedly large. Such an interpretation, however, appears to ignore both the facts of the foreign-exchange situation and the fundamentals of Nazi policy. If we accept the figures contained in Mr. Vidakovic's article in last week's Nation, the 170,000,000 marks which the Reichsbank is said to have sequestered abroad would be only a drop in the bucket in meeting the exchange crisis. And even if much more were obtained, the normal Nazi policy would be to spend it on the raw materials which are essential to its rearmament program. The grain purchases would seem to be not so much an indication of more plentiful foreign exchange as a reflection of growing anxiety over the domestic crisis.

★

THE SUPREME COURT HAS DENIED A WRIT OF certiorari to Vincent Ferrero and thus apparently ended his two-and-a-half-year fight to escape deportation to Fascist Italy. Ferrero entered the United States legally thirty-one years ago and has lived during this entire period in San Francisco. He has never been convicted of crime but is known to have leased a room to the editor of an anarchist paper. For this he is charged with being a "member of an organization which advocates the overthrow of the government by force and violence." Not satisfied with having condemned dozens of political refugees of this type to death in fascist countries in recent years, the anti-alien forces in Congress, under the leadership of Senator Reynolds, have launched a drive to deport all aliens on relief and to prohibit the employment of non-citizens by the government. A bill has also been introduced which would require the registration and fingerprinting of all unnaturalized foreign-born and cut the present low immigration quotas by 90 per cent. In defense of these un-American proposals it is argued that aliens take jobs away from American citizens and that their deportation will solve the problem of unemployment. It apparently matters not to Senator Reynolds that two-fifths of the 4,000,000 aliens in the country are more than fifty years of age and have given the greater part of their lives to constructive and relatively unremunerative work in the United States. Nor are men of this type likely to be moved by the fact that the majority of such aliens would be citizens today if the high fees and the educational requirements did not bar many men of limited economic opportunities.

✱

A POLL OF NATIONAL SENTIMENT ON THE General Motors sitdown taken by the Institute of Public Opinion showed 53 per cent in favor of the company. Our own poll taken in the nerve-center of public opinion, a pullman smoking car between Washington and New York, is, we believe, closer to reality. Of eight men, three had no opinion, three were for the strikers, one was judicially on the fence, and only one was for the company. "Lemme tell you, a whiff of tear gas would fix 'em," said a white-haired, pink-cheeked Elk in a camel's hair coat. "What I say is," said a gentleman of heavy jowls, "we gotta know what they want. They oughta tell the public what both sides is demanding and then we'll make up our minds." A younger man in a black hat, gently drunk but quite determined, announced that he knew enough already to take sides. "Absolutely with the strikers," he said. "Ab-so-lutely." Lined up on his side was a lawyer with a brief case, who added that it wasn't Sloan's fault, because he had to do what the du Ponts told him to. "Sure," said jowls. "Sloan's all right. I unnerstand he's definitely pro-labor, only he can't let on on account of the du Ponts." "Gentlemen," said the drunk one in a solemn tone that silenced the others, "compared to Sloan, Machiavelli was a punk."

✱

IN BRINGING ABOUT THE RETURN OF TOSCANINI to conduct a series of concerts over the radio with the N. B. C. symphony orchestra, David Sarnoff has made a coup for the Radio Corporation, which has long been locked in rivalry with C. B. S. over the presentation of musical programs of high standard. The engagement will cause misgivings in other quarters. It is not entirely a secret that Toscanini's resignation as conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra was the result of dissatisfaction on both sides. In spite of his musical, not to mention his box-office, preeminence the Maestro made demands as to salary, rehearsals, and programs that seemed excessive to the Philharmonic Board of Directors. N. B. C.'s offer gives Toscanini not only the free hand and lighter schedule he should have but also an opportunity for sweet revenge; the Philharmonic is certain to feel the competition of his programs.

Law and the Sitdown

THE reporter who asked Governor Murphy how it felt to be between an irresistible force and an immovable object was a realist. Our nominee for the immovable object is the du Pont-General Motors combination. Reliable information has it that Lewis started by asking recognition in all sixty-nine General Motors plants, then reduced his demands to twenty, and is willing to make further concessions. But as we go to press General Motors remains adamant and refuses to discuss the paramount issue of union recognition. One does not have to be clever to see through the hypocrisy of their concern for "the rights of workers who do not wish to belong to the Lewis union." Their real concern is to break industrial unionism before it has a chance to build a force that can challenge the force of corporate capitalism. It is the du Ponts, linking the motor magnates with the steelmasters, who are the real sitdowners in the strike.

If the struggle begins again, as is likely, they are counting of course on their massive economic strength and staying power. But they are counting even more on middle-class property-conscious public opinion. And they believe they hold the key to that by being seemingly on the side of law and order. Their company guards, deputy sheriffs, armed thugs, "Citizens' Alliance"—none of these would they dare use openly if it were not for their claim to be on the side of law and order.

"The strikers are occupying our property," say the Sloan lawyers. "True," says Judge Gadola. And he goes through the mumbo-jumbo of equity procedure, and issues an injunction and a writ of attachment. "But they won't budge," says Sheriff Thomas Wolcott, "and I need help." So he appeals to Governor Murphy to use the militia. "If I send these men against the strikers there will be a massacre," says Murphy. So the men remain sitting, and Murphy finds himself snowed under with threatening letters and demands for his impeachment. And the tragedy is that even some progressives have been ensnared by the cliché of property rights and thrown into consternation by Judge Gadola's injunction.

Actually the labor injunction must be viewed not as an abstract embodiment of even-handed justice but as a weapon in the struggle that American industry has been waging to keep labor from organizing—a weapon no different in essentials from tear gas or labor spies. To do otherwise is to uproot law from its social context, and you can no more do that than you can uproot a tree without its withering away. There is no valid legal basis in precedent for the labor injunction. In England, where it is relatively little used, it is regarded as an American growth. In America it began quite accidentally: after the panic of 1873 the railway properties were in the hands of court receiverships; the railroad strikes were therefore regarded as interferences with the courts, which proceeded to issue injunctions against them. Industry immediately saw the value of this device, and in the 1880's injunctions began to be issued quite distinct from receiverships, until in 1895 the Pullman strike was smashed by injunction. And the employers have continued ever since trying to smash by injunction every attempt to achieve collective bargaining through organization. The Norris-LaGuardia Act severely limits its use so far as the federal courts are concerned. That is why General Motors sought out a state judge. The more advanced states like Wisconsin and New York have passed their own anti-injunction laws, but Michigan is still in the Dark Ages in this respect.

If it is a question of property rights, the worker has a perfectly good property right in keeping his job under decent conditions of work. Nor can General Motors lay claim to a monopoly on law and order. One of the significant things about the sitdown is that, by making mass picketing unnecessary, it tends to eliminate violence from strikes. Or rather it puts the burden of violence on the employers. Governor Murphy has a triple function. He must execute the laws of the state; but he is also a conciliator in the strike; and upon him devolves the primary responsibility for avoiding bloodshed in Flint. The eviction of the strikers by force could not be accomplished without bloodshed. We must come to understand that the real guardians of law and order are those who wish to provide an orderly settlement of labor disputes through collective bargaining. The enemies of law and order are those who are willing to spill other people's blood in order to keep unionism from getting a foothold.

Spain Is the Key

EUROPE'S political commentators seem finally convinced that Germany is the greatest, if not the sole, danger to world peace. On January 19 Anthony Eden, speaking in the House of Commons, singled out Germany as the potential trouble-maker and appealed to it to make a contribution toward European peace. Even unsupported words might have persuaded those British elements which would be happily pro-German if Berlin gave them the slightest opportunity. But Hitler's vague and rambling address to the Reichstag simply confirmed the belief that Germany is resolved on self-imposed isolation and militant intransigence. If the nations of the world now realize that this is the predominant Nazi mood, some progress has been made. For then the source of danger is definitely labeled.

That, however, is not enough. The governments of Europe feel that they must take measures to prevent Germany from throwing the torch of war into an inflammable continent. These measures assume the form of vastly augmented armaments. England, France, and Russia, as well as the smaller countries which dread fascist aggression, are arming at a rate which makes even the rocket-like rearmament pace of 1935-36 seem like the movement of snails. Given Hitler's monomania, the haste of these governments is understandable. Yet clear political seeing and thinking might check fascist aggressive tendencies without imposing such back-breaking armament budgets upon the peoples. The key is Spain.

Spain is today the front line of the battle against German and Italian aggression. The Nazis and the Italians have been helping Franco with airplanes and other arms. They have made the rebel cause theirs. Franco has become the agent of Hitler even more than he is the tool of Mussolini. A victory for Franco would therefore be a triumph for Hitler, and would not only strengthen his hold on the German people but confirm in him the thought that in the future as in the past insolence, arrogance, and audacity are sufficient to overcome European democracies. Franco's success would encourage the Nazis to go and do likewise in Czechoslovakia, Danzig, the Polish Corridor, or anywhere else.

Defeated in Spain, Hitler would be sobered and checked. He would also be weakened by the expenditure on Franco of several hundred million dollars—this by a regime which complains that it lacks the money to buy raw materials for its plants and food for its undernourished population. The crushing of Franco would undermine Hitler's prestige, cripple his diplomacy, and give him trouble at home with a part of the civilian population and with his army chiefs. If the fascists are beaten in Spain, they are weakened everywhere.

The Caballero government can beat Hitler in Spain. At last, after numerous serious setbacks in Germany, Austria, and elsewhere, the anti-fascists have an excellent chance to win. Why, then, do not the Western democracies help the Spanish democrats to a victory? Valencia and Madrid cannot do it alone, for they must cope with foreign fascists as well as with their own rebels. The answer consists of an excuse and a partial explanation. England claims that it will not be ready to act until it is rearmed, and that will not be for eighteen months. Without England, France is disinclined to act. The supineness of the democracies can also be understood in the light of their fear or alleged fear that Madrid may be another Moscow if the government triumphs.

But Moscow's support of the loyalist cause does not imply a Communist Spain. Communism is not coming in Spain yet; the alignment of social forces would not permit it without another and perhaps even costlier civil war. The struggle today is between Spanish reactionaries supported by foreign fascists on the one hand and all the forces of democracy and revolution on the other. Moreover, Moscow is not anti-British or anti-French. The contrary is the case. A fascist Spain would be a graver menace to British and French national interests than even the Soviet Spain which they pretend to dread. Class bias in England and France, however, obstructs clear vision, and French and English policy in the Spanish conflict has therefore been of a halting, wavering character which plays into Franco's and Hitler's hands.

It remains, accordingly, for the world's anti-fascists and democrats, bound together not in governments but in trade unions, political parties, and liberal societies, to grant the Spanish republic just that measure of voluntary aid which, together with its own resources and Russia's help, will be sufficient to swamp Franco and drive his masters to cover. The supreme test of an anti-fascist today is not what he says but what he does for Spain.

Purging the Supreme Court

THERE can be little doubt that Mr. Roosevelt's attack on government by senility has been a brilliant tour de force. The right is dismayed by it. The left is confused. The country as a whole is puzzled and entertained. No wonder the President felt a bit prankish when he read the message at his press conference. But the question of the adequacy of the proposal remains. Our answer will probably remind the reader of the Scottish jury that came back with the verdict, "Not guilty, but don't do it again." We by no means feel that the President has chosen the best plan—but along with a better plan it deserves support. The proposal is in the form of a reorganization of the federal judiciary. It finds the cause of the delays in justice in the failure of judges to retire at seventy. It proposes that for each judge who refuses thus to retire an additional judge shall be appointed to his court, provided that the size of the Supreme Court shall not exceed fifteen. There is every indication that the President is giving the Supreme Court judges a dose of their own medicine—legalism. He adopts the Supreme Court's method of disguising important changes in state policy behind a screen of innocent-seeming legality. It is unjust to accuse the President of duplicity. He is doing exactly what Justice Roberts did when he talked elaborately of states' rights and killed the processing taxes. Two can play at that game, and in the realm of high strategy the Supreme Court has met its master.

But it is not all play. What the President is proposing is to dynamite the reactionary judges into retirement. To effect this he uses the most convenient handle—old age. But it is a handle to a very real grievance, in the lower federal courts as well as in the Supreme Court. There are four sitting members of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals. Their average age is seventy-seven and one-half years. It is Judge Buffington of this court, over eighty-one, who has been holding up the Pennsylvania Greyhound case, involving the Wagner Labor Act, since 1935. With respect to the Supreme Court, the Roosevelt luck, it must be remembered, has not operated. No appointments have fallen to him. He has had to sit by helplessly and watch the years accumulate and men decay. He now presents the tory judges with the bitterest hemlock cup any tory has had to quaff. Six of the present court are over seventy, only one of them—Brandeis—definitely a liberal. If they genuinely wish to keep the court from being "packed," they can hold the number down to nine by retiring. Whichever ones do not choose to retire must bear the responsibility of permanently increasing the court's number by that many.

One thing is clear. Mr. Roosevelt has been at least consistent. He has since the NRA decision steadily held that the Constitution needs no change if it is interpreted liberally. He has deftly sidestepped the three plans that have been most vigorously pushed—giving Congress the power to override the Supreme Court's veto, limiting the Supreme Court veto to at least a two-thirds' vote, giving Congress explicit power (by amendment) to regulate industry and agriculture. He has evidently considered that these measures would be at once too radical, since they would directly curb the judicial power or reestablish the supremacy of Congress, and also too dilatory, since each one might—by raising questions of constitutionality—have to be enacted finally as an amendment. His present plan does not touch the judicial power, and does not change the relation of the court to Congress. There can be no question of its constitutionality. It neither seeks to curb the court nor (despite the current impression) pack it, for if the judges retire there is no increase in numbers. Rather it purges the court by removing the infirm, and therefore (by a rough and imperfect logic) the least fit.

Where the President got the plan and why he should have sprung it just now are not entirely clear. Paul Ward points out in the Baltimore Sun that a similar technique was proposed in an 1869 bill in Grant's Administration, but failed of passage. The theory that he may have wished to influence favorably the Wagner Act cases seems untenable; if anything the proposal is calculated to freeze the judges into sheer immobility through rage. There may be some relation to the automobile strike and the power jam, as warnings to the business community that the President has trump cards which he is willing to play. But our own guess—and it is only a guess—is that Mr. Roosevelt wished to seize the occasion when public sentiment was ripe for action of some sort but before the movements for more radical curbs on the court had grown too strong to be stopped.

There are basic objections to the President's plan. It clearly does not meet the issue of the judicial power ■ an obstruction to democratic action. It does not go to the root of our judicial oligarchy, but by reorganizing it seeks rather to perpetuate it. There is a danger that, especially after the number of fifteen has been reached,

THE NATION'S CANDIDATES

1. Professor Felix Frankfurter—Harvard Law School.
2. Dean Lloyd Garrison—Wisconsin Law School.
3. Chairman J. Warren Madden—National Labor Relations Board.
4. Professor Walton H. Hamilton—Yale Law School and Social Security Board.
5. Robert H. Jackson—Assistant Attorney General.
6. Herman Oliphant—General Counsel U. S. Treasury.

■ justice will wait until he has a favorable President before resigning, thus creating a semi-hereditary caste. It can be used as effectively by ■ reactionary President ■ by a liberal, and ultimately it may produce simply a benchful of younger reactionaries—just ■ blind and stubborn in their fifties as in their seventies. Moreover, even a liberal President finds that there's many a slip between the nomination of ■ judge and his decisions: be it eternally remembered that McReynolds was appointed by Wilson. And certainly Mr. Roosevelt, judging from the names most mooted now, cannot be depended upon to choose more wisely than his predecessors.

Nevertheless, it is the task of progressives to support the measure—with an open-eyed awareness of its shortcomings. It will clear the blockage of New Deal legislation—at least for the immediate future. Meanwhile it will have delivered a blow to the sanctity of the Supreme Court from which the court will never wholly recover. If the court can be defeated once, it can be defeated again—and that is ■ lesson from which the people will profit. While logically the plan is leaky, psychologically it is sound. For talk as we may about educating the common man on the judicial power, the thing that sticks in his mind is that the men who exercise it are old men and therefore probably behind the times.

But for progressives to support this measure does not mean that they should stop there. Purging the Supreme Court does not preclude curbing it. A movement for a constitutional amendment must be launched now, so that when the rejuvenated court again grows ossified, we shall not have to fight the same battle all over again. But to refuse support to Mr. Roosevelt's measure and to hold out for "an amendment or nothing" is now—whatever it may have been before—playing into the hands of the reactionaries. They will inveigh against "packing" the court, grow hysterical about the supposed blow to the independence of the judiciary, and insist that the only method of change is through an amendment. Do not be trapped by them. The only thing they value in an amendment is the delay it would involve and their hope finally of being able to beat it. And without Roosevelt's support for an amendment, that hope would be a reality. With his support it is possible to push on the campaign for constitutional reform, viewing the present proposal merely as the opening gun in a battle that will be protracted and fiercely disputed. In such a battle what the progressives have chiefly to overcome is the myth of Supreme Court divinity. When they have conquered that, they can move on to achieve democracy.

Our program is, then, for progressives to support Roosevelt's proposal if he will support them in simultaneously launching an amendment. In that spirit we present, in the box on the previous page, our candidates for the six new posts. We have omitted members of the present Congress, since they would be barred until the end of their term from occupying posts they had themselves created. This has made it necessary to exclude several excellent choices. We submit the list with the earnest reminder that what value there is in the plan will be completely sacrificed unless genuine liberals are chosen.

Thanks, General Franco

OUR sincere gratitude goes out to General Franco. All anti-fascists are indebted to him for his self-revealing replies to the questions put to him by Roy W. Howard of the Scripps-Howard press.

"The new Spain" which Franco thinks he will establish after his expected victory "will progress along the lines of a totalitarian state." Moreover, as Franco understands Spain's "vigorous national characteristics," the Spanish people want no voice in their form of government. "Nor should the immediate concern of the citizens of Spain," he telegraphs, "be the choice of the particular regime that is to govern them." He declares that "our soldiers fight for liberty of conscience and respect of religious beliefs and for national traditions" in "Catholic Spain." "Our soldiers" are the Moslem Moors and the troops from Nazi Germany who respect neither liberty of conscience nor the Catholic church nor any other church. Franco, nevertheless, will not separate church from state. The dark tradition of illiteracy and bigotry must remain unbroken.

The Generalissimo, however, has decided views about certain aspects of the future. "The family and the workshop will be the basis for a new Spanish society." This is very exciting, very different, and very new. "Franco's Spain will banish class hatred"—just as in Germany. These are not vague promises. Things are already being done in the midst of a war that is taxing all of Franco's energies. "We are improving the housing conditions of the lower classes," he says. The General probably makes this claim with justice. He has killed off so many members of the lower classes who protested against his regime that those who remain undoubtedly have access to more living space. Franco does not have to tell us what he would do if he won. The Francos have been ruling Spain for centuries, and the result is a miserably poor, unprogressive economy, millions of peasants living in a permanent state of undernourishment.

Nevertheless, Franco is not so confident of victory as he once was. To be sure, he enjoys the "moral support lent to us by Germany and Italy." But these airplanes, submarines, cannons, machine-guns, and rifles are not sufficient to enable him to win, and he has been stuck at Madrid ever since the first week of November. "When do you expect the capture of Madrid?" Mr. Howard asked him. Franco did not answer. Franco has not been so reticent in the past. He prophesied that he would take the city on October 12 to commemorate the "Day of the Race," the day Columbus discovered America in Spanish ships. Then he publicly prophesied that he would enter the city on November 7, just to celebrate the Bolshevik revolution. Later he broadcast to the world that his Islamic soldiers would occupy Catholic Madrid on Christmas Day. The Spanish military love to announce long in advance what their armies are going to do. Suddenly now Franco is silent. We wonder whether he realizes at last that the stirring defense of Madrid by the loyalist forces and the harried civilians of the city is slowly but perceptibly destroying his military strength.

Flint Faces Civil War

BY CHARLES R. WALKER

Flint, February 8

JUDGE GADOLA has issued his ouster injunction and the tension which may break into civil war has reached a new high. Only cool heads in the union, plus superior numbers, plus telephoned warnings from Governor Murphy to the forces of "law and order," prevent the expected massacre.

"We'll stay in till they carry us out on stretchers," is the message sent out by the sitdowners in Fisher 2. "We'd rather die than give up." But will the 400 special police, deputized from Flint Alliance members, actually try to carry out the injunction at the zero hour of three o'clock? Will the 4,200 tin hats of the National Guard, equipped with howitzers, machine-guns, rifles, bayonets, and tear gas, be ordered to enforce the court order? The union does not know. But they mobilize hastily to resist. A picket line of 3,000 forms around Fisher 2, 10,000 citizens gather across the street, and a stream of cars from all over Michigan brings in automobile workers by the hundreds to reinforce the picket line. The picket line cheers while it marches, and when 500 women of the "Emergency Brigade" with red berets and "E. B." arm-bands join the line, the sitdowners at the windows of the huge plant go wild. What will happen? By nightfall Judge Gadola announces that until General Motors again goes to court to give evidence that the court order has been held in contempt, there will be no ouster. The sitdowners remain in possession. Flint breathes again.

At midnight a new crisis comes. The Flint Alliance people are furious; a mobilization of special police takes place; the Mayor openly tells newspapermen, "We are going down to the plants to shoot." The union mobilizes again on the streets. Finally a conference between union heads and the chief of police results in an agreement that if the chief will demobilize the deputies, the union will send the pickets home.

The pact lasts till the next day, when the police break it by swearing in 600 new deputies, bringing the number to 1,000. The city's temperature rises, and General Motors gets a writ from the court for the arrest of the union leaders. Sheriff Wolcott frantically tries to telephone Governor Murphy to ask that the National Guard be permitted to assist him in ousting the sitdowners. The union sends word to the sitdowners in all three plants: "Be calm, probably nothing will happen, but be prepared." Wives, sweethearts, and mothers hold a dance in a snow storm in front of Fisher 2.

I try to take the temperature of opposing forces.

A National Guard captain says to me, "If the Governor doesn't let the National Guard evict the strikers all government is at an end! We are under terrific pressure," he says, "the 'good' citizens of Flint can't be held under much longer." In a drugstore I talk to three guardsmen. "We have faith in Governor Murphy; he'll never order us to put out the strikers. And if he does, we'll shoot over their heads; we're automobile workers too." But in the big houses on Du Pont Avenue there is plenty of pressure for military eviction. George Boysen has just announced that Governor Murphy should be impeached. The owner of the drugstore has another view. "This whole block of stores," he announces proudly, "is solid for the union. Hell," he says, "I never got anything out of G. M. dividends; a union victory is better for my business."

In the three plants held by the sitdowners morale has been high all week. In Plant 4 (Chevrolet) heat and electricity have been turned on and off intermittently by the company in an apparent effort "peacefully" to evacuate the plant. The company sends foremen to the wives of sitdowners urging them to send "come home" messages to their husbands. But only a handful have left. In Fisher 2 the original Flint sitdowners are thoroughly cheerful. Since their battle with vigilantes on Monday food has been coming in regularly; the men have three radios, and by knocking the bottoms out of two wastebaskets and tying them to stanchions in a storeroom, they have made themselves a basket-ball court. Both plants are guarded by howitzers and machine-guns and detachments of bayonet-armed guardsmen. In Fisher 1 I attend a night meeting of all the sitdowners. They have organized themselves in preparation for a siege. They declare that they are ready to "get shot" if General Motors gives the signal for enforcing the court order.

Unquestionably the distinguishing feature of the Flint strike, apart from the heroic determination of the sitdowners, is the almost military control and discipline that prevail among the strikers in the whole area. Union headquarters in the Pengelly building are thoroughly departmentalized into strike strategy, commissary, women's auxiliary, transportation, publicity, and other committees. Inside the plants a committee governs through a corps of plant stewards with from twenty-five to fifty men under each. Machinery in the plants is scrupulously protected, and the whole plant is cleaned once a day. Internal police keep order, and there are sentinels on the roof. A stream of workers signs up daily with the union in the Pengelly building. Since the first sitdowner sat, membership has doubled in the Flint area. But there are still thousands of non-unionists.

Through the endless negotiations it is Flint which has been the chief threat to Knudsen's position, the chief weapon in Lewis's arsenal, and incidentally the bomb on which Governor Murphy has been manfully sitting for more than a week. Will it explode?

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Presenting John P. Frey

Washington, February 7

WHILE the rest of the nation mulls over the President's move to dodge the constitutional-reform issue by padding the Supreme Court, let's take up the case of John P. Frey, chief backbiter of the American labor movement at the moment. Frey has just issued a public statement attacking the sitdown-strike technique as "made in Moscow." Before that he successfully used his influence to get the Cleveland Federation of Labor to rescind its resolution indorsing the C. I. O. strike at local General Motors plants. And before that he had engineered a demand by metal and building-trades unions that General Motors reopen its plants and refuse to deal with the C. I. O. "outlaws."

All these things have been of invaluable aid to labor's enemies in creating the idea that the American labor movement's rebirth in the General Motors strike was and is illegitimate. They have been of aid solely because they bore the stamp of a supposedly responsible and high-minded labor leader, the president of the A. F. of L.'s metal-trades department. It is important, therefore, to consider precisely what kind of man Frey is, and we may as well begin that consideration by reporting that among labor lobbyists here—both A. F. of L. and C. I. O.—he commonly is referred to as the liaison officer between the A. F. of L. and Army Intelligence. Neither Frey nor the War Department will confirm this report, of course, and the War Department records show simply that he has been since 1928 a lieutenant colonel in the Reserve Corps and only recently was retired to the "inactive" list because of his age.

The report itself may help to explain why Colonel Frey not long ago boasted to some newspapermen that he sees copies of all the confidential correspondence passing between Communist leaders in this country and abroad. It may also explain why the La Follette committee—in exposing the National Metal Trades Association as a far-flung espionage agency engaged, with the aid of some of Frey's subordinates, in sabotaging the very unions Frey is supposed to lead—was unable to obtain any helpful data from Frey but was offered by him, instead, a mass of alleged evidence showing Communist "infiltration" of the trade unions. Once a year he struts off to the War College to teach the soldiers about organized labor; and those in his audience who are attached to Army Intelligence go on helping the labor-espionage agencies with their work, while the War Department tightens up its plans to conscript labor during the next war.

Frey, if he were not actually dangerous, and potentially more so, would be a laugh-provoking spectacle. An inherently stupid man, he is full of pretensions to scholarship. But even his appearance stirs the risibilities, especially when, as so frequently happens, he dons his officer's uniform and goes on parade. He is almost Negroid in appearance but unbearably Aryan in his race pride. In recent years he has taken to boasting that his forbears were Prussians and that his name is, by rights, von Frey. He was born sixty-six years ago at Mankato, Minnesota, of a German father and a French mother. During the World War he emphasized his French ancestry and efficiently served as Gompers's French interpreter overseas. In the years immediately after the war he used to denounce anything distasteful to himself and the rest of the A. F. of L. hierarchy as "made in Germany," just as today he denounces the sitdown strike as "made in Moscow." Until recently unemployment insurance in Colonel Frey's opinion was "made in Moscow," and he publicly reviled it as a scheme destined to destroy the labor movement. At the 1920 A. F. of L. convention at Montreal he dubbed the stand of the railroad brotherhoods for public ownership as "made in Germany" and helped Gompers and Matt Woll to keep the convention from indorsing the brotherhoods' position.

He belongs to the Molders' Union, which gave us Tom Mooney, and rose to his present eminence via the editorship of the Molders' Journal, which he held from 1903 to 1927. Frey joined his colleagues on the union's executive board in suppressing the progressive inclinations of the rank and file and thus reducing the union to its present size and impotence. This man who now assails the sitdown strike as a threat to democratic process in trade unionism has all his life been engaged in stifling rank-and-file efforts and crushing democracy out of the labor movement. In 1924 rank-and-file delegates to the Molders' Union convention put over resolutions calling for a third party and for amalgamation in the metal trades, that is, industrial unionization. The union's delegates to the A. F. of L. convention that year were instructed to present and fight for the adoption of similar resolutions by the federation. Frey and the rest of the salaried officers of the union were its delegates to the A. F. of L. convention. That delegation, with Frey taking a leading part, decided that the delegates to the Molders' Union convention did not know what the rank-and-file membership wanted and that the resolutions they had adopted were unwise and unsound. They proceeded to oppose instead of support the position which their own convention had taken by democratic process. The "dictatorship by militant minorities," which Frey discovers and assails in the General Motors sitdown strike was not distasteful to him in 1924.

It was this same Frey who "prosecuted" the C. I. O.

unions in the proceedings before the A. F. of L. executive council last year that resulted in their suspension from the federation. He played a similar role at the A. F. of L. convention and became so overwrought that he had to leave for a European rest cure. John L. Lewis recently remarked that he never thought of Frey without recalling the Buffalo convention of the A. F. of L. when, as Frey was making a speech, Jim Fitzpatrick, of Actors' Equity, leaned over and said to Lewis, "I've been coming to these conventions for twenty years and all I've ever seen that man [Frey] do is constantly try to correct the mistakes of God." Frey brought to the ouster proceedings a vast venom and a stupefying array of irrelevancies. It took hours for Frey to get to the point, for it was essential to his assumed role as the great scholar of the American labor movement that he go back to the beginnings of history for his opening statement and work up gradually to date.

Frey's scholarly pose is almost pure fake. Nevertheless, it is taken seriously by a great number of American leaders who regard him as a Jesuit among them and respect him unutterably for it. It even causes him to be called "Dr. Frey" by the swart and oily Matt Woll. Frey's reputation as a scholar is rooted almost entirely in the fact that he has read Gibbons's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." He awes the bullnecks who cluster around him at labor conventions with talk of ancient Rome. As proof that he is an authority on the subject he shows them snapshots of ruins that he himself took while on a visit to Rome some years ago. His other badge of scholarship is a book he wrote in 1922 on the history of labor injunctions. Only Frey could conceive so deadly dull a book on the subject; it would still be gathering dust in the publisher's bins if Frey's friends at the top of the A. F. of L. had not passed out word that it was a good book for any labor leader to have who aspired to higher things.

At the moment Frey himself is unable to devote his full time to deploring the G. M. sitdown strike because he is having to give part of it to assisting J. P. Morgan, Myron Taylor, Charles Schwab, E. T. Weir, and the rest of the steel barons in carrying forward an employers' sitdown strike. The steel manufacturers have decided not to bid on steel contracts offered by the Navy Department unless they can escape the forty-hour week imposed on all federal contractors by the Walsh-Healey bill. As a result of their strike the Navy Department is about to have to stop work on two submarines building at its Portsmouth yards and probably will have to stop work on other war craft. The navy has joined with the steel masters in bringing pressure on the Labor Department for an "emergency" exemption from the Walsh-Healey bill and, meeting no success there, has now turned to Frey and his metal trades with a plea that unless they help get an exemption out of the Labor Department 30,000 machinists will have to be laid off by the navy. Frey has agreed to a conference on the matter here a few days hence and has asked that there be no public hearing and that the negotiations take place in secret. It would never occur to him, or to the Navy Department either, that if an "emergency" that endangers the national security exists, the time has come for the government to take over the mills and make its own steel, instead of yielding to the steel barons, who actually are intent only on resisting the workers in their fight for unionization.

Chicago Is Broke

BY MILTON S. MAYER

Chicago, February 3

IN THE midst of the greatest era of prosperity this country has ever known since the last one, the city of Chicago is going broke. It cannot meet its obligations. Day after tomorrow is pay day for its 13,000 teachers, but there will be no pay.

Two months ago the Civic Federation stated that "financial chaos" was imminent unless tax collections improved. One month ago Mayor Kelly said that the city would not be able to meet its pay roll "by summer" unless tax collections improved. Day before yesterday was the deadline for the second instalment of the 1935 real-estate taxes—Chicago lives two years ahead of its income—and, with tax collections rising in every other large city, the receipts were the poorest in three years, the levy of $139,000,000 having been only 56 per cent collected.

Cook County's uncollected taxes for 1928-34 total $355,000,000, and if it were not for $22,000,000 in taxes paid through HOLC and RFC loans—not to mention $136,000,000 poured into improvements, maintenance, and dole by the PWA and the WPA—the city would be not only broke but boarded up. (In 1934 New York, with a lower tax rate than Chicago, spent $98,700,000 of its own funds for relief, while Chicago spent $1,100,000.) Dun and Bradstreet places Chicago's total tax delinquency at 35 per cent—the highest in the country by almost 10 per cent. Of the $355,000,000 "uncollected," more than $50,000,000 of real-estate taxes has been taken off the books by court action; $180,000,000 is represented by that standing joke, the personal-property tax. Tax experts agree that $150,000,000 may ultimately be realized on the "uncollected" $355,000,000.

But this $355,000,000 has been spent, every cent of it. How does a city spend $355,000,000 it hasn't got—more than half of which it will never get? That's easy. When the constitutional limit on the bonded debt has been reached—and Chicago has long since passed that stage—the city obtains operating funds by selling to the banks warrants against future taxes. There are $150,000,000 in tax warrants outstanding at the present time, bearing interest as high as 6 per cent.

Back in the early thirties the banks grabbed the warrants right up to 75 per cent of the levy—the limit allowed each governmental unit. Since then they have refused to finance more than 60 per cent of the budget in this way. Then what does the city do? Why, it turns to the $67,000,000 traction fund, which has been built up out of the straphangers' nickels for the past thirty years against that glorious vision of "eventual" municipal ownership. Big Bill Thompson discovered what could be done with $67,000,000 lying around loose; his successors emulated him, until today the traction fund consists of $1,500,000 in cash and $65,500,000 in—guess what?—tax warrants, sold by the city to the city.

The tax-spending bodies of Cook County will have to sell warrants against taxes collectible two years from now to finance their 1937 budgets. How far will the banks gamble, with current tax collections falling steadily and collections for the past seven years 35 per cent delinquent? Banks don't gamble, not when they have a city by the throat. A few weeks ago an out-of-town sucker finding himself stuck with warrants bearing high serial numbers went to court, and Federal Judge Wilkerson held that all warrants would have to be paid off pro rata, instead of by serial number. Thus the banks, which hold all the low serial numbers, lost their preferred standing and, it may be assumed, some of their appetite for tax warrants. Last year, when the city tried to issue bonds to pay off warrants—oh, we've tried everything in this town—the state Supreme Court said no, and the warrant business took another on the chin.

The school board, the most notoriously and the most consistently broke of the six major tax-spending units in the county, still has 1935 and 1936 tax warrants unsold. Until the state legislature and the city council approve the board's 1937 levy—all three bodies are adjuncts of the Kelly-Nash machine, but the legal mechanics of approval take time—the board can't issue any 1937 warrants. Maybe, says Board President McCahey, the first or second pay roll in March will be met. Well, the teachers went payless for eighteen months before the RFC took a $22,000,000 mortgage on the school board's property. Mr. McCahey warns the public that unless the board gets the $45,000,000 it is asking for, teachers' salaries, already reduced 23.5 per cent, will have to be cut, the school year curtailed, and the teacher load probably increased.

Chicago is two years behind on its bills and getting farther behind all the time. It has to pay a premium of from 10 per cent to 15 per cent on its purchases. Judgments against the city date back to 1931 and are selling as low as 30 cents on the dollar. Bonds have been sold to meet operating expenses. Pay rolls have been suspended and services reduced. Chicago's adjusted tax rate of $35.15—New York's is $24.84—is second only to Boston's $38.00 and is going up fast.

Where will it end? The answer is that it won't end.

Here is a corporation that is bankrupt by every standard of corporate practice. But the city, the legal boys tell us, "is a sovereign which cannot abdicate." What can its creditors do? They can get judgments, but they can't sell the City Hall to satisfy the judgments. They can't throw the city into bankruptcy. That door was recently closed by the United States Supreme Court. "The only remedy," Justice Cardozo said in his minority opinion, "was a mandamus whereby the debtor was commanded to tax and tax again. The command was mere futility when the tax values were exhausted. . . . Municipalities and creditors have been caught in a vise from which it is impossible to let them out."

Of course there are reasons—superficial reasons—why Chicagoans don't pay their taxes. One is the "relief" given small home-owners by executive or judicial fiat reducing tax bills. That happens in no other city; it has happened twice in Chicago in the past few years, on both occasions at the behest of the local Hearst papers in their customary false-face as the little fellow's friend. In 1933 the state tax commission reduced the valuations on small homes and flat buildings by 15 per cent, over the protest of its one non-political member, Professor Simeon Leland. Then County Judge Jarecki heard the clarion call of justice—or was it the voters?—and ordered a 7½ per cent reduction in the tax bills on 400,000 small homes. One of the "remedies" proposed in the present crisis is the remission of penalties—aggregating as much as the taxes themselves on the oldest bills—in exchange for immediate payment.

The effect of these measures is inescapable. Every taxpayer who didn't come in for "relief" last time withholds his taxes in the hope that if his category becomes sufficiently delinquent some far-sighted office-holder will grant him "relief," too. The taxpayers of Chicago have come to understand that there has been no real effort to collect taxes. State's Attorney Courtney, the local J. Edgar Hoover, was too busy flushing Touhys to prosecute voters (who happened to be taxpayers) or impanel a grand jury to investigate tax-fixing. Back in 1932 chance revealed that the tax commission had forgotten to assess the capital stock of the Pullman Company, one of the largest corporations in the county.

Illegal levies have furnished another incentive to tax-resistance. Budgets have been padded year after year to create collateral for tax-warrant loans. During the re-assessment of 1928 there were no tax bills payable for twenty-six months. The new assessment equalized the most outrageous of the disparities—previous valuations had run all the way from 13.9 per cent to 74.1 per cent of the sales value—but when the accumulated bills were sent out, in 1930, the depression was on and the taxpayers were critical. There were lawyers in plenty to point out illegalities for them, and tax objections were filed by the thousand. (Objections for 1935, now being filed, are expected to run to 40 or 50 per cent of the total levy.) The religious went on paying the excessive bills; the wise guys objected and received reductions.

Then the county treasury's antiquated bookkeeping system collapsed. The tax books had been kept for individual years, without any indication of accumulated delinquency. With four or five years' taxes delinquent and litigation on hundreds of thousands of individual bills in various stages of court proceedings, the county treasurer—the choice of the local Tammany—just gave up. Fraud was rampant. Tax payments were recorded which were never made. A recent examination preparatory to the installation of modern bookkeeping (now that both horse and barn have been stolen) revealed that no court orders overruling objections and opening the way to tax sales or tax receiverships had been placed on the books since 1928. All this not only discouraged taxpaying; it made it impossible to initiate a tax-collecting campaign. No one knows today how much, within millions of dollars, is owing the city; how much, within hundreds of dollars, each piece of delinquent property owes; how much, within tens of millions, has been washed off the books by reductions and remissions.

More than half the "uncollected" taxes are on personal property—$180,000,000, or 44.3 per cent of the total personal-property levies for 1928-34. The creaking Illinois constitution provides for uniform taxation of real and personal property. The inequity of the latter tax has been universally recognized since Governor Altgeld pointed it out in 1894.

The personal-property assessor is without the power of search. He cannot take sworn testimony. And he is supposed to ascertain not only the value of tangible personal property but of intangibles—stocks, bonds, bank accounts. The only thing he can do is guess. A gentleman renting a desk in a public stenographer's office for $5 a month and calling himself the Wilson Finance Company is assessed at $55,555.55. The firm of Dowdle Brothers, one of the city's biggest contractors, is assessed at $278.

And now we get to the root of Chicago's recurring crises. Only an amendment to the state constitution will permit the substitution of some source of revenue more equitable and more collectible than the personal-property tax. The obvious resort is a state income tax, and that is what the men who really run the machine that appears to run Chicago and Illinois will not permit. That is where "State Street"—the business interests—fits into the picture of the political organization whose petty speculations cost the wealthy a few dollars a year in the present types of taxes, in campaign contributions, and in outright graft. Aside from any other coincidence of interests—and there are many—the business leaders support the political system that supports the present tax system.

That is why the movement for a city manager sponsored by the City Club and the Chicago Daily News cannot obtain the support of the city's commercial and industrial giants and their "Civic Federations" and "Citizens' Committees on Public Expenditures." The present governor, Horner, "demanded" a revenue amendment to the state constitution when he ran for governor in 1932 and for reelection in 1936. Between elections the present constitution seems to suit him.

Chicago is ripe for reform. One scandal after another has broken on the heads of the bosses. The sins of the Kelly-Nash machine have brought Chicago's political morality to an all-time low. The taxpayers will take it out on those boodlers, by golly; they won't pay their taxes; they'll throw them out of office. But when the election comes along, everybody is for Roosevelt and Roosevelt is for everybody, and Ickes sees the light and comes through with an Outer Drive Bridge, and the Kelly-Nash New Deal sweeps every office in the county. And the taxpayers are going to pay their taxes besides, because they are the stockholders in a monopoly that can assess the stockholders without limit.

The present crisis will doubtless be "relieved." Silas Strawn's Citizens' Committee relieved the crisis of 1930 with a sales drive for high-interest tax warrants and a $75,000,000 revolving cash fund that revolved once and stopped. There will be more of this kind of relief, and Chicago will come through—on the bankers' terms. New laws for the forfeiture of delinquent property and the adjudication of tax levies before the bills go out will be passed. The legislature will grant the city new licensing powers at once, because the electricians' union, after giving the city a taste of three hours' darkness the other night, is going to go on a real strike unless pay reductions are restored, and most of the rest of the employees are suing the city besides. "If restorations were made to all city employees, it would amount to $2,800,000," said Mayor Kelly, "and the city just hasn't got it."

The city would have it if there weren't any Mayor Kelly and if there weren't "civic leaders" who support the system that produced him. The city would have it if the taxpayers didn't believe—about 25 per cent correctly—that "it all goes for graft anyway." The city would have it if it found out why a total of $30 was collected in 1935 on the barber-shop license fee running from $5 to $50 per shop. The city would have it if the Chicago Tribune, wringing its hands over "the tax muddle," wanted to tell the real instead of the superficial reasons why people don't pay their taxes.

"There is much to indicate that in the field of political intelligence the people of Chicago are subnormal," Professor Herbert D. Simpson wrote in his book, "Tax Racket and Tax Reform." The city-manager campaign gives the people of Chicago an opportunity to repudiate their reputation and to break the iron network of racial and national subcommunities which provides the key to their political impotence. But before Chicago can vote on city management the right to change its charter must be granted by the legislature.

When the Kelly-Nash "regular Democratic" organization tried, unsuccessfully, to dump Horner in the gubernatorial primary last spring, the Governor threw his own strength to the Republican side of the house and passed the permanent registration law. "It will cost us 200,000 votes," said National Committeeman Pat Nash publicly. Horner hasn't forgotten last spring. If he breaks with the machine on the city-manager legislation he will win the support of the News—which, even under Frank Knox, is still Chicago's only independent newspaper. The machine, its grip on the state restored by the last election, is confident that Horner won't dare rebel. But bedfellows have been known to make strange politics.

How Chiang Was Captured

BY AGNES SMEDLEY

Sianfu, December 15, 1936

THE uprising in Sianfu and throughout China's Northwest is a logical sequence to the events of the past year. The growing hostility of the Chinese people to what is known as Nanking's "surrender policy" with respect to Japan has extended to Chinese soldiers and officers in every part of the country, even including many under the command of General Chiang Kai-shek. One of the first armies so affected was the Tungpei, or North-eastern Army, under the command of Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang. The Twenty-ninth Route Army in Hopei is also imbued with this hostility, as are the troops in Kwangsi and those of Yang Fu-cheng in Sianfu. Months ago General Yang Fu-cheng and Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang welcomed student delegates from Peiping and called mass-meetings of their soldiers to hear the message of the National Salvation movement, which appeals to people of every class willing to fight Japanese imperialism. General Chiang Kai-shek, in the attempt to crush this rising tide of criticism and hostility, not only passed his special emergency laws, but whipped students in the streets, and kidnapped and arrested students, professors, and writers. He also sent Blue Shirt units through China to penetrate all National Salvation groups and hold the opposition in check by spreading the rumor that the Nanking armies would fight the Japanese within three months.

During the past year Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang, pressed by the officers and men of his army, has asked the Japanese-German alliance and the German and Italian recognition of Manchoukuo.

Then came the Japanese invasion of Suiyuan and the armed occupation of Tsingtao. All propaganda to the contrary, none but General Fu Tso-yi's troops are fighting in Suiyuan; General Chiang has only three divisions in Shansi and Suiyuan, and these are in the rear. Not one Nanking plane has attempted to drive off the Japanese bombers. In late October Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang sent urgent telegrams to General Chiang Kai-shek and to General Chen Cheng, Chiang's ablest military commander, asking for a new policy of resistance to the Japanese and for a united front which would include the anti-Japanese Red Army. He was refused. Later he met General Chiang and argued for defense against the Japanese. General Chiang refused and made threats. Marshal Chang continued to obey General Chiang's orders in public. In a lecture at the military school in Sianfu he said that the Tungpei Army must continue to fight the Red Army, which was the nearest and most dangerous enemy. The Japanese, he said, were not the chief enemy. After the lecture the student-commanders openly criticized this policy, saying it meant surrender to Japanese imperialism. On the following day men rose in class to oppose it. Still obeying General Chiang, Marshal Chang dismissed these men from the school. At the same time students, soldiers, and even officers were canvassing every household in Sianfu collecting money for the Suiyuan troops. This action had led in other cities to the arrest of students, but in Sianfu the authorities did not dare arrest them.

Now Marshal Chang in a long and urgent letter made another appeal to General Chiang, reminding him of his promise at the last Kuomintang Congress that he would fight if the Japanese took one more inch of Chinese territory. "I and all my officers and men have obeyed you faithfully for years," wrote Chang, "believing that you would lead us against the Japanese. You have not done so. However, it is not too late. We now demand that you give us the right and opportunity to drive out the Japanese. In any case, I must tell you that I cannot control my army much longer." In reply to this ultimatum General Chiang asked the Marshal to meet him in Loyang. Nothing came of this meeting except a promise by General Chiang to come to Sianfu and meet the Tungpei commanders in person.

Behind the scenes, however, many events had taken place. The Tungpei troops had had enough of fighting their own countrymen in the Chinese Red Army. They had suffered serious defeats and refused to try any longer to do what General Chiang with a million men had been unable to accomplish in eight years of ceaseless warfare. Moreover, the Red Army was appealing to them to more than once for authority to move against the Japanese. After the formation of the People's Front in Spain and particularly in France, agitation arose for a Chinese People's Front to fight China's chief enemy, Japanese imperialism. But General Chiang and his followers looked rather to Fascist Germany and Italy as examples, and the true face of fascism was revealed to China in form a common front against the Japanese and had proved its sincerity by many compromises in tactics. General Chiang, knowing that a truce had existed for months, sent three of his best-trained and best-equipped divisions into Kansu under General Hu Chung-nan, Blue Shirt chief. General Hu boasted to Marshal Chang that he would annihilate the "red remnants," but Marshal Chang sagely remarked that this was a big boast. Then, said General Hu, he would so weaken them that they could be destroyed gradually. Marshal Chang replied, "Beware, lest it is you who are so weakened." General Hu marched against the reds and in the three weeks preceding November 18 advanced eighty li into Red Army territory. The reds slowly retreated. Then on November 18, and again on the twenty-first, they swooped down, surrounded two brigades of Hu's crack division, and captured them with all their equipment. Some of the captives were sent back to Papa Hu to tell the other troops what had happened. The others were disarmed and read a lecture on the folly of Chinese fighting Chinese at such a time. Meanwhile the rest of the invading army had retreated, this time covering the eighty li in three days. To General Hu, Marshal Chang sent a telegram saying in effect, "I told you so!"

A short while before, Marshal Chang had organized a special military training school for students in Sianfu, which was attended by about a hundred students from the North. General Chiang objected to this school and wired Marshal Chang that he had information that many of the students were Communists. Marshal Chang replied that he took any man who loved his country and was willing to fight for it, and added, "From whom did you get your report? I ask because my representatives in Peiping got the same news from the Japanese. I suggest that you do not believe everything the Japanese say."

The Generalissimo kept his promise made at Loyang and on December 7 came to Sianfu to consult with the Tungpei commanders, who had agreed with the commanders of General Yang Fu-cheng to ask for permission to move against the Japanese at once. General Chiang arrived in Sianfu with a large retinue. With his secretary, Chen Ta-chen, his nephew, Chiang Hsiao-hsien, and his bodyguard he lived in the hotel-temple at Lintung some twenty or thirty miles northwest of the city. The others lived in the Sianfu guest house. The Generalissimo would not meet the Tungpei and Yang Fu-cheng commanders at a general conference. Instead, he began his famous tactics of splitting them into cliques and trying his "silver bullets" on them. Admitted to his presence one at a time, to a man they answered him in phrases like these: "My mother, General Chiang, was killed by the Japanese; my two brothers and my sisters were slaughtered." "My native land is occupied by the Japanese." "My father's body, slit with Japanese bayonets, remains unburied in my native village." "Your word we must obey, Generalissimo, and we have done so up to today. But we refuse longer to fight our own people."

To which General Chiang replied, "You have one duty before you—to destroy the reds."

On December 9 an incident occurred that did little to improve the situation. On that day, an anniversary of the student movement, thousands of students, large and small, marched through the streets of Sianfu in support of the demand that armies be sent to the defense of Suiyuan and Shantung. The police force of Sianfu is under the control of Hsiao Li-tze, one of General Chiang's chief officials and civil governor of Shensi. General Chiang ordered him to break up the student demonstration and not allow them to march to Lintung to petition him. As the students marched toward Lintung, the police fired, seriously wounding two little boys, twelve and thirteen years old. This incident sent Marshal Chang and a number of other leaders to Lintung in angry protest. They had already demanded the release of the seven National Salvation leaders in Shanghai, and had met with a categorical refusal, General Chiang stating definitely at this time that he was opposed to a People's Front.

The tense atmosphere in Sianfu was aggravated by the presence of the Blue Shirts, to whom General Chiang Kai-shek had handed a list of suspects to be arrested. The Blue Shirts were armed, and it was known that they were planning a coup. Marshal Chang, however, knew every Blue Shirt in the city, he knew of the blacklist, and men went into hiding. On the night of December 11 the commanders of the Tungpei Army conferred with those of Yang Fu-cheng's army. The next morning they struck with lightning rapidity; if they had not done so, their soldiers might have acted without them. General Chiang's headquarters at Lintung were surrounded at dawn. The first man captured was General Chiang's nephew, Chiang Hsiao-hsien, chief of the Blue Shirts. When the soldiers learned who he was, they shot him to death on the spot. General Chiang escaped in his nightshirt, but only one of his bodyguard would go with him. This lone protector accompanied him for a short distance, then thought better of it, and turned back to inform the Tungpei men of General Chiang's whereabouts. Soon the General was captured with his staff.

The Sian guest house was occupied by Yang Fu-cheng's troops at dawn and all the inmates captured. General Hsiao Li-tze, who had ordered the firing on the students, was taken, along with practically every one of his officials. His Bureaus of Public Safety were all occupied and their chiefs taken prisoner. All the Blue Shirt headquarters, including their "secret" radio stations, were seized with their staffs and documents. One of Chiang's airplanes which landed in Sian to investigate was also captured. The 100 airplanes under General Chiang's command in Sianfu, ostensibly sent to fight the Japanese but in reality to bomb the Red Army, were all captured. In Sianfu the feeling was so bitter that one Chinese official in the General's party was shot because he looked Japanese.

Throughout Kansu these acts were duplicated. Tungpei troops attacked General Hu Chung-nan's troops, capturing one brigade outright in Lanchow. On all fronts there was open fraternization between the Tungpei soldiers and the Chinese Red Army. Martial law reigned in Sianfu for one day only; then shops were opened and life went on as before. A new administration was set up on the basis of the following eight points, which were outlined in a proclamation: (1) Reorganization of the Nanking government to include anti-Japanese representatives from all parties, groups, and organizations throughout the country; (2) the ending of civil war; (3) the immediate release of the National Salvation leaders in Shanghai; (4) the release of all political prisoners in the country; (5) the removal of all laws against and restrictions on the patriotic mass movement; (6) the protection of the people's civil rights—free speech, press, and assembly—and full political freedom; (7) the immediate realization of the last will and testament of Sun Yat-sen, which calls for an alliance between China and all countries that believe in its freedom and independence; (8) the immediate convocation of a National Salvation congress. On December 14 a Military Affairs Council was organized in which the anti-Japanese Red Army was accorded representation.

Thus ended one phase of a year-long struggle, in which Marshal Chang obeyed the orders of the Generalissimo until his entire army threatened to take independent action. Up to this time the prisoners have been treated with the greatest courtesy and care. At present the city bristles with anti-aircraft guns, and soldiers patrol the walls; heavily armed soldiers protect the mass-meetings at which all classes gather. Peace or war rests with Nanking. The Northwest will not fire the first shot.

Such is the situation down to December 15, evening.

[After ten days of negotiation Chiang Kai-shek was released on December 25 and flew to Nanking with his captor, Chang Hsueh-liang. While details of the ransom agreement were kept secret, the farcical "trial" and subsequent pardon of Chang Hsueh-liang were generally interpreted as part of a bargain by which Chiang Kai-shek agreed to accept the united-front program demanded by the Young Marshal. This interpretation was further confirmed by an agreement reached on January 17 whereby Chang's former aids, Yang Fu-cheng and Yu Hsueh-chung, were permitted to retain approximately their previous positions in the Shensi area. Right-wing Nanking elements, however, have repeatedly tried to undermine this agreement and at the last report were threatening to renew the anti-Communist campaign.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

High Finance Among Friends

BY JOSEPH EDMUNDS

THE curse of bigness, as everyone knows, is a substantial curse; but it requires the testimonials of the best-paid corporation managers to make this clear. Seated in the confessional of a Senate investigation, the men who rule the country admit that they have bad judgment but never bad intentions. This should console those who suffer during periods of economic collapse.

The Wheeler committee, whose chairman is Burton K. Wheeler of Montana and whose counsel is Max Lowenthal, has been investigating the affairs of a number of railroads chosen for study by Joseph B. Eastman. Since early in December the committee has held public hearings in Washington on various aspects of the Van Sweringen financing as handled by the New York banks. The principal witnesses have been William C. Potter, chairman of the Guaranty Trust Company, and his assistants in managing the banks' affairs. The Guaranty Trust Company is the largest trust company in the United States, having assets, and liabilities, amounting to more than $2,000,000,000. It appears from what Mr. Potter and his juniors have said that the public is indebted to them for an imposing proportion of its losses in Van Sweringen securities. The Wheeler probe has shown how some of these losses were brought about. Negligence, probably induced by the size of the transactions, was the cause of some; the confusion caused by a conflict between the banking and the public interest may have caused others. On occasion, when favored by every circumstance, the public escaped injury. Such a conflict of interests and such an escape are shown in the record of the committee's hearings. The following memorandum was written by a vice-president of the securities department of the Guaranty Trust Company:

In October, 1930, Alleghany Corporation had to make a payment of $10,500,000 on account of the terminal properties in Kansas City and St. Joseph, Missouri, which it had contracted to purchase, but found itself unable to borrow the money needed for this purpose because of the 60 per cent borrowing limitation imposed by the provisions of the preferred stock. Arrangements were therefore made with J. P. Morgan and Company whereby they purchased $10,500,000 of Missouri Pacific convertible 5½ per cent bonds, due 1949, at par, and gave Alleghany Corporation an option, running to April 16, 1931, to repurchase the bonds at the same figure. At the time of the purchase (October 16) the bonds were selling at 105½. Guaranty Company participated to the extent of $3,000,000 in this purchase.

As Alleghany Corporation was unable to repurchase the bonds, the option was allowed to expire on April 16. Meanwhile the bonds had declined to a price of 82¼ and are now 75-77¼, and J. P. Morgan and Company and ourselves face a substantial loss.

Messrs. Van Sweringen recognize and concede that it was not contemplated that the bankers should incur any loss in connection with this transaction, that the transaction was intended to be in the nature of a bank loan, and that it took the form of a purchase with an option to repurchase only because that was the only way the company could comply with the provisions of the preferred stock. [My italics.]

Herein we see, by comparing the italicized passages, a recognition by the bankers of the prohibited character of the transaction which they were, nevertheless, attempting to carry through. At the same time, the Guaranty people consulted Lansing Reed, of the law firm of Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Gardiner, and Reed, who with John W. Davis, his partner, was also at that time a director of the Guaranty Trust Company, regarding means by which the trust company could be indemnified against any loss resulting from this transaction. This is particularly striking since the 60 per cent provision limiting Alleghany Corporation's borrowings had been written into its charter by the very same lawyers.

When confronted with this plain evidence out of the files of his own bank, William C. Potter, chairman of the Guaranty Trust Company, offered the following explanation to Senator Wheeler:

MR. POTTER: . . . Senator, these memoranda are the result of overzealousness on the part of some young man in the Guaranty Company. I know about that sale myself, and I was consulted when we bought the bonds, and it looked as though it was a very safe purchase at the time, and I was just wrong. I authorized the Guaranty Company to go ahead and buy those bonds, and when they came and talked to me about this thing, and about all these devious ways of getting in and out, and limiting our losses, I told the men, after I had had a talk with Reed, "You might just as well forget it. You have made a loss here. What is the use of crying about it?" We dropped it and did not do it.

The chairman shortly thereafter read into the record another memorandum written by the same vice-president who wrote the one previously quoted:

THE CHAIRMAN (reading): "We also discussed with Mr. Anderson [a partner in J. P. Morgan and Company] the matter of getting down in writing Mr. Van Sweringen's recognition of the moral obligation of Alleghany Corporation and of the Van Sweringens as individuals to hold us harmless against any loss on our purchase of the Missouri Pacific bonds. Mr. Anderson said that Mr. O. P. Van Sweringen had arranged that a suitable resolution be drafted covering this point which at the proper time was to be spread upon the minutes of a meeting of the board of directors."

Apparently this overzealous young man, from this statement, had discussed this with Mr. Anderson, of the house of Morgan, and Mr. Anderson, of the house of Morgan, said that Mr. O. P. Van Sweringen had arranged that a suitable resolution be drafted covering this point, which, at the proper time, was to be spread upon the minutes at a meeting of the board of directors.

MR. POTTER: But it was never done.

THE CHAIRMAN: All right. It was never done. Nevertheless, it shows that Mr. Anderson, of the house of Morgan, felt that this was not a straight sale, and that they ought to be recompensed for the loss that they had made; is not that true?

MR. POTTER: I will have to let Mr. Anderson speak for himself, but I know what I felt about it.

Morgan partners also, if not young, are evidently overzealous. Finally, Senator Wheeler said:

THE CHAIRMAN: If this was, as is stated in one of these memoranda, not a sale, but in the nature of a loan, then it was a clear violation on the part of the Van Sweringens, with the help of the bankers, of the charter provision, was it not?

MR. POTTER: If it was a loan.

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; if it was a loan it was a clear violation of the charter provision.

MR. POTTER: Yes, sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: And if these young men are right, these overzealous young men, then it was a violation of the charter provision?

MR. POTTER: Yes; but they were wrong.

THE CHAIRMAN: And that provision was introduced by the bankers' lawyers [again, Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Gardiner, and Reed] in their prospectus?

MR. POTTER: Yes.

THE CHAIRMAN: And made very much of in the prospectus?

MR. POTTER: Yes, sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: And, of course, by reason of the fact that the Guaranty Company had floated these preferred stocks, it was the duty of the Guaranty Company not to do something which would violate the charter provisions of the Alleghany Corporation?

MR. POTTER: That is right.

The interesting part of this episode, apart from whether the New York bankers tried to help Alleghany avoid its contractual obligations, is that the chairman of the bank, if one believes him, kept from his staff the nature of the transaction. From October through May, if Mr. Potter is to be believed, the nature of the deal was known to Mr. Potter alone. But communication may be difficult between the ranking officers of two-billion-dollar banks. Or worse, if the facts were really known below stairs in the Guaranty, the help took matters into their own hands and disregarded their superior. This passage in the life of the bank should then be remembered as the heroic rebellion of the Guaranty vice-presidents.

Another phase of the investigation which the newspapers, for lack of space or other reasons, failed to make clear, is revealed in another story told by Mr. Potter. Alleghany Corporation, set up in 1929, sold in 1929 and 1930 about $160,000,000 of securities, both bonds and stocks. These were offered to the public through an underwriting syndicate participated in by Guaranty Trust Company, and Guaranty Trust Company was the trustee for the bonds. One hundred millions of the proceeds were devoted to buying the control of the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company. But according to Mr. Potter, the Van Sweringens, who were the promoters of Alleghany, did not reveal to their bankers the intended use of the money. The Guaranty, in the person of Mr. Potter, "thought" the funds were to be applied to the payment of debts; though there was no showing that such immense debts existed. Mr. Potter's story would indicate that the Van Sweringens were incorrigibly given to concealing their actions. Not only did they fail to reveal their affairs to the public, but they kept them secret from the bankers on whom they depended for their money. Mr. Potter's story also indicates that the Guaranty people were remarkably careless, attaching their name to tens of millions in securities without overseeing the use of the proceeds.

But if the chairman of the Guaranty Trust could decide that a loan was a purchase, as in the case of the $10,500,000 Missouri Pacific bonds, and leave his helpers uninformed of the nature of the transaction, it may be that some other Guaranty person knew of the Van Sweringen dealings in Missouri Pacific. Perhaps this time only Mr. Potter was ignorant.

In one very striking case ignorance of what Commissioner Eastman unhesitatingly characterized as fraudulent bookkeeping could not have been pleaded by J. P. Morgan and Company. The Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, in applying to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for loans of $23,000,000 to pay off its debts to the New York bankers, submitted balance sheets which showed cash on hand which it did not have. The RFC relied upon these statements in considering the advisability of making the loan to the railroad, which subsequently went bankrupt, thereby endangering the safety of the government loans.

J. P. Morgan and Company became aware of the falsity of the railroad's statements in January, 1933, and a memorandum was found in its files by the Wheeler investigators proving this awareness. However, there is no evidence to show that the bankers at any time took any steps to have the truth made known to the public, which held the bonds of the railroad which the bankers had floated, or to the government, which had lent money to the railroad.

If Mr. Potter was shocked to know that the Alleghany money was being used for buying another railroad, he was doubly hurt when the Wheeler committee presented certain documents from the Van Sweringen Corporation files. This corporation was set up in 1930 to finance the Cleveland urban properties of the Van Sweringens, which were tied in with a terminal development intended to be similar to the Grand Central district in New York. After considerable urging by their friends, the Morgans, the Guaranty people underwrote an issue of $30,000,000 of five-year unsecured "gold" notes on which the public lost $15,759,000. The history of this note issue is complicated in many ways, but in two details shows how trusting the Guaranty people were as far as their Cleveland clients were concerned.

The Van Sweringen Corporation had as its principal asset the stock in the company which owned the Cleveland terminal land and buildings. This company had never earned money, a fact unknown to Mr. Potter or any of his Guaranty Company vice-presidents. No one in the Guaranty Trust Company, according to the testimony, had ever seen a balance sheet or income statement of the company which owned these Cleveland real-estate assets. Nor had they asked for such statements.

In the same hearing it was brought out that the assets of the Cleveland Terminals Building Company were written up by $16,000,000 immediately before the Van Sweringen Corporation notes were offered to the public. This write-up had the inevitable effect of causing the Van Sweringen Corporation to appear more appealing as an investment. Fortunately for the conscience of the Guaranty Trust Company, if not for its reputation, Mr. Potter and his assistants were able to testify that they had at no time been aware of this accounting feat.

The Guaranty people were so horrified when these facts were discovered seven years afterward, and by strangers, that their leader, Mr. Potter, made an informal statement expressing his shock. As on so many occasions it appears that the New York bankers had been too trusting. Mr. O. P. Van Sweringen was from Cleveland, which is a large city, and he had deceived Wall Street with his artful and deceptive manner. This version of the dealings between the New York banks and the Van Sweringens has become incontrovertible since the death of both Van Sweringens.

The last week has witnessed an attempt to cripple the Wheeler investigation by denying the committee the use of expert personnel employed by other branches of the government. It is curious that this attempt has been made shortly before Thomas W. Lamont and other Morgan partners are to appear in Washington. Connoisseurs would be reluctant to have the hearings come to a premature halt in the midst of Mr. Potter's stories. Those who enjoyed Mr. Lamont's version of history before the Munitions Committee are looking forward to his treatment of the Van Sweringen cycle.

Aside from its value to social historians, the testimony of men like Mr. Potter and Mr. Lamont is of no use unless it moves Congress to take the control of American economic life out of their hands. Congress, being by nature inert and its acts inconclusive, will not be moved except by the gadfly of an investigating committee, reinforced by a candid press and public support. The Wheeler committee has wisely refrained from espousing any program of action until its inquiry is concluded, despite the fact that its chairman introduced a government-ownership bill in the last Congress. Failing government ownership, Mr. Potter will continue to be shocked and surprised. Mr. Potter's last shock cost the public $15,759,000.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

MY FRIEND Professor Henry Pratt Fairchild has taken me to task vigorously for a sentence in my Issues and Men of December 19. Writing of the overwhelming flood of begging letters I had received, I said that most of them would be unnecessary "if our whole economic system were revised"; and then I added, "But that is a long, long way off." It was this last that so deeply stirred Professor Fairchild. He declared that it was a defeatist attitude and wrote, "Of course social regeneration must remain a long way off if people like yourself, who have understanding and convictions, continue to be so timid and evasive." And then he asked, "Why didn't you follow up your very impressive presentation of the situation by a vigorous attack upon the cruel irony and waste of all such futile benevolences and a ringing challenge to your wide circle of friends and readers to face realities squarely and join with you in a campaign to bring about that revision of the economic system which you believe to be efficacious? Must we go on forever evading, sidestepping, and waiting impotently?"

Well, perhaps I should have said that a revision of the economic system need not necessarily be a long, long way off. I did not elaborate that point for several reasons. In the first place, I am limited to a page, save in a few very special cases. In the next, it never occurred to me that in saying that economic revision was a long way off I was taking a defeatist attitude. And if I had thought about it at all, I should probably have considered that after so many years of writing my views in the New York Evening Post and The Nation I was pretty thoroughly on record both as to the necessity of revision and as to my belief that it could be brought about in our lifetime.

But, after all, journalists have to be realists. By that I do not mean that they should be recreant to their ideals or hesitate to press them, but that they must face the facts. All my life I have advocated pure and unadulterated free trade, and I have to admit that it is only within the last three or four years, since the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, that we are beginning to make headway against the protection infamy. So with the general revision of our economic system. I have criticized that system innumerable times; I have denounced it with all the vigor that I could command; and in these pages I have repeatedly named the steps which should be taken to change the wrongs that cry out to heaven, to end the injustices that are so utterly indefensible. I agree with Professor Fairchild that "if the trumpet give forth a feeble sound, who shall prepare himself for battle?" But that does not prevent my realizing that the battle has been very long and is going to be long, and that in certain places, as in Germany and Italy, we have lost a great deal of ground in the last few years.

One difficulty, of course, is the magnitude of the battlefield and the number of issues. I have often said that the American Abolitionists were the most fortunate reformers I have ever known, since they had one cause to fight for, yet that cause was an economic, a social, a political, and a moral one. It had every attribute to enable its proponents to arouse their fellow-citizens. We have innumerable issues because we have become conscious—even the conservatives among us—as never before, of the many phases of the struggle for human emancipation, of which that of the colored people was only one. Our sympathies are torn today by the wrongs of the sharecroppers in the South, of the miners in Harlan County, Kentucky, and the coal fields everywhere, of the floating fruit pickers in California, of the seamen, of the children in the factories and the mills—endless wrongs visible wherever one turns. And there is no single specific for these. No new Emancipation Proclamation can end all these wrongs with one stroke of the pen, as Abraham Lincoln ended the buying and selling of human beings. The Communists think they know how, and Russia may yet prove that it has achieved the millennium, but heaven knows Russia is a long way from that today.

If we turn to Professor Fairchild's little book "This Way Out," we find that he, too, has no really immediate remedy. He believes in the development of cooperation; he desires a certain amount of collectivism; he believes that a collective society can be far more efficient than our present system. He thinks that a plant run successfully by a man hired by 500,000 stockholders can be just as successful if the man is hired by 125,000,000 Americans, and he supports his beliefs with strong arguments. I think that he wants us to take over banking and credit, transportation, communications, light and power, underlying natural resources, munitions, and basic industries, and to do so by making the corporations the center of transition, just as Germany has taken over a majority interest or the entire ownership of many corporations. But this calls for time—lots of it. It would be a staggering task, and even if the country should agree tomorrow to accept Professor Fairchild's views, it would be years and years before they could be put into complete practical operation. How long will it be before we can get even 10 per cent of the population to agree upon a program of action? But we must not lay down our arms or cease to urge our own particular remedies simply because unanimous action is difficult and delayed. With that I agree, and if I have ever been remiss in speaking out, I apologize.

BROUN'S PAGE

All the News and Fits

THERE have been some strange capers in the papers of New York. In particular the Times has been departing from certain long established traditions of its own. The changes are interesting and not without merit. Even so I was recently startled to find the Times using two headlines on the first page to announce that one of its reporters, Russell B. Porter, had been barred by the sitdown strikers from a plant in Flint. I may point out that in the past it was not considered news when a reporter failed to get a story. His failure, whether caused by some fault of his own or an act of God, was considered a private matter concerning only himself and his editor.

By a coincidence the turndown of Russell Porter came on the same day that Mr. Sloan refused to see Miss Perkins. To the editors of the Times the two events seemed of equal importance. I had my early reportorial training on the Morning Telegraph, which had a lesser standing than the Times, but my boss, the late Shep Friedman, said to me, "Don't write about yourself or other newspapermen in doing a story. Reporters and what happens to them have nothing to do with the news." And at that time most of the dailies of New York adhered to this philosophy. The coming of the by-line brought a certain shift away from sheer impersonality. But the Times lagged in allowing signatures, and even when reporters had their names at the top of their stories no license was granted to them to express opinion. Indeed, Mr. Sulzberger on many recent occasions has spoken in favor of utter impersonality in reporting. He has professed to fear that any kind of organization of reporters would diminish impartiality, since, according to his theory, a member of the Guild might write of labor from a sympathetic standpoint.

Now I wonder whether he is aware that he has run smack into another horn of the problem. The sitdown strikers of the Flint plant denied admission to Mr. Porter because he is not a member of the American Newspaper Guild. And by calling attention to the episode in headlines I rather fear that the Times has greatly impaired the utility of an excellent newsgatherer. Mr. Porter has now been advertised to the world at large as a man who has steadfastly refused to join the union of his own craft. Almost inevitably other labor groups with whom he comes in contact during his work will regard him as a man whose mind is set against organization.

The case of Edward Angly of the New York Herald Tribune is even more unfortunate. His paper did not give very much space to the fact that its reporter was barred at the same Flint plant for the same reason, but it did commit the indiscretion of carrying a short signed piece by Mr. Angly in which he announced that he was not a Guild member. This system of announcing the particular point of view and background of each reporter may be arduous as well as revealing. I wonder, for instance, whether the Herald Tribune will think it necessary to print below the name of the reporter who covers some Democratic candidate for office the short notation, "Our correspondent is an Ind. Rep. but once voted for Grover Cleveland." And to carry out the logic of this scheme, the story of the Yale-Princeton game on the sport page might not be considered complete without an editorial announcement, "Remember that the author of this piece is a Harvard man."

Another piece of editorial judgment by the rapidly changing Times was puzzling to one of its long-standing admirers. John S. Sumner brought a complaint against the novel "A World I Never Made," by James T. Farrell. It so happens that the Times, for reasons best known to itself, refused advertisements of this book. Nevertheless, the case is the first important prosecution of a well-known author which has come into court in several years. I do not see how such a happening can be shoved out of the realm of news. And yet when the case came before Magistrate Curran the Times made no mention of the matter. To make it still more puzzling, it did report the second day of the trial at some length.

This particular veteran reader of a great newspaper is curious to know whether Mr. Sulzberger is going to continue to allow his opinions about literature to interfere with his opinions about news. I'm also wondering whether the Times feels that it will get complete impartiality in the reporting of labor news if it demands that the man assigned to the story must be himself a person on record as opposed to organization.

Speaking of news and fits, the Herald Tribune has been doing a little dervish whirling on its own account. It is indignant that the New York State Senate passed the child-labor amendment with celerity. The Herald Tribune holds that there should have been extended debate and public hearings. But after all, the question has been before the legislators for a long time, and any person capable of reading a daily paper must by this time have heard the arguments on all sides.

The Herald Tribune identifies itself as "one of the leaders in the long fight to end child labor." But it goes on to say, "A major constitutional change, the object of steadily increasing doubt over the long period during which it has been before the country, was jammed through a branch of the legislature in the largest state of the Union without any real consideration whatever." The Herald Tribune may have been a leader in the fight against child labor at one time, but it is certainly dropping out of contention at the moment. It ought to move over to give somebody a chance to come through on the rail.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

APPEALS FROM THE SUPREME COURT

BY MAX LERNER

WHETHER it is true or not, ■ Mr. Dooley suggested, that the Supreme Court follows the election returns, it is indubitably true that the publishing season follows the Supreme Court returns. Last year was an annus mirabilis in the court's history, with the court handing down a whole series of executioners' decisions any one of which might have served to make an ordinary year notable in judicial annals. The result has been an avalanche of books which question the court's whole function in a bristling manner. The appeals from the Supreme Court are now being fought out not in the law journals but in the public prints; they are being discussed not in academic lecture-rooms but in forums, trade-union groups, and legislative chambers, they are being taken finally not to a faculty of law professors but to the people themselves, with whom alone an effective appeal can lie.

The two books that have the best chance of popular success are Morris L. Ernst's recent study of the judicial power¹ and Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen's book on the present personnel of the court.² There have been others during the past year that have had much merit in them—Secretary Wallace's "Whose Constitution?" (a plea for a flexible interpretation), Fred Rodell's "Fifty-five Men" (on the Founding Fathers, written with a fine simplicity), Irving Brant's "Storm over the Constitution" and Robert K. Carr's "The Supreme Court and Democracy" (in both books a new and vigorous Jeffersonianism, arguing that democracy today can be maintained only by the sort of federal action which the Supreme Court is blocking), and John M. Henry's "Nine Above the Law" (chaotic, but filled with good material on the court's usurpation of power). There are three characteristics that most of these books have in common. They are radical, not in conclusions but in method, in the sense that they go back to the roots of the Supreme Court's power over legislation. They are popular, tending to deal with erudite matters in the vernacular. Finally, they are secular rather than theological; they are relatively unimpressed by the supposed divinity of the judges or of the Founding Fathers, and almost succeed in treating them like ordinary human beings, betraying—by a curious inversion—their still lingering sense of divinity by the very access of zeal with which they go about the debunking process.

What gives "The Ultimate Power" and "The Nine Old Men" their effectiveness is that they combine these traits of the radical, the popular, and the secular, and cement them with a quality of verve and daring which allows the authors to appeal to the intellect via the imagination. That is always a dangerous sort of route to the intellect, but no book that wants to reach hundreds of thousands of people and affect public policy can afford to travel any other way. Mr. Ernst does not pull his punches. "I think the time is ripe," he writes, "for the non-lawyers to reassert their earnest disrespect for what lawyers and judges have done to us all." And what his book seeks to do is to give the miner, the farmer, the automobile worker, the professional man and woman the material on which to base this "earnest disrespect." The thesis of the book is quite simple. The Constitution was a response to very specific economic and political conditions, and was fashioned thus by the very human Founding Fathers; the job was to set up a new nation in terms of the economics of 1787. In the struggles that ensued over consolidation of power the Supreme Court captured a veto power over legislation; but American society today has a new technological base, and the economics of 1937 are far different from the economics of 1787. Given the new economic conditions, the Supreme Court's veto makes any "pursuit of happiness" by the masses a grim mockery.

In developing this thesis Mr. Ernst has given us ■ mélange of history, economics, politics, law, and personal description. These are held together by the unflagging energy of a darting mind expressing itself in crisp, concrete, hard-hitting, although sometimes clumsy, prose. He uses ■ style admirably suited to its purpose—that of persuading the largest possible number of people to recapture the ultimate power and bring it back where it belongs—with the people. Throughout the book there runs the primary assumption that economic realities dictate political forms, and that where the latter fail to respond to the relentless onward march of economic change, an explosion may quite probably follow. Throughout the book there is thus a sort of continuous counterpoint between the economics and the conditions of life of the America of 1787 and the economics of today. Mr. Ernst has hit upon an interesting technical device for presenting this counterpoint—a sort of Dos Passos newsreel technique, flashing back and forth from one end of the time-span to the other, such as I have never seen applied outside the novel. On the whole Mr. Ernst has produced an exciting book, full of the stuff of narrative and likely to sway beliefs.

I approach the other book, "The Nine Old Men," by Pearson and Allen, with mingled feelings. The sort of thing that it seeks to do I find admirable—to make the nine abstractions on the court today human beings. For that reason, and because there is no other book that performs this task so well, I could wish that the book would achieve a circulation to make "Gone with the Wind" pallid by comparison. I like also the courage and the brash vigor of the book. But there are two doubts that I have about it. I am not referring to its scholarship, which has been strongly attacked by Thomas Reed Powell in a recent number of the Yale Law Journal. I refer rather to its possible effect on opinion. It is a good maxim that if you strike at a king you must kill him. But you do not, on that account, have to kill his sisters and his cousins and his aunts. I do not think we should be spared any details about our justices, but I do not consider the fact that Justice Butler's brother had an illegitimate child or the fact that Justice Cardozo's father was convicted of corruption as really bearing on their exercise of the judicial power. Given the state of middle-class opinion about the court, any departure from the relevant may prove a boom-erang for the very healthy debunking process that is going on now.

¹ "The Ultimate Power." By Morris L. Ernst. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

² "The Nine Old Men." By Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

My second doubt refers to the danger of personalizing the judicial power. It may be a valid criticism of the Pearson-Allen book that one may easily emerge from it with the feeling that if we could get a majority of liberal judges, we could put up with the judicial veto. That I consider the major fallacy of liberals today with respect to the Supreme Court. It is a fallacy that vitiates President Roosevelt's recent proposal for changing the court—a proposal that falls in line with this book's linking of senility and toryism. We must remember that it is not individual justices we have to cope with but the institution of the judicial power. Our task is neither to fight the Nine Old Men nor to convert them, but to make it impossible for any Nine Old Men to wield the Ultimate Power.

BOOKS

The Hub of the Wheel

PRINCIPLES OF SHAKESPEARIAN PRODUCTION. By G. Wilson Knight. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

SOONER or later a critic of Shakespeare becomes his producer too, if only in imagination. The direction of any talk about the plays is toward the stage, and the tendency of the best talk is to let them say here for themselves what cannot be said in the language of analysis. The critic does not stop analyzing Shakespeare at this point, of course; it is rather that he begins to do so now in earnest, testing his theory of any play with an actual or an imagined performance of it which relates its parts to one another in the interest of some single effect which is the expression of the theory, and which perhaps was Shakespeare's intention. We shall never know what Shakespeare's intention was in any case; but we have become increasingly aware that each of his plays has its remarkable and inexpressible unity—inexpressible, that is, save on an ideal stage; and what every serious critic wants to do is to construct this ideal stage.

Mr. Knight has taken then a very natural step from the position where he formerly discussed Shakespeare. The effort behind his five books, "Myth and Miracle," "The Wheel of Fire," "The Imperial Theme," "The Shakespearian Tempest," and "The Christian Renaissance," was to isolate and underline certain themes which he found predominant in the poetry of the plays, and furthermore to show how the plays were organized around these themes in terms of their imagery. He did perhaps all that a man can do—more than this, some say—to put Shakespeare into other words than his own. Mr. Knight's words were brilliant and vehement, and poured themselves out in a profusion which doubtless was excessive here or there. They had an important result, however. They restored the poetry of Shakespeare to our attention, and they reminded us that it exists in the plays as plays—things of vast dimension yet of the most delicate structure, and things which need to be seen as well as heard before they shall be fully understood. And now Mr. Knight becomes Shakespeare's producer; puts him not into words but into action, and thereby tests his criticism.

Like Mr. Granville-Barker, who both produces Shakespeare and writes "Prefaces" to further productions, Mr. Knight practices his art from time to time in veritable theaters. He has produced and played important parts in "Romeo and Juliet," "Hamlet," "Othello," "Henry VIII," and "King Lear." But this is not what convinces me that he understands Shakespeare as few men do today. The book in itself is convincing, and should be read by anyone who, desiring to produce Shakespeare, desires also to put as much as possible of him into our minds. Mr. Knight may not know how to put all of him there; but that at any rate is his passionate desire, and I have no doubt of the wisdom behind the desire, or of the genius at criticism which sees in the plays so many things that the average current production misses. Shakespeare can seldom have been shown so little to his advantage as he is being shown at present, when the poetry of a given play is likely to appear not so much as something central to its life as something famous and archaic which we must accept along with the melodrama. Mr. Knight does not think of "Hamlet," for instance, as a story told in metrical dialogue. He thinks of it as a poem which has both spatial and temporal dimensions; as a thing that lives in its wholeness and must be seen and heard in its wholeness.

The director of a modern play knows something like this as a matter of course, and acts upon it; for it is a commonplace of his trade that he must first of all understand what he is doing. But a play of Shakespeare's, partly because it is old, requires a special effort at understanding, and it would appear that the requirement is not often met. "To apply intelligence to the whole art-form," says Mr. Knight, "is not the same as abstracting from it those elements only that seem intelligible." The ideal producer of Shakespeare would be himself a poet of some sort, and therefore sensitive to the peculiar quality of each tragedy or comedy, so that "the whole play should often seem implicit in the particular moment." But he would have had to possess the whole play in his imagination before this could happen; and how to possess it is what interests Mr. Knight.

Many of our difficulties [he says] are illuminated by our recognizing that the germ of composition is an intuitive perception of stillness of some sort, an idea or quality. Such an intuition will condition creation. It will not necessarily come before the work is started, but we must suppose there to be always a moment of conception during the early stages of composition, when the essential nature of the work to be is first properly apparent. This then becomes the nucleus, preliminary drafts or ideas—if any—are recolored to tone with it, action and imagery clothe it, grow from it, cluster around it. . . .

So we will assume a single central, though dynamic, stillness at the back of the process. . . . At the center of creation and understanding alike remains ■ stillness, the hub of the wheel.

A producer of Shakespeare who cannot comprehend the foregoing ought to go out of business. It is really simple, and it describes what he does with any modern play. He should do as much with Shakespeare. If he thinks he cannot, then he has no use for the rest of Mr. Knight's book, which very specifically deals with lighting, scenery, diction, and gestures, and describes his own productions in detail. It is always excellent criticism—the sixth volume, ■ it now appears, in Mr. Knight's eloquent series.

MARK VAN DOREN

Newman's Wagner: Volume II

THE LIFE OF RICHARD WAGNER. Volume II: 1848-1860. By Ernest Newman. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

WITH the appearance of a second instalment of his monumental study of Wagner, it becomes clear that Mr. Newman is producing what will, for at least this generation, constitute the standard work on the subject. Working through vast thickets of unresolved and frequently controversial details, he has again refined and welded his material into a simple, compelling narrative, admirable alike for the extensive knowledge, acute judgment, and brilliant exposition that went into its making.

Here, in more than six hundred pages, is a survey, both judicial and interpretative, of twelve years, from the epoch of revolution (1848-9) through the "Tristan" period, the chief portion of which Mr. Newman justly regards as constituting the great formative period in Wagner's life both as man and as artist. One hundred pages are devoted solely to incidents anticipating and including the Dresden rising, and their effect is to refute the old view which sought to minimize Wagner's connection with the practical business of revolution. Clearly detailed are his motives for joining the democratic movement, the evidence of his having been animated by revolutionary principles of "the more crudely realistic kind," the proof of his increasing absorption in social problems as he came more closely into association with Röckel, Bakunin, and others who were shortly to lead the rising of May, 1849. Typical are the excerpts cited from Wagner's article glorifying Revolution—"a paean to the red goddess in her most incarnadine aspects"—written while he was still court Kapellmeister. From recently published and exhaustive German studies based on official material, Mr. Newman summarizes adequately, for the first time in English, Wagner's share in the revolt and the legal case against him. The conclusion is that "his association with the whole affair was anything but that of a curious spectator, or, as Glasenapp would have us believe, of a mere artist compulsorily interested in political events only because they touched by accident upon the outer edge of his artistic dreams."

But it is in his discussion of the years of exile following the flight from Dresden that Wagner's present biographer achieves his most telling strokes. The affair with Jessie Lausot—a major crisis in Wagner's domestic life—is not simply an "erotic desire for a new woman to replace the old, but also a revolt of everything that was best in him against domestic conditions that had reached the point where either he must break free of them or come to shipwreck as an artist." Later, when Wagner's association with Mathilde Wesendonck arouses bitter opposition from his wife, we are told that

SEX TECHNIQUE

By ISABEL
EMSLIE
HUTTON, M.B.,
Ch.B., M.D.

Physician to the British Hospital for Functional Mental and Nervous Diseases, London

Foreword by IRA S. WILE, M.D.
Former Commissioner of Education,
N. Y. C.

in MARRIAGE

ILLUSTRATED

with EXPLANATORY
DIAGRAMS

SUBJECTS INCLUDED

PRE-MARITAL PREPARATION

Necessary Sex Knowledge—Sex Freedom Before Marriage for the Man; For the Woman—Sex Instinct in Men and Women Contrasted—Implications of Courtship—Hereditary Factors—The Age Factor—Indications of Sexual Incompatibility—The Neurotic Temperament in Marriage.

FIRST SEX ACT

Analysis of Sexual Intercourse—Preliminary Love-Play—Overcoming Mental Obstacles—Pain—Early Intercourse—The Fatigue Factor—The Husband's Part—The Wife's Part—Methods of Sexual Stimulation—The Active ■ the Passive Wife—Nervous Shock of First Intercourse—Temporary Impotence—Simultaneous Climax; How Produced.

THE SEX ORGANS

Knowledge of Male and Female Organs Essential to Both Husband and Wife—"Fitting"—Anatomy of Sex Organs—Hygiene of Sex Organs—How Fertilization Takes Place.

SEX LIFE

IN MARRIAGE

The Arts of Love—Timing—Impotence During Marriage—Sexual Cooperation—Influence of Age, Sexual Instinct and Health—Sexual Adjustment—Sex Errors—Sexual Rhythm—Frequency of Intercourse—Positions in Intercourse; when Variations ■ Indicated—Sexual Starvation—The Unsatisfied Wife—Prelude to Sex; Love Play—Sex Life During Pregnancy; after Childbirth.

MENSTRUATION AND

THE CHANGE OF LIFE

The Hygiene of Menstruation—Sexual Activity during and after the Change of Life—The Menstrual Cycle and Conception—Normal and Abnormal Symptoms.

CURABLE

CHILDLESSNESS

Simple Causes and Their Treatment—Conditions where Medical Treatment is Required—Conditions where Surgical Treatment is Indicated.

BIRTH

CONTROL

IT comes as a startling fact to many couples who THINK they ■ well-informed, that they ARE in REALITY, AMAZINGLY IGNORANT OF THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE. "When no trouble is taken to learn how to make sexual intercourse harmonious and happy, a variety of complications arise. Very often wives remain sexually unawakened, and therefore inclined to dislike sexual intercourse. When that happens, husbands do not experience what they long for, and ■ apt to be sexually starved. Neither husbands nor wives on these terms attain to harmony, and the result is nervous ill-health. . . . The cause of all this is not want of love. It is want of knowledge."—A. H. Gray, M.A., D. D.

FROM ■ very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly. Many men feel bitter, in a resigned sort of way, about their "frigid wives." As a matter of fact this problem, which too often is ■ of "the bungling husband," frequently vanishes completely when both husband and wife know exactly what to do for each other. In THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE, Dr. Hutton describes the sexual act in such detail that no one need any longer remain in ignorance of exactly how it should be performed. In the foreword to this work Dr. Ira S. Wile declares: "A knowledge of the science of mating offers greater assurance of successful marriage."

WHILE completely frank, Dr. Hutton handles the subject with excellent taste, and, ■ the American Medical Association says, "with good judgment ■ to what constitutes general medical opinion."

The Sex Technique in Marriage is a book for husbands and wives to read together, if they wish to remain together!

FIVE DIAGRAMS

{ The Male Sex Organs (Two Views)
The Female Sex Organs (Two Views)
Male and Female Reproductive Cells }

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 819-N
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N. Y.
Send me in plain wrapper SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE for FREE EXAMINATION. I will deposit $2.00 plus few cents postage on delivery. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned, within 5 days.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only
$2.00, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

SEND NO MONEY

"Minna's one-track mind took no account of the psychological complexities of more highly organized beings than herself: the situation, as she saw it, was simply the old one of one woman against another, and of an honest woman, with all legalities and moralities on her side, against a designing siren." But concerning the true relationship between Mathilde and Richard, Mr. Newman doubts "that she was ever one of the really seminal forces of his life, and that, in particular, she 'inspired' him with 'Tristan.'"

In similar fashion Mr. Newman scrutinizes a whole gallery of figures and episodes belonging to these years. But perhaps the general reader will be most enlightened by those passages in which Mr. Newman looks anew at Wagner's art—analyzing the genesis of the material of the "Ring" dramas, the successive recastings of this vast material during the course of many years, and the psychological changes—in line with the conversion of Wagner's social optimism into resignation—which the great work underwent between first conception and final form.

Lastly, this volume is as important to the cultural historian as to the student of musical biography. For the recital of Wagner's life and works does not stand alone, but is integrated with, and interpreted against, a parallel account of the history, the physiology, and the psychology of swiftly moving forces which were contributing to a major change in European musical life.

ELBERT LENROW

"All Quiet" in the Far East

TSUSHIMA. By A. Novikoff-Priboy. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

FOUGHT a generation ago, the Russo-Japanese War marked the crumbling of one empire and the iron baptism of another. Here, written by a Russian sailor who participated in it, is the story of its final episode, the Battle of Tsushima. One of the greatest naval engagements in history, it lasted five and a half hours, killed 5,000 men, and sent the greater part of the Russian fleet to the bottom of the sea. Among the survivors was Novikoff-Priboy, who spent the next eight months in a Japanese prison camp gathering from his fellow-survivors all they could tell him of their experiences aboard the different ships that made up the fleet. These, together with his own memories, he has woven into a log of the Second Pacific Squadron from the time it left Kronstadt to the time, after sailing halfway around the world, it met the victory of the grave in Tsushima Straits.

The result is a book which, both as new historical material and as a human document of men under the pressure of great events, belongs in the most exclusive category of history—that of primary sources. We can be especially thankful for its publication, for the manuscript has had as embattled a life as the author. Burned to the last word during a riot in the prison camp, entirely rewritten from memory, it was later secreted in Russia from the Czar's police by the author's brother, who died without revealing its hiding-place. It was not until 1928 that Novikoff found a bundle of old papers in a beehive, untied the string with trembling fingers, and discovered the Tsushima memoirs, lost for twenty-two years.

Hindsight has told historians that bungling generals, incompetent admirals, and a rotting government lost the war for Russia before a shot was fired. From "Tsushima" we learn that officers and men of the Second Pacific Squadron knew this even as they set sail from Kronstadt. Convinced that they were being sent to the same fate as the First Squadron annihilated at Port Arthur six months before, mistrusting their variegated fleet, their rusty guns and rustier marksmanship, led by a coarse-mouthed admiral who commanded fear but not respect, untrained and miserably uneasy, a more demoralized group of men never set out to meet the enemy.

Month after month for more than half a year they sailed on under a blazing sun, crowded in close quarters—there were 900 aboard Novikoff's ship, the Oryol—nerves fraying, mutiny grumbling beneath the surface, drawing ever nearer to a war they hated and an enemy they feared. At the end, instead of making for Vladivostok by sailing around the eastern coast of Japan, the admiral, head down and eyes screwed shut, steered for Tsushima Straits, deliberately running head on into the Japanese fleet.

Moments later they were in the thick of chaos. The booming of cannon, the roar of water through a gash in the ship's side, the crackle of fire on the fo'c'sle, the crash of shells splintering the iron decks, the agonized shrieks of the wounded, the smell of blood; Novikoff looked down at his hands and saw they were holding a boot from which protruded the mangled remnants of a leg. He looked up and met the eyes of a man whose blood was pouring from a ragged stump.

The story of that battle ■ Novikoff saw it and as he transcribed it from the words of other survivors takes 250 pages to tell. The telling is dispassionate, yet every page of it squirms with agony, bewilderment, valor, cowardice, and death, with happenings so fantastic that they seem incredible in a world of human beings. There is the flagship, the Suvoroff, its turrets battered away, its decks afire, no one in command and no one at the helm, going crazily round and round like a decapitated chicken. There is the moment on the Oryol when the men peering over the side see the gleaming arrow of a torpedo coming directly for them, feel the actual knowledge of death, and then see the torpedo miss the prow by inches. There is the gunner Sedoff who clung to a stick in the water for eleven hours watching his companions drown one by one till he was left alone with a seagull which perched on the knee of a floating corpse and gazed at him out of red-rimmed eyes.

Who is Novikoff-Priboy and what did he think of the battle when it was all over? To begin with, he was a revolutionary before he ever stepped on the Oryol and therefore one of those who believed that the sooner a defeat by Japan, the sooner a revolution in Russia. Yet Novikoff's low opinion of the ability of his commanding officers was not the outcome of political bias but the thinking man's contempt for military pigheadedness, for blind obedience to orders in defiance of common sense. "Theirs not to reason why, theirs but to do and die," makes no sense to Novikoff any more than it did to Lloyd George, whose impatience with the whole pack of generals sputters from the pages of his war memoirs. Novikoff saw one war from below; Lloyd George saw another from on top. It appears that the military mind looks the same from all angles.

In the straightforward narrative, in the vivid, detailed pattern of life aboard the men-of-war, in the magnificent fugue that is the account of the battle, with the stories of the different ships in the fleet carried on simultaneously, "Tsushima" is a modern epic. Because the war contained the germ of revolution perhaps it may be said to have served a useful purpose in spite of its horrors. But the survivors, on their way home from Japan, sailed back through the Tsushima Straits, where the bones of five thousand men lay rotting at the bottom of the sea.

BARBARA WERTHEIM

A Disgraced Name

SHINING SCABBARD. By R. C. Hutchinson. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

MR. HUTCHINSON'S novel is a comment on the manners and morality of the era in France that ended, as "Shining Scabbard" ends, with the World War. The decaying aspects of that era, with its overemphasized family traditions and its overvalued escutcheons, are synthesized in Colonel Séverin's obsession with dishonor. The Séverins' dilemma, for it cannot be called a tragedy, is the anachronistic one of a disgraced name.

Colonel Séverin is a Balzacian tyrant of the bedchamber, a hypochondriac obsessed with proving his innocence in a long-forgotten scandal of the Franco-Prussian War. That obsession is the skeleton in the Colonel's closet and the master of his house. It rules and runs the Séverins. Madame Séverin ministers to it as she ministers to the Colonel's imaginary ill health. Her purpose in life is the proof of her husband's innocence. To this strange family Captain Pierre Séverin, a son posted somewhere in the African desert, has sent his wife, Renée, and their two children. Renée's love and concern are for her husband and children. She remains aloof in the Séverin midst, but her extraneity to the obsession of the household creates an atmosphere of resentment that isolates her in her room, where she morbidly guards herself against the hostility of the Séverins, just as she must guard her son against the Colonel's sadistic interest in the boy's possibilities as a soldier. Eventually Pierre responds to Renée's letters by deserting his post to join her. He reaches the family home in Baulon at the outbreak of the Great War, which is to resolve the Séverins in its havoc. Renée and her son are killed by shrapnel, Pierre is left raving at the scene of their death, and the Colonel, finally revealing the origin of his paranoia, flees from the invaded town, abandoning his women to the hazards of bombardment just as in that other war so memorable to the Séverins he must have abandoned his soldiers to the Prussians.

"Shining Scabbard" is dextrous social comment, but in its other aspect, as the study of an obsession of tragic consequences, it lacks meaning and coherence. The fault is one of over-facility. Mr. Hutchinson has glibly substituted the mechanical movement of his plot for the growth and psychological culmination of his characters. The result is a kind of literary prestidigitation in which the author's hand is, unfortunately, often no quicker than the reader's eye.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

Shorter Notices

SHINE, PERISHING REPUBLIC. By Rudolph Gilbert. Bruce Humphries. $2.50.

This book about Robinson Jeffers presents no clear explanation of Jeffers's poems, but is rather a special plea for Jeffers the mystic. "Let us complete a picture of Jeffers by likening him to one gifted like Apollo with that freedom from the wilder emotions, that philosophical calmness of the sculptor-god. His eye must be sun-like according to its origin, even when it is angry and looks displeased." Such is this critic's summation of Jeffers's greatness. Mr. Gilbert unfortunately is given to superlatives. He compares Jeffers with the great Greek dramatists and finds no one in this country who has Jeffers's power. E. Merrill Root is mentioned as next in intensity of poetic vision, on a smaller scale, and then,

CROSSROADS IN AMERICAN EDUCATION

- Shall we return to scholasticism and authoritarianism?
- Can we depend on science for knowledge?
- Is the university to concern itself with contemporary problems?

* * *

President Hutchins of Chicago and Professor John Dewey debate these crucial issues in a series of articles in THE SOCIAL FRONTIER—a series which already has been described as "making educational history." Of profound significance to all interested in the future of higher learning in America.

* * *

Also in current or future issues:

Reports on new social trends in Europe by a group of visiting American professors.

John T. Flynn of the Board of Higher Education, N. Y. C., on "The Fight for Liberalism in New York City Colleges."

Lewis Mumford on "Education and Culture."

SPECIAL OFFER TO THE NATION READERS: Five issues for one dollar (including those with the Dewey-Hutchins articles. Send us your dollar today before the supply of these issues is exhausted).

THE SOCIAL FRONTIER

A Journal of Educational Criticism and Reconstruction

44 West 90th Street

New York, N. Y.

THE Nation WITH Harpers Magazine

FOR ONLY $6.50

SEPARATELY $9

As a reader of The Nation you know you would not suffer the inconvenience of being without it. The Nation discloses the facts behind the news and interprets them from the progressive point of view. It scrutinizes every public development to show you why it is a stride forward or a step backward. It helps you understand thoroughly the headlines of today and prepares you for those of tomorrow.

Harpers Magazine, the perfect monthly complement to The Nation, not only offers its readers factual information and critical interpretation of our headlong times but it frequently predicts events before they happen. Nine times last year, in as many months, Harpers actually predicted important events which later became front page news!

Subscriptions to this popular combination may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Moreover, payment may be postponed thirty days. Order at once on the form below!

THE NATION,

20 Vesey Street,
New York City.

Name _____

Address _____

Enter my subscription for one year of Harpers Magazine and The Nation for $6.50. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY
PUBLICATION . . .

Two Articles on Affairs in Washington

The House Committee on Military Affairs is holding hearings on a new war-profits tax bill which pretends to place capital and drafted men on an equal footing. After violent debate the bill is expected to pass the House. In an article to appear soon Stephen Raushenbush, who directed the Munitions Investigations for Senator Nye, presents the features of the new bill and tags its many dangerous provisions.

"Chowderhead" Cohen heads the list of sensational characters exposed by the La Follette committee investigating civil liberties and interference with the right of labor to organize. Less publicized, but equally pernicious, are dozens of other expert spies and strike-breakers discovered by the indefatigable investigators. How does the committee obtain its facts, build up its case, and present it to the public? These questions are frequently asked by our readers, and they are now answered in a factual article by Dwight MacDonald.

Winter Books

In the leading book article in next week's Winter Book Number, M. E. Ravage discusses André Gide's "Retour de l'U. R. S. S.," the account of a journey to Soviet Russia which "stirred up a tempest of debate" and sold over a hundred thousand copies. In the same issue S. K. Ratcliffe reviews the two final volumes of Lloyd George's Memoirs, and John Gunther reviews Walter Millis's "Viewed Without Alarm"; other reviewers include Alice Beal Parsons, Eda Lou Walton, Mark Van Doren, and Meyer Schapiro.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year of The Nation for $5.00
☐ two years for $8.00 ☐ three years for $11.00 ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c

2-13-37

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

curiously enough, Stephen Spender. Mr. Gilbert, in other words, looks for greatness in poetry only to the mystic; Blake comes in for much misinterpretation as the ancestor of Jeffers. Mr. Gilbert finds in Jeffers's poetry a prophetic vision of a dying world, an indication of how the truly great individual may be perpetuated through an escape from humanity. He traces the analogies in Buddhist, Greek, and Christian thought with Jeffers's philosophical symbolism, and notes no confusion—though there is confusion—in Jeffers's use of symbols. The book is, moreover, rather badly written—vague, pieced together, and repetitious—and contains any number of (in my judgment) incorrect comments on other modern poets. It will please uncritical admirers of Jeffers and annoy many students of poetry who have noted his limitations. The Jeffers bibliography included is fairly complete.

EDA LOU WALTON

THE AESTHETIC THEORIES OF KANT, HEGEL AND SCHOPENHAUER. By Isreal Knox. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

The effort to transcribe succinctly and lucidly the meaning of thinkers who, like Kant and Hegel, are not always easy to follow, deserves praise and would deserve still more were there not many competent commentaries already available. The effort to extract from philosophies of art deeply rooted in general philosophic systems whatever is still valid and valuable is equally praiseworthy, even if sometimes one doubts that the original text contains what the author finds in it. And Mr. Knox's guiding faith in the intimate nexus between art and life, although not his discovery, gives his study a contemporaneity seldom found in academic dissertations. What is not praiseworthy is Mr. Knox's assumption that his own opinion of what constitutes the aesthetic experience is more objectively valid than the obviously subjective opinions of the thinkers about whom he writes. The difficulty lies in Mr. Knox's neglect of experimental data. But this neglect is so widely current among aestheticians whose training is philosophic that the reviewer has perhaps no right to castigate the author for a fault committed and seemingly condoned by a whole brotherhood.

ELISEO VIVAS

DARKLING PLAIN. By Sara Bard Field. Random House. $2.

An image here and there in these lyrics has the ring of direct observation. A line now and then is a limpid statement of genuine feeling. Miss Field can develop a verse form, and her poetry has a delicate music. Yet the general effect of the volume, the author's sixth, is one of redundancy and artifice. It is overburdened with tritely precious words like "argosy," "alabaster," "iridescent," "egrets," "bergamot," "attared," "basaltic." It is full of historical and mythological allusions that do not illuminate. It is poetry of fancy rather than of imagination, and fancy must be barbed. At its best Miss Field's fancy yields pleasant similes, as when she describes a vineyard as "a lately littered tigress stretched to sun"; at its worst, confused and disproportioned figures like

Then every other vintage memory
Was wiped as by a cyclone from the breast

In the shorter and sparer poems, such as Preparation and Wings, there is sufficient evidence of integrity to inspire the hope that Miss Field may yet learn to use the pruning hook. What she has given us here is not a darkling plain but a gloomy thicket.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

THE LETTERS OF MRS. HENRY ADAMS, 1865-1883.

Edited by Ward Thoron. Little, Brown. $5.

It took Marian ("Clover") Hooper nine months of the very closest of intimacies to succumb to the Henry Adams influence. Though she was on her honeymoon and though she was passing thirty, the weekly letters she wrote to her father in Boston during this time seem by a homesick little girl of half her age. Presently the letters pick up in spirits, and by the time she has passed her second winter in Washington they show all the wisdom, wit, and air of Adams himself. Marian assumed a role, and very successfully, for it is only occasionally in little asides about illness and death and ignorance that her make-up seems askew. Her husband was not an easy man to minister to; upon her fell all the details of a "choosy" social life in the capital and the chief burden of its "over-excitement" (a term used by Adams in one of his own letters of the period). Despite the galaxies of big names, the letters are entertaining, and the political comment, mostly a reflection of Henry's mind, is considerable. Thoron has set down his notes in great fulness, omitting nothing of consequence except the principal fact concerning Mrs. Adams's death.

PAUL BEXLER

DRAMA

If You Have Tears

JAMES HILTON'S popular novel "And Now Good-Bye" has been made into a play and presented at the John Golden Theater with Philip Merivale in the role of a very "cute" clergyman who loves and loses. Stories of this particular soft and decorously tearful sort are often extraordinarily popular with the largest novel-reading public, but they have also the power of exasperating persons of robuster taste to a degree which may seem unreasonable, and the present piece is no exception to the general rule. Those temperamentally incapable of enjoying a good cry are likely to come away in a state of irritation more or less acute.

The clergyman in question is a frustrated music lover who has somehow or other got himself mired in the trivial activities of a peculiarly repulsive middle-class parish in England. During a visit to London he meets a run-away girl on her way to study in Vienna, discovers in her the understanding all the rest of the world has denied him, and is eloping with her when a railroad accident kills the girl almost before his eyes. Numb with shock, he returns to his parish to find that he is a hero who has performed prodigies of valor while searching the wreckage for his beloved, and settles down to get what satisfaction he can out of the discovery that his parishioners "need him."

Obviously this somewhat labored bit of pathos is harmless enough as such things go, but it is also a perfect example of that sentimental tragedy which is, at best, only a very sickly counterpart of tragedy itself. It is sad and sweet and touching. It spreads a veritable feast of pathos and tenderness without at any moment challenging the spectator to feel very deeply or to rise to any robust emotion. And it can do all these things for the very reason that it removes from tragedy all its tonic elements and substitutes in their place something soothing and bland. The hero is not a great man but a good one. We are

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
(by arrangement with Sidney Harmon)

But for the Grace of God

by Leopold Atlas

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday and Saturday 2:45. Evs. 8:45

Maxwell Anderson's play

The Masque of Kings

with HENRY HULL, Dudley Digges, MARGO, Pauline Frederick

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday and Saturday 2:30. Evs. 8:30

OPENS WED. FEB. 17th

THEATRE UNION presents

MARCHING SONG

BY JOHN HOWARD LAWSON

An exciting drama with a stirring topical background of a sit-down strike in a company-owned automobile town.

BAYES Theatre, 44th St. W. of B'way, BR 9-3648. Evs. 8:40; Mats. Wed. and Sat. Prices: 45c, 60c, 75c, $1, $1.50. For Benefit-Theatre Party Rates Call BR 9-2375.

BOOKS

AN ENTIRELY NEW BOOK FOR TODAY'S NEEDS IN READING, WRITING, AND SPEAKING

The largest, latest abridgment of the New Merriam-Webster, WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY, Second Edition; characterized by the outstanding scholarship. Surpasses all other abridged dictionaries in authority, usefulness. 110,000 Entries; 1,800 Illustrations; 1,300 Pages. Thin-Paper Style, Indexed; Cloth, $3.50; Fabrikoid, $5.00; Leather, $7.00; Limp Pigskin (dark blue or natural), $8.50. Get the Best Handy-Sized Dictionary. Purchase of your bookseller, or send order and remittance direct to the publishers. Write for fascinating New Quiz and Picture Game—FREE.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO.
758 Broadway Springfield, Mass.

Behind the MOSCOW TRIAL

BY MAX SHACHTMAN

Editor of Trotsky's Works Paper 25c—Cloth $1.00

The WITCHCRAFT TRIAL in Moscow

BY FRIEDRICH ADLER

Sec'y of the Labor and Socialist International
With a Preface by NORMAN THOMAS
Including a Reply to D. A. Pritt 10c

WORLD VOICES on the Moscow Trial

A compilation of Liberal and Labor Opinion

15c

At your bookstore or from

PIONEER PUBLISHERS • 100 Fifth Avenue, New York

drawn to him not because he is strong but because he is weak. He ends not in rebellion but in acquiescence, and his defeat brings not exultation but tears. Even the issue is not clearly drawn but dodged, not too artfully, by the device of the convenient train wreck. Almost any other possible ending would have forced the audience and the author to face some alternative, to reach some emotional conclusion. Our hero might have himself chosen the way of renunciation or actually faced the realities of his choice. But either painful alternative is spared the audience, which now needs only to feel vaguely sorry. It has, if I may put the thing this way, the privilege of eating its cake and of having it too—of gratifying its momentary desire to see the clergyman rebel without being compelled to face the full meaning of its choice, because the girl was—happily for it—removed in time. And that, I think, is the most important of the reasons why sentimental tragedy is the most popular of all the forms of nursemaid fiction. It is something not to be called upon—as in genuine tragedy we are—to confront ourselves with men greater than ourselves and passions stronger than ours. But that is only a negative advantage. The genuine essence of sentiment is emotion without the responsibility of choice, the privilege of feeling uncritically, of enjoying tears which really cost us nothing.

Mr. Merivale plays his role with restraint. So does the very attractive Margaret Churchill as the run-away. For that matter the play itself, though a bit slow in movement, is written with more taste than is usually exhibited in compositions of this kind. But no restraint in playing and no taste in writing can save "And Now Good-Bye" from the fundamental sentimentality of the whole conception.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

Considering the Source

ALMOST invariably a film made from a novel or a play is inferior to its source, and this is never more noticeable than when the source was excellent in its own terms. It is difficult enough to produce a good film starting from scratch; but it seems impossible to start with something that has spoken clearly and powerfully in another language and then to find a new language for it which will induce us to forget the old ringing in our ears—or, if we happen to be ignorant of the original, to give us the illusion that this form was dictated by this matter. Usually there is self-consciousness in the direction, stiffness in the acting, and an absence of natural pace in the order of events. And when these faults are avoided there is likely to be a misuse or an overuse of irrelevant movie techniques—techniques which have their place but which are irrelevant here. There is no better way of understanding what a film ought to be than to watch one trying not to be a novel or a play and failing. A photograph of a play is not a film, yet it may be more satisfactory than some expensive mixture of the genres; and the more pains a producer takes to photograph either the physical or the mental background of a novel the more dismal his result will probably be. The audience pretends to be impressed, and may even believe that it is; but it does not lose itself in what it sees as it does at a "regular" movie—one, perhaps, that was suggested by a fifth-rate magazine story or that merely came out of an obscure Hollywood head.

"The Good Earth" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) fails in almost every conceivable way to be either as interesting as Mrs. Buck's novel or completely interesting in itself. There are several "good things" in it—the plague of locusts, the mob scene, and the acting of Luise Rainer as O-lan—without the whole thing being good; and that is what any work of art is expected to be. "The Good Earth" is two hours and a half long and seems longer; Paul Muni as Wang Lung never for a split second looks or sounds Chinese (even the Chinese actors do not seem at home); the action comes to a dead stop a dozen times; and the vast efforts to build China before our eyes gives us nothing corresponding to what Mrs. Buck's simple sentences, flowing like an endless river, left in our mind. I had the uncomfortable feeling throughout that I was present at a classic, and no performance in a theater, least of all in a movie theater, ought to permit such feelings. I mean, of course, a classic that someone has not understood how to translate. Nor do I wish to found my whole case against "The Good Earth" upon its failure to be an equivalent of Mrs. Buck's book. But a certain illusion created by the book, namely, that a great deal of time is passing and yet that the telling takes no time, is an illusion which any good film achieves by its own devices; and the devices seem not to have been discovered in the present case.

"The Plough and the Stars" (RKO-Radio) is another failure at translation, for another reason. In O'Casey's play the Irish uprising of 1916 happens offstage, partly because O'Casey could not put it on the stage and partly because he was more interested in doing something else—reflecting it in the domestic tensions set up among a few persons created for the purpose. Through Jack and Nora, not to mention Mrs. Gogan and Bessie Burgess, he made us believe that an intolerable war was going on downstairs and around the corner. The film, it scarcely needs be said, takes us to the war—to the besieged Post Office and the street in front of it, and later on to a hospital yard where the Irish leader is being executed in his wheel chair. These scenes are exciting in themselves. But they destroy the play because they destroy its tensions. Jack and Nora (Preston Foster and Barbara Stanwyck) become relatively minor, and even the five imported Abbey players, including Barry Fitzgerald as Fluther, are rather lost among the machine-guns. The best moments are those in which Fluther is photographed doing exactly what he did on the stage; which prompts the question whether it might have not been better after all to set the camera down before the play and keep it winding for two hours. It would have been still better to produce a veritable film which somehow was equivalent to the play; that, however, as I have been saying, seems to be discouragingly difficult.

Or take "Camille" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer), even with Greta Garbo in the title role and with the most accomplished direction (by George Cukor) always being flourished for us to admire. Now there is a flimsy play. But I shall remember the whole of it which I saw with Eva LeGallienne as Camille more agreeably than I shall remember these fragments of it in which the moving camera is so busy taking close-ups of Greta Garbo. Her acting is superb, particularly when she dies, but that is not the point. The point is that the techniques of the film are irrelevant to its total effect; and that a fine array of talent has been squandered on something which is actually less absorbing than any one of ten "regular" movies I could name.

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

The Franks in Madison

Dear Sirs: The charge that Philip La Follette was motivated in whatever part he may have played in the ouster of Glenn Frank from the presidency of the University of Wisconsin by personal dislike and jealousy of the man has been so widespread over the country that it should have ■■ answer. I should like to present ■ truer picture.

Mrs. La Follette's mother, Mrs. George Bacon, was the wife of ■ mining engineer in Salt Lake City. With five daughters and a small income, she was still able to give such direction and meaning to the social consciousness of that city that after her death the new Welfare Center established there was very fittingly named for her. Mrs. La Follette thus came naturally by ■ sense of social values which matched her husband's heritage. Through the early years of her marriage she did her own housework, took care of her baby herself, and still kept up with the affairs of the world about her, developed an understanding and appreciation of painting and music through disciplined study, and indulged her natural taste for literature. When she came to the governor's house she brought with her a gracious blending of simplicity and dignity which has made her home ■ focus for the intellectual and artistic life of the community. The Governor's salary is not large, $7,500 a year. During the depression he and his wife voluntarily gave back $1,250 a year to the state and yet kept up the social responsibilities of their position with no complaint of inadequate finances.

The city of Madison has among its citizens plenty of people of wealth, culture, and experience in the sophisticated conventions of city life, but they have never tried to graft the artificial social standards of New York's smart set on the life of their own city. They have quite consciously rejected such standards. Into this community the Franks deliberately and self-consciously introduced an entirely different scale of living—the first butler in the city, always seeming a bit embarrassed in his livery, an ostentation approaching vulgarity in the lavish formality of their dinner parties, an insistence that their son, ■ normal and likable youth, should be driven back and forth to his school ■ half-mile away by ■ chauffeur, when all the other fellows in the neighborhood walked, ■ watchman to guard them at night, a use of the craftsmen of the University Service Department as personal servants in a manner in which too often noblesse did not oblige, and so forth.

Such goings-on in Madison could be interpreted in only one of two ways—either the Franks were completely insensitive to the atmosphere in which they were living, implying in itself a tragic defect, or they were seeking by mere display to impress their fellow-citizens, an interpretation even more shocking in its implications. But the level-headed citizens of Madison were not only not impressed by all this; they were alternately convulsed and disgusted. Now all this may sound trivial, but it cannot be so easily discounted when one realizes that with it went only the most superficial attempt to understand the basic problems of American life, which were so accentuated by the hardships of the depression. Inevitably the Franks created a feeling throughout the state that as long as they were "sitting pretty," the rest of the world could go to. Needless to say, they were unable to make of their home anything even remotely resembling ■ center for the cultural enrichment of the community. The feeling of most of their fellow faculty members rapidly progressed from amazement through mere dislike to contempt.

So you have a picture of a community in which the La Follettes stood for one mode of life, the Franks for another—two modes of life eternally irreconcilable and epitomizing the two warring social philosophies of shared opportunity versus special privilege which are tearing the world to pieces. The newspapers have dared to say that Governor La Follette was jealous of Glenn Frank. That is, of course, a rank absurdity. But if the term dislike can be stretched to cover ■ thoroughly justified disapproval of the Franks' mode of life, I suppose one might say that the La Follettes did dislike them as did the great majority of the university faculty and the citizens of Madison and the state of Wisconsin. However, there is nothing petty in the term used in this sense nor does it require apology, for it developed inevitably from a righteous indignation that the Franks, as heads of ■ great educational institution that was trying to fire Wisconsin youth with ■ vision of what life might be at its best, should themselves appear to have only the most superficial social and intellectual standards.

Of course, the personal attitudes of the La Follettes and of the university faculty enter the picture only as a vivid background against which is projected Glenn Frank's indecision and evasion in handling the administrative problems of the university.

A FACULTY WIFE

Madison, Wis., January 26

Where Do Absentee Owners Stand?

Dear Sirs: Mr. Lovett's article in The Nation of January 30 must strike home to many readers who, ■ owners of ■ few shares of General Motors stock, wonder about their position as absentee owners. The public opinion of the community involved is always ■ factor in any struggle between capital and labor. But stockholders, scattered throughout the country, do not have even the minor influence of storekeepers and housewives in the immediate community. Should there not be some means by which these absentee owners could express their opinion of Mr. Sloan's refusal to accept the invitation of the Secretary of Labor to sit in on ■ conference?

Berle and Means have shown how the gulf between ownership and management gives ■ handful of men complete power over a structure which they do not own. In the great struggle which impends, as the C. I. O. continues its efforts to organize the unorganized workers, where will the absentee owners stand?

This question will doubtless be repeated for other companies than General Motors, other industries than the automobile. Many of the stockholders are workers. Doubtless ■ considerable number would approve the Lewis position rather than the Sloan one. It is their property and their profits that are involved, their employees who are being shot at. If a vote of the workers is suggested, why not a vote of the stockholders? Their vote at least could be private and free of intimidation.

LORINE PRUETTE

New York, February 4

The Secretary of War grabs the phone and says . . .

THE SECRETARY OF WAR grabs the phone and says . . . let 'er go! Pouf! Our American liberties go up in smoke. Mauritz Hallgren . . . former associate editor of The Nation reveals the serious implications of the Industrial Mobilization Bill up before Congress in this session—a bill that will undoubtedly become the law of the land, UNLESS we, the American people. . . .

Whither the Supreme Court?

WHAT is behind the newspaper headlines proclaiming that President Roosevelt wishes to enlarge the Supreme Court? Is the president really trying to make the court responsible to the people? If so, is this an effective way of doing it? Let Osmond K. Fraenkel, nationally known authority on constitutional law, an attorney for the Scottsboro boys, answer these and many other far reaching questions about the highest court in the land. A brilliant and thought provoking article.

GET THE FACTS IN

THE FIGHT

AMERICA'S ANTI-WAR, ANTI-FASCIST MAGAZINE THAT PRINTS ALL THE FACTS

THE two remarkable articles described above are not special features, though they would be in almost any other magazine. They are typical of the contents you will find in THE FIGHT every month.

The most important, best informed writers and newspapermen publish in THE FIGHT the articles that other papers or magazines refuse to print. In the last issues these names appeared over specially written articles:

George Seldes, Sherwood Anderson, John L. Lewis, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Heywood Broun, Dr. George A. Coe, Emily Greene Balch, Matthew Josephson, H. C. Engelbrecht, Marion Cuthbert, Robert Morss Lovett, Agnes Smedley, Oscar Ameringer, Rose M. Stein.

THE FIGHT is a large, beautifully illustrated five-color magazine. It brings you the best work of top-notch writers and the finest illustrators. It tells you what the Fascists and war-mongers are doing here and abroad, and it tells you what is being done to stop them.

It appears monthly. Thirty-two pages or more. And nearly forty thousand readers get it every month. Yet it does not cost five dollars a year . . . nor three dollars a year. The coupon below will bring you a full year of THE FIGHT for a single dollar! Almost four hundred giant pages for a dollar! Act now.

Not $5, Not $3, BUT $1.00

THE FIGHT

271 Fourth Avenue, Room 702, New York City
I enclose $1 for a year's subscription to THE FIGHT.

Name

Address

City and State

Blue Ribbon

Dear Sirs: Whichever one of you wrote that editorial on the Soviet trials deserves a blue ribbon for the fairest analysis of a complicated controversy I've seen in years.

ROGER BALDWIN

New York, February 5

October Is Safe

Dear Sirs: Your editorial on the latest Moscow trial strikes me as an interesting study in the hypnotic effect of revolution on decent people. If the trial had taken place in Germany, The Nation would surely have repudiated it at once, without indulging in any rationalization about the difference between Nazi and Anglo-Saxon concepts of justice. But because this thing happened in the Soviet Union, The Nation adopts an attitude of Olympian impartiality, and proceeds by implication to indorse or at least condone the whole questionable procedure. Why? I assume because it is afraid that any genuine criticism of the Stalinist regime may be construed as an attack upon the Soviet Union and the October Revolution—as if a Nation editorial could hurt Niagara Falls!

I shall not be surprised if within ten years The Nation's left-handed indorsement of Stalin's liquidation of the October Revolution is something that its editors would prefer to forget. For it may just possibly be that the true friends of the Soviet Union are the people who either repudiate these recurrent "blood-purges" or at least really "suspend judgment," and not those who accept the Stalinist justification with or without a protective show of pseudo-liberal hocus-pocus. If liberal journalism has any function at present it is that of clear analysis and fair judgment. Your editorial never once strikes below the surface of the political situation of which the trials are symptomatic, and in dealing with the surface it is either naive or disingenuous.

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

New York, February 5

For Jewish-Arab Amity

Dear Sirs: The six terrible months from which Palestine has just emerged have left hundreds of dead and thousands of wounded. Economic losses mount into the tens of millions. The country has been torn into two warring camps.

"Antifa," the only international organization in Palestine, has unfurled the banner of the solidarity of the Jewish and Arab toiling masses and proclaims to the whole world: There is room in Palestine for both peoples, and there is a basis for their cooperation.

A special delegation from Palestine, the first Jewish-Arab delegation ever to visit this country, appeals to all unions, fraternal organizations, and clubs, to all workers and intellectuals, to rally to the support of Antifa. Help Antifa in its struggle against restrictions upon Jewish immigration to Palestine, for the admittance of Arab workers into the Histadruth, against Arab and Jewish fascism, imperialism and war. Help Antifa in its efforts to build Jewish-Arab cultural clubs and cooperative enterprises. Help it establish a progressive press.

Among the sponsors of Antifa here are Roger Baldwin, B. J. Bialostotsky, Morris R. Cohen, John Haynes Holmes, Sidney Hook, H. Levick, Ludwig Lore, Norman Thomas, Ernst Toller, James W. Wise, and R. Zuckerman.

Send your contributions to P. L. Goldman, Treasurer, 305 Broadway, New York.

CHARLES B. SHERMAN,

Secretary

New York, February 5

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES R. WALKER, a journalist and editor, is the author of "Steel, the Diary of a Furnace Worker." He will bring out in March a new book, "American City," a study of class conflict in Minneapolis.

MILTON S. MAYER was a reporter on the Chicago American until lately, when he resigned to become a free-lance journalist. He recently contributed to The Nation an account of the Newspaper Guild in Chicago.

AGNES SMEDLEY has been active in the radical movement in China for ten years, has served as secretary to Mme. Sun Yat-sen and with her founded the Chinese League for Civil Rights, and is the author of "China's Red Army Marches" and other books on China.

ELBERT LENROW, the translator and editor of "The Letters of Richard Wagner to Anton Pusinelli," is giving a course on the social backgrounds of world literature at the New School for Social Research.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One Year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 20, 1937

NUMBER 8

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

197

EDITORIALS:

THE AUTOMOBILE VICTORY

199

NEUTRALITY MAKES WARS

200

THE COURT AND FASCISM

200

LOVE FROM ALL

201

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

202

THE C. I. O. MOVES ON by Benjamin Stolberg

203

FLOODS CAN BE CONTROLLED by James Rorty

205

MR. AYLESWORTH MOVES AHEAD

by Ruth Brindze

208

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

209

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

WHAT GOOD IS REVOLUTION? by M. E. Ravage

210

LLOYD GEORGE SEES IT THROUGH by S. K. Ratcliffe

211

GENTLEMEN MAY CRY PEACE by John Gunther

212

DISCORD IN EXPERIENCE by Eda Lou Walton

214

A TWELVE-CYLINDER IDYL by Mark Van Doren

214

THE IRON MAIDEN by William Troy

216

BIOGRAPHY OF A RIVER by Alice Beal Parsons

216

PUSHKIN THE MAN by Avrahm Yarmolinsky

218

AMERICAN PEACE MOVEMENT

by Oswald Garrison Villard

219

FOR THE DEFENSE by Maxwell Geismar

220

DRAMA: THE DEATHS OF KINGS

by Joseph Wood Krutch

221

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

223

The Shape of Things

★

THE TIDE IN THE SUPREME COURT BATTLE is turning in the President's favor. Those who doubt his strength should read Paul Ward's dispatch in this issue. And those who fear it should read our editorial.

★

P. J. PHILIP'S HYPOTHESIS, WIRED TO THE New York Times from Paris, that Germany and Italy are about to withdraw from Spain does not make sense. We prefer James M. Minifie's more realistic suggestion in the Herald Tribune that Germany and Italy have struck a bargain to allow Mussolini a "free hand in Spain" while Germany turns to Austria and Czechoslovakia. Anne O'Hare McCormick, who knows more of what is in Mussolini's mind than do most foreigners, tells the Times readers that "in private Mussolini does not pretend to be fighting the red menace." If Mussolini really intended to retire with only a few mining concessions, one wonders why he went into Spain at all. It was after signing the Anglo-Italian "gentlemen's agreement" that he sent tens of thousands of troops to Spain and boasted that his men won the Battle of Malaga. Mr. Philip offers no explanation of why the Duce should suddenly have changed his tactics. Our doubts about Mr. Philip's interpretation are increased when he says that Russia too "has lost interest" in Spain because "the effort to establish communism among the Spaniards is not going to succeed." When Mr. Philip speaks of Russia's loss of interest he does not know what he is talking about.

★

CONTRARY TO MR. PHILIP'S VIEW, WHICH allowed the Times headline to say, "Powers Will Drop Neutrality to Let Franco Win," M. Blum is subject to tremendous pressure to end the farce of neutrality and help the Spanish government. His warning to Italy that he will not tolerate an "open invasion of Spain" was in response to this pressure. But he must reckon with England, and England is playing a complicated game. Powerful elements in British politics prefer Franco to Caballero. Louis Fischer wired The Nation from Valencia on January 10 that he "would not be surprised to see a move to eliminate Hitler and Mussolini followed by a [British] attempt to democratize Franco" in order to make his cause palatable to British public opinion. This would be the ideal British solution, but it must not yet be mistaken for a reality.

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROWN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

THERE IS NOBILITY AMONG LABOR SPIES. WE do not refer to the fact that "finks" are also known as "nobles." We are thinking of the officials of the Pinkerton National Detective Agency, who, according to their counsel, will not reveal the names of operatives because they "cannot find it in their consciences to let these men down." That will be a comfort to workers who have been "hooked" and let down by the king of the Pinkertons and his nobles. We doubt whether even the Pinkerton operative as he slides bright-eyed and sharp-eared through the interstices of industry will sleep much better for the reassurance. Meanwhile it is interesting to note some of the things the Pinkertons found it in their consciences to do. They spied on Edward McGrady, Assistant Secretary of Labor. They "got around" a Wisconsin law so that their operatives could spy on workers at the Chevrolet Motor Car Company in a Wisconsin town. This, indeed, was a small favor to perform for General Motors, considering that that corporation bought $839,764 worth of assorted espionage from Pinkerton in the eighteen months preceding July 31, 1936. It is quite apparent that the Pinkertons will take any assignment, including the White House. No Congressman can fail to support the request of the La Follette committee for a new and generous appropriation.

★

MAGISTRATE HENRY H. CURRAN IS TO BE congratulated for acquitting James T. Farrell and "A World I Never Made" of the charges of obscenity. We found his decision a delightful discourse on life and literature. It belongs with Judge Woolsey's judicial masterpiece on "Ulysses."

★

TALK OF A LOAN TO GERMANY IS CURRENT still despite the enormous obstacles in the way. Among these are the Johnson Act, forbidding loans to European defaulting countries, Germany's dismal record on past loans, and American hostility to the Nazi regime. Yet Chairman Pittman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was quoted in the Wall Street Journal on January 20 as favoring American financial aid to Germany, and several big American bankers have made similar statements. There are persistent rumors that Sir Walter Runciman's visit to the White House had a German loan as one of its purposes. In fact, England has been the spearhead of the whole movement. A sign of this is the formation in London of a firm called Compensation Brokers, Ltd., for the purpose of extending raw-material credits to Germany. Great Britain holds a larger stake in Germany today than any other European country—a half-billion-dollar stake in short-term commercial debt that is tied up under the standstill agreement. That may be adequate reason for British pro-Nazism. What we resent is the attempt by British economists to sell America the idea that unless Hitler is helped with raw materials he will be driven into war. On the contrary, Germany cannot go to war unless it obtains food and raw materials financed by American capital.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE TRANSMITTING to Congress the report of the Great Plains Committee is academically unexceptionable. He grasps the real problem and outlines the real solution in terms of the cooperation of federal, state, regional, and local agencies. We anxiously await the project of law that is to transmit this excellent theory into action. It is possible that after the scourging of the drought the state and local governments will be ready to join in such a cooperative enterprise, even though the indicated relocation of population will mean the abandonment of hope for many villages and towns formerly dominated by inveterate boosters. But there is no time to be lost. Sooner or later we shall have a series of years of fair rainfall, and the sentiment of the prairies will turn against any kind of planned use of land that does not permit the maximum production of wheat and the maximum of grazing.

★

PRESIDENT CARDENAS OF MEXICO HAS succeeded in opening the Catholic churches of the province of Vera Cruz after a dramatic but brief struggle with Miguel Aleman, governor of the province. Contrary to the popular impression, Cárdenas has always sought reconciliation with the church. It was largely through his efforts that the Gold Shirts, semi-fascist bands which sought popularity through anti-Catholic terrorism much as the Nazis utilized anti-Semitism, were outlawed and crushed. In important sections of the country, including Mexico City, complete freedom of worship has always existed. Cárdenas has constantly sought to enlarge this area by refusing to enforce the restrictions on worship embodied in federal law. But until this week he has not dared interfere in the provinces, where the working-class and progressive elements in the population are most firmly anti-Catholic. It would be pleasant to believe that his act was in response to a definite pledge by the Catholics to refrain from political activity, but it appears much more like a bid on the part of Cárdenas for Catholic support in the event of a military revolt.

★

NATIONAL SHARE-CROPPERS WEEK WILL BE celebrated from March 1 to 7. Meanwhile it is well to have the report of the Farm Tenancy Committee, which is in many respects a hopeful document. In recommending the creation of a new agency built along the lines of the Resettlement Administration, it avoids the danger of placing the tenants at the mercy of an unsympathetic Department of Agriculture. The recommendation that arbitration committees be set up in the various states to settle disputes between landlords and tenants is at least a recognition that share-croppers and tenants have legal rights which should be defended. Similarly, the suggestion that states repeal their laws making it a misdemeanor for tenants to quit their contracts is excellent, although there still remains the task of getting the states to act. But the proposal to solve the basic problem by allowing tenants to buy farms from the government with forty years to pay is pitifully inadequate. It was suggested by one member of the committee that $10,000,000 would be needed annually for 3,000,000 tenants—about $3 per family per year. And even for those who get the land, the benefit will be dubious. A small plot may support a family in good years, but the small farmer, lacking mechanized equipment, cannot compete on equal terms with the large landowner. In bad years he gets into debt or starves. Larger units, cooperatively owned, which would permit diversification of crops and the full use of mechanized aids, would seem the only real solution.

★

ANOTHER INTERNATIONAL CARTEL WAS born when an agreement was recently concluded in Tokyo between the American Cotton Textile mission and representatives of the Japanese cotton-cloth manufacturers. On a yardage basis Japanese shipments are only 1 per cent of our total domestic production of cotton goods. But their exports are growing rapidly, and the price difference between their cheaper products and ours presents a pressing problem. The Japanese agreed at Tokyo to limit their exports to a fixed yardage during the next two years, it being assumed that the higher prices resulting from the agreement would make up for the loss in volume. America has had ample experience with other cartels—in aluminum, chemicals, copper, nitrates, and rayon. In each case prices have been raised to an uneconomic level. The consumer's last protection—the competition of cheaper foreign imports—is now stripped from him in yet another industry. The problem is a difficult one to solve. But one thing we may be clear about. A private trade association should not take it upon itself to decide what imports the United States is to have.

★

CHARLES SEYMOUR WAS SURPRISED WHEN the Yale Corporation selected him to be president of Yale University. We are less so. He had often been mentioned for the post, along with Dean Furniss of the Graduate School, Professor Rogers of the Law School, and President Hutchins of Chicago, and he had generally been conceded the inside track. He comes of the American intellectual elite, who have always supported the holders of economic power. His great-uncle and his great-great-grandfather were both presidents of Yale. He was an intimate of Colonel House, participated in the Versailles fiasco, and since then as a historian has interpreted America's entrance into the war in legalistic rather than economic terms. He comes into a position of great influence and responsibility at a time when the discussion of the causes of America's entrance into the last war will for some years have an immense bearing upon America's entrance into the next. Thorstein Veblen once wrote a brilliant book called "The Higher Learning in America: A Memorandum on the Conduct of the Universities by Business Men." There is nothing in Provost Seymour's career which makes him from such a point of view an unsafe choice.

The Automobile Victory

THE COMMITTEE for Industrial Organization and the United Automobile Workers of America have won an important victory, though the settlement was fitted with face-saving devices to provide all concerned—including the unhappy press—with easy exits from sundry diehard positions. General Motors can deny that it has given the U. A. W. sole bargaining power in twenty plants, but the union has the guaranty of General Motors—to Governor Murphy—that for six months the company will not negotiate with any other group in the twenty struck plants without consulting the Governor, and the union recognizes that guaranty as practical recognition. The agreement to withdraw the Gadola injunction renders the first legal offensive against the sit-down null and void, and establishes that device as accepted strategy in labor struggles. Strikers are to be reinstated without discrimination, and what is even more important, unionists are to be allowed to wear their buttons in the plants, thereby making espionage unnecessary.

The terms of the settlement fit neatly into the context of Benjamin Stolberg's article (page 203), which was written just before the peace was signed. We refer our readers to his illuminating analysis of the play of forces, economic and political, which produced the C. I. O.'s first major treaty with mass-production industry.

This first victory will no doubt come to seem slight as well as historic. Its importance for the present can best be appreciated by reflecting upon the state of organization in the automobile industry just a year ago. It is in this light also that labor will judge the preposterous and treacherous statements of William Green, whose sabotage of unionization in the automobile industry started with the Great Sell-Out in 1934 and continued until he and his henchmen lost control a few months ago. His attacks on the C. I. O. at this juncture confirm Mr. Stolberg's statement that from now on the A. F. of L. executive council will function in the labor movement mainly as a breaker of strikes.

As we have indicated, the six months' clause of the automobile settlement is the crucial one. It means that the U. A. W. has a free hand to complete its organization without the interference of such company-inflated dragons as the Flint Alliance; and it has won sufficient prestige in the offensive just concluded to make its conquest relatively easy. The fact that Flint, queen city of the General Motors kingdom, was faced with a serious relief problem when the strike was only three weeks old is eloquent evidence of the kind of security the "loyal" automobile worker has enjoyed.

We congratulate Mr. Lewis on his generalship; but we reserve our warmest greetings for the workers' army in the automobile towns. According to competent observers they conducted their first major battle with a discipline and efficiency worthy of far more experienced unionists.

Mr. Knudsen, who appears to be something of a worker himself, can now "have peace and make motor cars." Steel is next.

Neutrality Makes Wars

NEUTRALITY is frequently regarded as a means of preventing wars. This gives it its popular appeal. A simple common-sense analysis, however, must show that neutrality leads to war.

Historians of the first World War agree that if Foreign Minister Edward Grey of Great Britain had made it clear in July, 1914, that England would aid an attacked France, Germany might not have opened hostilities. The possibility of British neutrality encouraged the Kaiser. In exactly the same way the hope of American neutrality will encourage a potential aggressor.

If Germany were certain that England and America would remain aloof from the next international struggle, war would perhaps be upon us already. The chief and unchanging purpose of Nazi foreign policy is to neutralize Great Britain. With London neutral and Washington indifferent, France or any other victim of Germany would be at the mercy of a sudden offensive.

Such a neutrality as is advocated by the American isolationists has been Hitler's greatest hope. He rejects collective security. Instead of wanting to have all countries guarantee the peace, he urges that when hostilities break out between two states "the other nations withdraw at once from both sides." Hitler insists on the "localizing of smaller conflicts." He regards this as the essence of complete neutrality. Only the aggressor and the attacked fight. The others sit and watch. Germany marches into Czecho-Slovakia. Russia, France, and England remain neutral. Germany wins the war. Next Germany violates Poland. The powers maintain an Olympic passivity. France's turn would be next and then England's. Neutrality followed to its natural and logical conclusion means the end of international law and the collapse of diplomacy. It is wind in the sails of aggressors.

Hitler advocates neutrality because he wants to pave his way to military victory. And American pacifists advocate neutrality because they do not understand this and the other realities of the world situation. They see the formal side and think there is nothing more to it. They think neutrality will keep us out of war.

If we examine the latest crisis in international affairs we shall see how fallacious is the entire theory of effective neutrality. France, England, the United States, and the small powers are all neutral with respect to Spain. The result is that Germany and Italy can be as active as they please and actually send in troops to capture Spanish cities. The Soviet aid to the legal Spanish government has not caused the conflict to spread.

Suppose Great Britain, France, Czecho-Slovakia, the Scandinavian countries, Russia, and the United States, all sympathized with democratic Spain and wanted it to win. That would be enough to force Germany and Italy to retire. Germany is weak from a social, financial, economic, and, relatively, even from a military standpoint. Mussolini's fervor for German domination in Spain is not excessive. A firm diplomatic stand by the present neutrals would suffice to expel the aggressors and achieve real neutrality. The present partial neutrality vis-a-vis Spain has fostered fascist aggression.

A notice by the great powers for Germany and Italy to get out of Spain would not lead to international war. Those two countries took a chance because they had learned to know the flabbiness of democratic diplomacy. Together they are as nothing against the united forces of non-fascist governments. If they were made to feel that the others meant it, they would listen. But they despise and laugh at the non-interventionists. Non-intervention is neutrality, and non-intervention has been Hitler's and Mussolini's windfall. To scrap neutrality is not to catapult all into war. It is to bring peace by proving to the fascists that they cannot get away with their aggressive acts.

Early in January France was frightened by suspicious German activity in Morocco. Paris rapped on the table, rapped hard, and within twenty-four hours Hitler made a statement disavowing any intention of digging himself into Morocco. Today France may be poised for similar decisiveness in the whole Spanish problem. Germany and Italy have already sent to Spain too many troops for the comfort of the French People's Front. France will not act without Britain. This means that it will have to overcome English obstructions. But if both countries do move against Italian-German aggression in Spain, they can end the civil war soon. Similar situations would arise very seldom for the United States, but an unneutral America could, without moving a single man or gun, work for peace and social progress.

The Court and Fascism

THE tory hysteria over the court issue surpasses even the memorable hysteria of Mark Sullivan and Mrs. Preston Davie during the campaign. All Mr. Roosevelt's old enemies are at him again—the Liberty Leaguers and their lawyers, the public-utility barons, the hirers of spies, the big industrialists who own the newspapers. To be sure, they are staying in the background. They find it better policy to leave the center of the stage to conservative Democrats and to liberals like Borah and Norris. About the Glasses and the Baileys and the Kings and the Clarks we are not worried. Their opposition does honor to Roosevelt. But for liberals like Norris and Wheeler to join them shows the density of the smoke screen which the press has raised, and betrays the basic liberal confusion over the issue.

The liberal objections to the President's proposal take a variety of forms. On the radical extreme it is argued that it does not go far enough and does not really remove the obstruction of judicial power. We agree, but as we pointed out in our editorial last week, this is an "all or nothing" position which plays into the hands of the tories. A good solution for such liberals is to tie their support of the President's proposal to a movement for a constitutional amendment.

On the other extreme there are the liberals who feel that the President goes too far in his assault on the judicial power. This is variously phrased. The President, we are told, is seeking to "pack" the court. Also, he is attacking judicial independence. Also, he is insulting old age. Most of these views are based on a hazy notion, which is utterly untrue, that the President is adopting an unconstitutional method. And those who see that the President's proposal would offer a speedy and constitutional solution insist nevertheless that it is psychologically a step toward fascism and dictatorship. For, they argue, if Mr. Roosevelt can accustom the people to such an assault on the judicial power, what may not another President accustom them to in the future?

The issue of the Supreme Court and fascism should be faced frankly. Dictatorship involves the substitution of personal government for a government of laws. Its soil is economic confusion and governmental deadlock. Its method is a ruthless scrapping of constitutional provisions and the use of force to override the popular will. Its object is to smash the democratic institutions which stand in the way of the ruling plutocracy.

There is not the slightest sign of such a dictatorship in Mr. Roosevelt's proposal. On the contrary, we regard it as one of the necessary steps in blocking the road to fascism. The most sharply personal government we have had has been government by judiciary—a personal government in the sense that it has allowed a few men to read their own social and economic views into the Constitution. The soil of economic chaos out of which fascism grows has been amply supplied by the court's refusal to allow national action for economic control. The most serious governmental deadlock in the last two years of crisis has been that between representatives of the people on the one hand and a group of justices appointed for life on the other. The real philosophy of fascism is the philosophy that has breathed through the opinions of Justices McReynolds and Roberts.

Let the liberals remove the tory-made blinders from their eyes. The issue is one of democracy versus a possible fascism. But the side of Congress and the President is the side of democracy.

Love from All

THE era of good feeling, after a curiously elusive career, has at last received encouragement. We refer to the advertisement of Morris Ernst's book "The Ultimate Power" which appeared in the Times one morning last week. It was a statement signed by fourteen well-known publishers "heartily recommending" the book of a rival firm and adding that "whereas we, individually, may not agree with any or all of Mr. Ernst's conclusions, we consider it a timely and important work." Now here is a new spirit inaugurated by Doubleday, Doran, publishers of "The Ultimate Power," which, if widely used, would soften the edge of fratricidal strife and breathe new sweetness into a crabbed world.

For example, in the midst of all the current turmoil a statement to the press such as the following would have a soothing influence: "We, the undersigned, wish to express our entire confidence in Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt. After all, he is only fifty-five and doesn't know any better. Signed, the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, and the New York Herald Tribune."

A little touch of friendliness will do much to heal old wounds and lay the foundations for a more brotherly feeling in the future. A real beau geste would be a notice to this effect: "Fisher No. 1 and Fisher No. 2 present their compliments to Messrs. Sloan, Knudsen, du Pont, du Pont, du Pont, and du Pont, and to Mr. John L. Lewis, Governor Murphy, Madam Secretary Perkins, and the National Guard and request the pleasure of their company at a dinner on the premises at half after eight o'clock. Black tie. N.B., bring your own drinks."

We might also recommend that Eugene O'Neill, Philip Barry, George Kaufman, Marc Connelly, and others, instead of sulking in their tents, write a friendly note to Noel Coward and Maxwell Anderson along these lines: "Look, boys, enough is enough. Nine plays for one of you and three for the other, all running at the same time, begin to look like you're establishing a monopoly of Broadway. After all, there is such a thing as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act."

Nor need the spread of good-will be limited to this country. It is the season of happy sentiment, and this could be taken advantage of to improve international relations. In some such fashion:

TO JOE STALIN

Through with all our past dissemblin',
Lovesick hearts, we hail the Kremlin.
Echo sounds from Rome to Rhine,
Comrade, be our Valentine.

FROM BENITO, ADOLF, AND PIUS XI.

Indeed, conditions abroad provide many splendid opportunities for the exercise of the Doubleday, Doran good-will treatment. For instance, "A Manifesto to the Communist Red Army of China. We are miserable sinners unworthy of the trust and hope placed in us by the Chinese people. In deepest humiliation we admit we have failed in our duty and made example of our weaknesses and trespasses. Our only consolation is that perhaps you are no better than we are. Signed, Generals Chiang, Chang, Feng, Cheng, Yang, Wang, Ho, and Hu."

Or we suggest the following letter: "Dear Mrs. Simpson: We wonder if you would care to accept an offer, accompanied by suitable remuneration, to deliver a course of lectures through the medium of the Broadcasting Company on 'Homemaking in England.' Cordially yours, Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister; Cosmo Gordon Lang, Archbishop of Canterbury; Sir John Reith, President of B. B. C."

Or how about a telegram addressed to Premier Largo Caballero, Madrid. "Having a wonderful time stop wish you were here. Signed, Franco, Mola, Quiapo de Llano."

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Roosevelt Will Win

Washington, February 14

IN THE welter of debate and speculation over Roosevelt's plan for giving the Supreme Court a blood transfusion, one vital thing seems rapidly to be dropping out of sight. This is the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is going to get what he wants. His mathematics may have to undergo some changes. The number of justices may not be increased to fifteen and the retirement age may have to be pegged a bit higher than seventy. But when all the shouting and the tumult dies, the nation will find that Roosevelt has at last achieved his objective.

Already the tide has begun to run strongly in Roosevelt's favor. The flow of protest letters on embossed stationery has begun to peter out, and the folks who really elected the present Congress are beginning to be heard from. And they will be heard from in increasing numbers now that Senator La Follette has gone on the air in defense of the President's proposal and has been followed by that wily orator, Attorney General Cummings. As soon as the situation is ripe, Roosevelt himself will go to the country on the issue, and then there will be nothing left to do but see which of the justices decides to be lead-off man on the retirement list. Organized labor this past week began bringing up its batteries in Roosevelt's support, and now that John L. Lewis is back from the General Motors war there will be some effective cannonading from that salient. The farm organizations, beautifully disciplined by Secretary Wallace, also began this past week to move their battalions up from the rear. In another week or two the success of Roosevelt's program in the House will be past doubt. Only the Senate will remain as a battleground, and there the battle is already half won. One young sage who sits in the Senate press gallery summed up the situation precisely when he said, "It's the lawyer in the Senators that turns them against the President's plan and it's the politician in them that makes them for it, and, Brother, there's more politician in them than lawyer."

This was just another way of saying that most of the Senators know, even as you and I, that the people to whom they must look for reelection snicker at senility in high places and have none of the awful respect for courts and judges that John W. Davis, Newton D. Baker, Dave Reed, Herbert Hoover, Moo-cow Borah, and Carter Glass affect to have. Even the Tories so piously ranting in defense of the Supreme Court's sanctity are completely aware that the electorate is not on their side. Their desperate efforts to keep the Liberty League and Alf Landon out of the fight are a part of that realization. It takes something worse than a knave and less than a fool to forget that from the republic's beginnings judges have been suspect with the men and women who labor for a living. It takes no masterly rhetoric from a President to persuade organized labor that judges are all too human; union men and women and the non-union men and women who work beside them have built up through personal experience the doctrine that the courts are "with the corporations." Nor is it an exclusively proletarian doctrine. Those very Nestors of the bar who now assail the President for treating the Supreme Court realistically would fire any junior member of their law firm who failed to choose a "friendly" court for trial of an important case. Every practitioner before the Supreme Court begins his argument with an unspoken assumption that nothing he can say will turn certain of the justices there against his client or win others over to his side.

These notions are so widely held that it is hard to see how defenders of the status quo can hope to defeat Roosevelt's plan by a resort at this late date to sanctification of the courts and deification of the men who earn their livings in them. Their efforts to do so can only play into the President's hands. As in the campaign of 1936, he has only to sit back and let his enemies win for him, and if he were more or less a gentleman than he is, he already would be installing in the White House offices a battery of stenographers sending out thank-you letters to all those publishers and high-priced shysters who have invoked the shibboleths and alignments of 1936 in another attempt to lick him. What truth there is in their argument cannot prevail against what most of the electorate regard as a greater truth: that most of the judges of our courts do not belong on the bench. And the truth is on Roosevelt's side.

The important thing for liberals, radicals, and progressives to seize upon is that, if the scareheads of the press and the thunder of the Tories frighten them into unqualified support of the President's program, they will have lost another grand opportunity. It is the opportunity to pry out of Roosevelt as a price for their support a pledge committing him to fight for an amendment to the Constitution to safeguard the public will against the prejudices of the future Supreme Court majority. The opportunity will last only so long as there is an element of uncertainty about the outcome of his fight for power to remold the court. I think it is big enough at the moment to allow not only a constitutional-amendment pledge to be obtained but also some definite commitments on new legislation. That legislation must encompass more than a few frowsy enactments with respect to minimum wages and maximum hours. There must be a frontal attack on the corporate devices by which prices are jacked up so that the wage-earner's share in the fruits of his labor remains stationary.

The C. I. O. Moves On

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Washington, February 9

THE Committee for Industrial Organization was conceived in the American Federation of Labor convention in San Francisco in 1934. And in spite of all the abortive efforts of Drs. Green, Frey, Woll, and Hutcheson it was born in Washington in November, 1935. It started out with ten unions and a little over a million members. Today it has fifteen unions, though two of them are affiliated only through their officers, and it is rapidly approaching a membership of two million. Numerically it is almost as large as the A. F. of L., 25 per cent of whose membership exists only on paper. It has profoundly stirred the working masses. And it is shaking the basic industries.

I

I doubt whether any of us—labor leaders or students and reporters of labor—emotionally appreciated the psychological forces which the mere change in the formal organization of labor from craft separatism to industrial unionism would release. To be sure, we have long had some industrial unions, the United Mine Workers and the two great needle trades. But they were merely encysted in the body of craft unionism. The most remarkable thing in modern American labor history is that John L. Lewis and Sidney Hillman and David Dubinsky have gone off their "jurisdictional" reservations and set out to organize other workers than their own. They are now thinking and acting in terms of American labor as a whole—economically, politically, and socially. This new industrial-union drive means the organization of vast masses of workers in technologically automatized industries, workers who have borne the brunt of the depression and who are socially angry if not personally class conscious. In short, the very form of the organizational drive of the C. I. O. has released a militancy such as American labor has never known in its history.

Not that American labor had never been militant. Nothing but militancy ever organizes labor. The A. F. of L. in the eighties and nineties, the Wobblies in the early part of this century invariably organized workers through militancy. But when they lost a strike, the leaders could always afford to disappoint the rank and file because the issues involved were local and limited. The A. F. of L. bureaucrats went back to their offices; the Wobblies went back to their dreams. You can afford to lose a melee in guerrilla warfare. You cannot afford to lose a campaign in a modern war. During the second half of its existence the A. F. of L. invariably dropped the strikes it failed in. It just pulled out. There were always enough dues-paying members to support the hierarchy. And the strikes they called and dropped were limited to the personnel they let down. But when you pull strike in steel or in automobiles, then you affect both these industries and many others besides. You risk interfering with the business cycle and antagonizing large sections of public opinion. And you endanger the interlocking directorates of General Motors and the House of Morgan. You are not stepping on a cat; you are pushing a lion around. And you have to be ready for a fight.

The leaders in the automobile strike could not be other than intransigent because they could not let down the rank and file without a complete smash-up. That is why they repudiated the Lansing agreement when General Motors broke it by announcing that the company would deal with the Flint Alliance, its own stooge. The A. F. of L. would have accepted this breach of faith as a "victory." The C. I. O. repudiated the agreement because multiple representation is impossible under industrial unionism.*

This new militancy, of course, has its dangers. Probably the greatest internal difficulty of the C. I. O. will lie in the need to discipline without quenching the militancy of the workers. The strength of the sitdown lies in the fact that its spirit is catching. And its danger to labor lies in the same fact. Without strong union discipline a sitdown may be started at any time by a group of hot-headed workers, or by a nest of stool pigeons. It can be used at any moment to sabotage contractual relations after a strike has been settled. Hence the new rule in the automobile union that there must be no sitdown strike without express permission from the local executive committee.

The automobile strike was not a runaway, but there is no doubt that the C. I. O. prefers to go ahead as it has done in steel. In that industry the C. I. O. has proceeded with a powerful, militant, yet cautious organization campaign, sucking into itself the company unions and organizing some 80,000 workers whose membership cannot be doubted. All along, of course, the C. I. O. has been busily and effectively organizing in rubber, in automobiles, in the oil fields. The U. A. W. has silent agreements with Chrysler, Studebaker, Nash, White, Pierce-Arrow. It has effectively broken the hold of Father Coughlin over the workers in automobiles. But I doubt whether it was quite ready for the strike in General Motors. That the strike was not a complete runaway is indicated by the fact that the men waited until two days before the inauguration of the new Democratic governor, who owed his election to the labor vote. Still, the national officers would probably have preferred to wait a little longer.

It was at this point that the splendid courage and masterful strategy of John L. Lewis came into play. The

*Though it is couched in face-saving terms, the six months' guaranty by General Motors to Governor Murphy for all practical purposes grants sole recognition in twenty plants.

A. F. of L., of course, would have let the workers down. Lewis stepped right in and took hold of the situation. He didn't just follow; he led. Nothing ever loses a strike as hopelessly as letting workers down. Lewis's action was not motivated by stubbornness, as the public was led to believe after the collapse of the Lansing agreement. It was sheer skill which kept him every moment in control of the strike situation. For the initial organization of the basic industries does not permit the alternative of drift or mastery. Only control is permissible.

II

The drive for industrial unionism is bound to render American labor ever more conscious politically. It was during the NRA that the progressive labor leaders realized that the old craft structure and the non-partisanship of the A. F. of L. were leading nowhere. To be sure, American labor could not jump from complete non-partisanship into direct political action. Nor would it have been wise to form an independent labor party which could not influence national and local office-holders during the crucial period of industrial organization. And so what happened was that labor formed the left wing of the Democratic Party, contributed to the victory of Roosevelt, and definitely elected all those Democratic governors who won out in ordinarily Republican industrial states. There is not the least doubt that they elected the Democratic administrations in Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Indiana. Governor Earle of Pennsylvania is extremely sympathetic to the steel drive. Governor Townsend of Indiana made the sheriff of Anderson, during the Auto-Lite strike, fire a number of deputized gunmen and swear in sixty union men instead. And Governor Murphy of Michigan, in spite of his close connections with big business, has handled the General Motors strike with kid gloves. None of these governors elected by labor likes the idea of calling out the National Guard to shoot down workers who elected them. Indeed, the comparative bloodlessness of the major strikes these last two years has been amazing. Moreover, when Lewis turned the heat on Roosevelt with the demand that he back labor in the automobile strike, he was far from committing a "diplomatic blunder." He knew mighty well that Roosevelt could not afford to ignore him because the Democratic National Committee cannot afford to ignore him.

Lewis is shrewdly coordinating Labor's Non-Partisan League with the whole industrial development. The new executive vice-president of the League, Eli L. Oliver, put it very succinctly: "We have now about 50 progressives in Congress. And when we have some 125 we may decide to go in for a farmer-labor party." And when that day comes, labor may have a lot of sheriffs elected on its own ticket as well. To be sure, one of the dangers of labor's growing political power is that of increasing government intervention. But as Paul Ward pointed out in The Nation, "a labor movement committed to reliance on the federal government can ill afford to balk at this point." The old A. F. of L. anarchist position of the less government the better becomes ever more unrealistic because the conditions which made such a position tenable are gone.

III

The relation of the C. I. O. to the A. F. of L. and to the company union is largely one of diplomacy. The upper bureaucracy of the A. F. of L. cannot be won; you cannot win a man out of his job. The problem then is to wean away the rank and file in the craft unions from the reactionary top leadership, whose hold is confined to the most skilled and conservative trades. In this task the C. I. O. is succeeding very well. In fact, it is not an overwhelming task, because the lesser leadership and the rank and file in the regional bodies—city and state federations—are by and large sympathetic to the C. I. O. It is one thing for Bill Green and John Frey to encourage scabbing from their mausoleum in Washington. It is quite another thing for a city or state labor organization to encourage scabbing locally.

As for the company union, it is rapidly merging into the C. I. O. The whole C. I. O. drive is proving that big industry these last fifteen years has unwittingly been helping to prepare its workers, through the company union, for industrial organization. Company unions are falling into the lap of the C. I. O. like ripe apples.

IV

Since the World War big industry has used two weapons against labor organization. One was gangsterism and the other was company unionism. Gangsterism it usually farmed out, as the testimony before the La Follette committee is currently proving. The guerrilla bands of craft unionists were met by the Hessian troops of strike-breaking agencies wherever a skirmish occurred. The company-union movement was a highfalutin personnel-management development manipulated by the same stooges, such as Vice-President Arthur Young of United States Steel, who hired spies and scabs. With these two weapons the A. F. of L.'s attempts to organize workers could usually be stopped.

Within this last year big industry has had to find new weapons to fight the mass movement of the C. I. O. Strike-breaking agencies have been relegated to the place of mere auxiliaries and the company-union regiments have been found most untrustworthy, since at the first opportunity they deserted to the enemy. What big business needs is to divide the working class. For this they found one means ready at hand: the oligarchy of the A. F. of L. And they invented another means in what may be called vigilante democracy.

Since the A. F. of L. hierarchy cannot fight the C. I. O. directly through workers whom it never organized, there is only one way left for it to fight—through sabotage. The A. F. of L. now is in the same disintegrating position as were the Knights of Labor in the late eighties, with one essential difference: the K. of L. never lent themselves to strike-breaking activities. The oligarchy of the A. F. of L. from now on can have no other major function. William Green called up Governor Murphy on February 7 and excitedly insisted that under no circumstances must the United Automobile Workers be recognized. Later, under pressure from countless labor bodies, the executive council announced its neutrality.

There is every reason to believe that the General Motors strike in Atlanta, last November, was precipitated by an A. F. of L. organizer in an attempt to hurt the C. I. O. One of the most influential A. F. of L. organizers, with an enormous jurisdictional territory, told me that Green is now using his organizers exclusively for such tactics.

The other weapon of big industry is the organization of the least progressive elements among the workers under vigilante leadership, demanding "recognition" from the company and pretending that the legitimate union is trying to represent the workers against their will and interfering with their right to work. During the rubber strike in Akron a year ago a disreputable politician named Sparks organized a "law and order" league very similar to that which is now attempting to disrupt the automobile strike—the Flint Alliance under the leadership of an equally discredited politician, George Boysen, a former mayor of Flint and Buick paymaster. It would be foolish to deny that backward workers can be temporarily organized through these tactics, for such vigilante organizations have a factitious appearance of democracy.

V

In a little over a year the C. I. O. has changed significantly the relation of social forces in American industry. It is changing both the structure and the orientation of American labor. It is changing the tactics of big business in fighting labor. It is gradually killing off the A. F. of L. in all but the most craft-ridden industries. It is profoundly affecting our two major political parties. It is transforming the relation of government to industry.

All profound social change involves danger, and the deeper and more rapid the change the greater the danger. The C. I. O. is the most progressive and vital force in American life today. But you cannot release such a force in the very heart of American industry without raising up all the powers of reaction against it. The student of American labor cannot hope to understand our labor movement from now on without realizing that the mass industries cannot be organized without audacity—and they cannot be left unorganized. From now on American labor must live dangerously. Every situation is of a kind where the leadership must take chances. The sitdown is dangerous. The need for exercising increasing political pressure is dangerous. The need for exposing the A. F. of L. scabocracy without antagonizing its rank and file is dangerous. The mere fact that a strike in a basic industry is not a mere strike but an economic stoppage of vast consequences is dangerous. Even the victories of the C. I. O. will be dangerous, for it would be silly to suppose that the Liberty Leaguers who own our basic industries will yield without a desperate struggle.

John Lewis has been criticized in the public press and even by some friends of labor for being too stubborn, for lacking diplomacy, for an almost reckless audacity. In reality his behavior so far has been extraordinarily shrewd. Lewis is not a fool who loves a fight for its own sake. His whole history in the United Mine Workers is one of great circumspection. The fact is that Mr. Lewis is being forced by the exigencies of the situation to drive ahead quickly and powerfully. In the automobile strike, for instance, he was afraid of one thing only, and that was of having the leadership left behind by an aroused rank and file which could not function without leadership. Mr. Lewis understands the dangers far better than any of his critics. And the men around him submit to his leadership not because he is the boss, but because he does understand.

Floods Can Be Controlled

BY JAMES RORTY

I

Knoxville, Tennessee, February 8

A WEEK ago when I was traveling on the edges of the flood area, riding on refugee trains, listening to the endless stories of flood victims, talking to fliers who had seen it from the air, I realized how impossible it is to convey either the abominable arrogance of a masterless river or the wretched terror of the people in its path. The planes don't fly high enough, the camera lens has too narrow a focus, the sounds that come over the radio are trivial, frivolous. How can one see, except in the mind's eye, that sudden muddy gulf opening from Pittsburgh to Cairo? How can one hear, except in imagination, the vast composite sigh with which thousands of ruined people acknowledge utter defeat?

Yesterday I stood underneath the Norris Dam, which at the moment was being permitted, gingerly, to spill some of its two million and a third acre-feet of stored water at the modest rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second. From the caldron at my feet to the top of the spillway was higher than Niagara: high, wide, and thick—all the dimensions are huge. Yet it did not feel big. Instead, it seemed neat, precise, perfect, like a de luxe toy. The Clinch, tributary of the Tennessee, has been a vicious, dangerous river in its time. Not now, I reflected. Not with that beautiful concrete collar around its neck.

Will it be possible to multiply and coordinate such victories until at last people who live and work beside the Ohio, the Mississippi, and their tributaries need no longer live in terror of flood warnings? Is a real solution of the problem of flood control possible? How much would it cost, and would it be worth the price?

I brought these questions to Knoxville, headquarters of the Tennessee Valley Authority. We, the people, have given millions to TVA with the object not merely of rehabilitating the Tennessee Valley but of obtaining nationally applicable answers to these very questions and to other related questions. Now, in the stricken aftermath of a great disaster, we want the answers, if any.

The accomplishment to date is impressive enough and easily demonstrable. Even a year ago Norris Dam cut three feet off the flood crest of the Tennessee at Chattanooga—enough to protect 5,000 homes that would otherwise have been flooded and save three-quarters of a million dollars. And when the water started to rise last month, the TVA engineers drove the Tennessee as a skilled chauffeur drives an automobile. An elaborate forecasting system, plus split-second time-control of the flood gates at Norris and Wheeler, twice prevented the flooding of the coffer dams at Pickwick Landing.

This, however, represents the smallest part of the TVA's actual and potential contribution. What we have got out of our investment in the TVA is not merely a partial, far from complete solution of specific local problems of water and soil control, navigation improvement, fertilizer production, power generation and distribution, but an adult, integrated grasp of all these problems in all their dimensions, plus a rigorous scientific procedure. The preceding sentence roughly paraphrases a statement of Dr. A. E. Morgan, chairman of the TVA board, whom I saw in Washington en route to Knoxville. It expresses, I think, the fundamental philosophy of the TVA triumvirate, to which all its members adhere despite current differences.

"When we first tackled the problem of the Miami River," said Dr. Morgan, "we thought levees were the answer—everybody thought so then. But we soon learned better. What you do is to write out the obvious solution first and all the other possible solutions in order. Then you start selecting, rejecting, combining. Usually you astonish yourself by the solution you finally arrive at, but that's it, just the same. On the Miami conservation project we used the whole repertory of control devices, with our main reliance on the reservoirs that had played no role at all in the first solution we projected. But it worked, and it's the only method that will work—for the Ohio, the Mississippi, the problem as a whole. The army abandoned the "levees only" doctrine after the 1927 flood. Today our best hope is that creative minds, with no vested interest in any doctrine, may work freely toward a real solution."

As I have already pointed out, a practicable solution of the flood problem must be expressed in economic, political, and engineering procedures. Let us first consider the engineering aspect.

A 100 per cent solution must insure protection against super-floods that may come only once in 50 years, and against super-super-floods that may come only once in 500 years. The highest flood level on record was established in 1792—probably by the coincidence of heavy rainfall and rapid run-off on all or many of the tributaries of the Mississippi. The next highest was in 1844, both before the building of levees. This year the rainfall was high in the Ohio basin but fortunately somewhat less on the Tennessee, upper Mississippi, Missouri, and other watersheds. Neither in 1792 nor in 1844 had deforestation or cultivation assumed anything like their present importance in causing erosion and rapid run-off. Are we to conclude, therefore, that the restoration of the forest and grass cover at the headwaters of streams is not sufficient to prevent floods? Yes, with important qualifications.

A. E. Morgan says: "Reservoir control is most effective with a relatively small number of large reservoirs on large streams. Small reservoirs on headwaters may be useful in some cases for local flood control or for other reasons, but they constitute about the most expensive and least effective method of control on large streams. It would be unfortunate if Congress should enter into a great program of building small reservoirs on small streams to control floods on large rivers. Forestation and increase of grassland are important in our national economy, but play relatively little part in the prevention of great floods on large rivers.

"If the proposed Gilbertsville Dam in the lower Tennessee River and a dam across the Ohio just above the mouth of the Tennessee had been built, the present flood would have been so controlled as largely to remove danger along the Ohio River from Paducah to Cairo and in the Mississippi below. The Norris Dam has done full service in the present flood. When the TVA dams are completed they will supply a large measure of flood control on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers."

Nothing in Dr. Morgan's statement would be objected to by the "up-streamers"—the advocates of heavy expenditure on reforestation and other erosion-control measures. But as he would be the first to admit, it presents only a part of the problem. And here enters the "other Morgan"—H. A., TVA's agricultural expert.

"Granting that a sudden, heavy rainfall will waterlog the forest or grass cover of even a properly protected slope so that a quick run-off and floods occur," says H. A. Morgan, "we must still give weight to the fact that a properly covered slope will absorb and hold gradual rainfall; that erosion-control measures, adequately applied, offer us the practical assurance that we can in this way both prevent many minor floods and also prevent some floods from becoming super-floods.

"Anyway, what are the major losses in any flood? Do they consist only of houses, factories, man-made structures damaged or destroyed? Not at all. The major loss is soil—plant food. Should we be more concerned with the Louisville cigarette factories and distilleries than with the soil necessary to grow the grain and tobacco out of which their products are manufactured? Isn't a thousand dollars' worth of soil worth just as much as a thousand-dollar building? Our experiments have shown that on the same slope and soil, receiving the same rainfall, plowed land loses 105 tons per acre every year and corn land 67 tons, whereas grass and alfalfa lose only a little over half a ton. And you don't have to have a flood to lose this valuable soil. Ordinary rains do it. When you talk flood control, water control, you're also talking soil control. And when you're counting costs you'd better not forget the major costs—the year-in and year-out costs of soil erosion, flood or no flood, which no system of high dams, levees, or combination of the two will stop unless supplemented by adequate erosion-control methods.”

II

Complete protection of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys against floods and super-floods is theoretically possible. All the TVA experts agreed on that although some of them, like W. A. Woodward, one of the ranking authorities in America in his field, muttered obstinately that we don't really know enough yet. We don't know, for example, how fast dams silt, given varying conditions of soil and rainfall. The TVA engineers, who suspect that silting has been much over-emphasized, expect to find out more about this by means of the measured monuments they are placing in their dams. The TVA also expects to learn a lot about dam building from the records of the instruments it has buried in the concrete, which show the effects of heat and other factors. But even allowing for all the factors still to be determined, the job could be done. It would take between twenty-five and thirty years and cost—nobody knows precisely how much. Billions, certainly.

Would it be worth it? Here again the answer is yes. Yes, if we take ourselves seriously as a civilization that expects to preserve itself, and perhaps ameliorate slightly the ordeal of human life on our part of the planet. Yes, if and when we recognize that flood control and soil and water control are national problems and that only a national program planned and coordinated by federal agencies can solve them.

The floods, as A. E. Morgan remarked dryly, have amended the Constitution with respect to the power of the federal government to deal with some of these basic matters; in the lurid light of successive disasters we have more or less decided to dispense with legal formalities. But we'd better be sure about that if we really intend to tackle the problem seriously. The sordid spectacle of Mississippi and Louisiana farmers crossing the river and blowing up their neighbor's levees so that his fields, not theirs, would be flooded—such things are of recent memory.

We may have to blast something besides levees before the way is open to an honest, scientific attack upon the problem. I have in mind specifically an Associated Press dispatch I read on the train in which a new organization called the “United States Flood Control Federation” declared that it would oppose “any act which would remove from the corps of United States Army Engineers authority over flood-control works.” Who and what is this federation, I wondered, and why this somewhat invidious enthusiasm for army engineers? Is it because TVA coordinates flood control, navigation improvement, erosion control, and soil conservation with power production and distribution and applies the income from power sales to the costs of this necessarily integrated job? Is it possible that the private utilities are favoring the United States Flood Control

Federation and its official line because the army just builds dams, the power product of which the private utilities would like to exploit? A complete program of flood control would cost many billions. Is the government to be stopped from paying part of the costs by selling the power its own dams generate?

A while back the army engineers, basing their estimates only on recorded flood damage on the Mississippi from Cairo down over a thirty-year period, declared that an expenditure of $450,000,000 designed to reduce the flood crests two feet, would be well justified. But figuring only physical damage, and ignoring both soil loss and human suffering, the floods of the past twelve months have cost the people of the Ohio and its tributaries about a billion dollars. If we put the flood losses in the Ohio and Mississippi valleys to date at $3,000,000,000, we should still be taking account only of damage to physical property, still ignoring soil loss—and the figure would be conservative.

Three billion dollars would build many dams and provide local flood protection in the form of levees. But it still would not solve the basic problem of America, a problem closely related to but transcending flood control: reorganization of our agricultural economy in terms of scientific conservation before the plant food of the nation washes and blows away from under us.

Let H. A. Morgan, TVA's agricultural expert, speak on this point. “We have eight major agricultural economies,” says Mr. Morgan. “They are the cotton economy, the wheat economy, the corn economy, the pasture economy, the diversified economy, the dairy economy, the fruit and vegetable economy, the forest economy. In practically all these economies except the diversified economy what has happened, roughly, is that whether the farmer got good or bad prices for his crops—and they were usually bad prices—he was forced to operate his land in such a way as to destroy his basic capital, which was plant food, that is, certain irreplaceable elements in the soil. Of these phosphorus is today the most important. We need phosphorus to put cover crops on our eroded soil—legumes which restore the nitrogen and also lessen the run-off. That's why TVA is making phosphates at Muscle Shoals. That's why our known supply of phosphate rock is so tremendously important. We have barely enough for our own needs. To export it is suicidal.

“Assume that your guess is roughly accurate—that our recorded flood losses on the Ohio and Mississippi total at least three billions. Does that stagger you as much as the fact that in a single ordinary year at least three billion dollars' worth of soil washes down the rivers into the sea?

“Flood control, certainly. It can be done, and it must be done. But soil control is our basic problem. Nobody knows, of course, how much it would cost. But have we any choice? Every civilization stands or falls according to its ability to utilize and conserve intelligently the plant food in the soil that sustains life. We must tackle this problem or face the progressive and cumulative exhaustion of the physiographic base of our civilization.”

Mr. Aylesworth Moves Ahead

BY RUTH BRINDZE

THE news stories announcing that Merlin H. Aylesworth, for ten years president of the National Broadcasting Company, would sever his connection with the radio industry to become a member of the general management of the Scripps-Howard newspapers omitted several important details which should interest all students of success in business.

Mr. Aylesworth (he is Deac, short for Deacon, to his friends) has moved steadily from one important job into another. Six years after he was graduated from law school, he became chairman of the Colorado Public Utilities Commission. He kept this job for four years and then, having acquired considerable knowledge of utility operations, became one of the executives of the Utah Power and Light Company. But Mr. Aylesworth's special genius was too great to permit a single utility to monopolize it. A year after he had moved his headquarters to Salt Lake City he was appointed general manager of the National Electric Light Association, the propaganda organization of the Insulls and other utility leaders.

From the records of the Federal Trade Commission we learn that Mr. Aylesworth made good as manager of the N. E. L. A. His job was to arouse public sentiment against government ownership of utilities and to "educate" the public in the advantages of private control. Mr. Aylesworth had had no previous experience in handling publicity, but he proved that he had a flair for it. His methods were simple. He bought at bargain prices the integrity of college professors and newspapermen and through the press, textbooks, and classroom lectures "carried on the greatest peace-time propaganda campaign ever conducted by private interests in this country." At a conference of the Middle West Utilities Company in the autumn of 1923, he explained how easily and cheaply the services of the professors could be bought. He said:

I would advise any manager here who lives in a community where there is a college to get the professor of economics, let us say, . . . interested in your problems. Have him lecture on your subject to his classes. Once in a while it will pay you to take such men getting $500 or $1,000 a year and give them a retainer of $100 or $200 for the privilege of letting you study with them. For how in heaven's name can we do anything in the schools of this country . . . if we have not first sold the idea of education to the college professors?

Some professors and colleges received more generous subsidies. The Harvard Business School, for example, received an annual subsidy of $20,000. The payments to the Fourth Estate were, on the whole, higher. But as Mr. Aylesworth declared at a meeting of the N. E. L. A. in Philadelphia in 1924: "Don't be afraid of the expense. The public pays the expense."

By 1926 the N. E. L. A. had an efficient chain of "information bureaus" throughout the country. Newspapers were regularly printing articles and even entire editorial pages written by the association's publicity men, and teachers were well supplied with the utilities' syllabuses. It was time for Mr. Aylesworth to move ahead.

The National Broadcasting Company had been organized by the Radio Corporation of America as a result of a patent deal between the R. C. A. and the Bell System. Who should be intrusted with the responsibility of directing the new chain? Owen D. Young, as head of the General Electric Company, knew of Mr. Aylesworth's success in the N. E. L. A. and nominated him for the post. In his announcement of the appointment Mr. Young said, "One of his major responsibilities will be to see that the operation of the National Broadcasting Company reflects enlightened public opinion."

The testimony before the Senate's Banking and Currency Committee in 1933 indicates that Mr. Aylesworth continued to buy enlightenment at bargain rates after he went into the broadcasting business. At his direct suggestion Halsey Stuart and Company, underwriters of Insull securities, retained Professor Nelson of the University of Chicago to act as their mouthpiece on the air. When Mr. Stuart was examined, the Senators were inquisitive:

SENATOR REYNOLDS: What was the name of the "old counselor"? What was his name?

MR. STUART: I ought to remember it. He is a professor of note at the University of Chicago.

SENATOR REYNOLDS: How much did you pay him per week?

MR. STUART: $50 a week.

SENATOR REYNOLDS: Is he still at the university?

MR. STUART: I think so. Of course, everything he delivered was written for him.

SENATOR REYNOLDS: Who wrote it?

MR. STUART: It was written in our office.

Several years before, Mr. Aylesworth had testified before a House committee that the "old counselor" was an actor chosen "because of his voice and not because of his banking intelligence." Apparently it was a role that almost anyone could perform.

Neither the Federal Trade Commission's report nor the other official evidence of Mr. Aylesworth's methods embarrassed the National Broadcasting Company or its president. He continued to head the largest network in the country until 1936, when he was "kicked upstairs" to become vice-chairman of the board of directors of the N. B. C. and president of the Radio Keith Orpheum, another of the Radio Corporation's subsidiaries. Now Floyd Odum, of the Atlas Corporation, and Lehman Brothers have purchased control of the R. K. O. and a reorganization plan is before the court. Undoubtedly the Radio Corporation could find a place for Mr. Aylesworth with still another of its subsidiaries. But Mr. Aylesworth moves ahead.

His qualifications for a top-notch job with the anti-public-utility Scripps-Howard newspapers are thus a matter of public record. Mr. Aylesworth knows the newspaper business as only a propagandist for the special interests can know it.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

HAVING recently heard Maude Royden make two fine addresses in behalf of the emergency peace campaign, I find myself dissenting more and more from the point she chiefly stressed—that we must do justice to the overcrowded, “have-not” countries by redistributing colonies or otherwise giving them direct access to raw materials. With all respect to this gallant and charming woman, it seems to me that those who say this cannot have thought through the implications of their proposal. In the first place, the suggestion is to take away some swag from those who have improperly acquired it, usually by rapine and wholesale murder, and to give it to somebody else. Those who support this proposal seldom speak of the populations which are thus to be handed over, or ask whether the natives wish to be ruled by this country or that. They are just so many cattle to be bandied about as the white man sees fit, precisely as populations were disposed of by the Treaty of Versailles, with the consequences we all know.

But leaving the natives for a minute, why should Italy and Germany be specially singled out among all the “have-nots” unless it is because they are dangerous to the peace of the world and extremely ugly customers? Certainly if any country needs a little help in the way of more territory and access to raw materials it is what is left of Austria, but Austria is small and not dangerous and therefore gets no consideration. It is only the size of Italy and Germany and their bullying and threats which make people suddenly so anxious to “see justice done them.” Now obviously there are certain raw materials to which these countries never could get direct access, even if the dominant powers in Europe, France and England, wished to give them that help. They cannot get any part of Brazil, and it is from Brazil that the all-important manganese comes. It is probably not possible to give them territory in which large cotton or sugar crops can be raised, or in which there are important oil possibilities. Nature has been unequal in the distribution of its resources, and no amount of blackmailing by Italy and Germany can overcome that. As for those teeming populations, I should feel very much more sympathetic if it were not an undeniable fact that when they had colonies the Germans did not go into them in large numbers—only 24,000 Germans all told were in the colonies at the outbreak of the World War—nor did the Italians into theirs prior to the Ethiopian crime. Again, they have teeming populations because they want them, because they punish birth-control advocates and offer large rewards for increased families for military purposes, although they themselves admit that the economic conditions into which these children are to be born cannot afford them a reasonable basis of existence.

I have been stirred to these remarks by reading an article in Das Neue Tage-Buch by Erich Andermann, in which he recalls the events in German Southwest Africa which led to the uprising of January, 1904. I followed these occurrences at the time and called attention to them. Herr Andermann quotes from the official account published in 1906 by the Military Historical Division of the great General Staff. This is, therefore, not the word of “atrocities-mongers,” or of “Jewish journalists.” The author explains that there had to be a settlement of the case by military force: “No policy, however skilful, would have been able to head off this racial conflict.” The only thing to do was to “use respect-creating force until the complete overthrow of the natives.” The decisive battle is described in a letter written by Lieutenant Colonel von Beaulieu:

For many kilometers along the Hamakari River were farm after farm which were the homes of many thousands of human beings and countless cattle. As far as our shells had reached they were transformed into a pile of ruins and everywhere obviously deserted in wild, headlong flight. . . .wounded, sick, and dying awaited in some corner of the kraals their fate. . . . The whole national wealth of the Herero people lay there along the main road unconditionally at our mercy. The General had forbidden the killing of women and children, but for all the armed men who fell into the hands of our troops the last hour had struck.

The report then tells how the rest of the Hereros were driven by the German troops into a sandy desert where there was not one drop of water and where they died of thirst. As the commanding general, Von Trotha, put it himself: “These half-starved and waterless groups are the last remnants of a nation which has ceased to hope for rescue or reestablishment.” Even that was not enough. The official General Staff report goes on thus:

The shutting off with iron vigor for many months of this sand desert ended the work of destruction. . . . The last gasps of the dying and the mad yells of the insane there ceased in the dignified silence of eternity. . . . The Hereros had ceased to be an independent people.

Incidentally, Herr Schacht, in his recent demand for colonies for Germany, promised that the new colonial policies of the Third Reich would be “much more energetic and much more thoroughgoing” than those of the Second Empire! Unquestionably the Hereros would vote their thanks to Maude Royden or to anybody else who would favor their return to the more energetic Germans of Hitler!

BOOKS and the ARTS

WHAT GOOD IS REVOLUTION?

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris

THE furor created by André Gide's "Retour de l'U.R.S.S."* seems at first astonishing. In a few weeks the little brochure has sold over a hundred thousand copies and has stirred up a tempest of debate fantastically out of proportion to its content or merit. Other writers have returned from the U. S. S. R. with reports at once profounder and more devastating to proletarian culture and socialist construction as practiced under the heirs of Lenin. Gide's fame as a novelist and traveler, great as that is, can be only part of the explanation. More pertinent are the one or two short passages of a book ("Pages de Journal") from the same pen published a little more than two years ago in which Gide proclaimed his solidarity with the Bolshevik revolution and his conviction that the goal pursued by the Soviet Union was the hope of a threatened and chaotic world. His journey sobered him, and his account of it is having a succès de déception.

Déception (disappointment) there surely has been. But what amazes the detached witness is the incapacity of both camps to perceive the primary fact that Gide abandons neither proletarian revolution as a way of salvation nor the Russian example. His strictures are addressed not to socialism, or even to the present leadership in the Kremlin, but purely and simply to certain departures from the original objective—to certain aberrations of Stalinism, if you like—or what appears to him to be such. That the non-conformist Marxists hail the publication with delight is easy to understand. But what the fascists and other foes of the Soviet Union find in the little book to crow over is a bit of a poser. There is nothing in its pages to suggest that Gide is about to join the Parti Populaire Français of Jacques Doriot. On the contrary, Gide remains more than ever convinced that socialism is the path of salvation; the achievements of the Russian Revolution seem to him, on the whole, admirable and convincing; and if there is any moral for the French proletariat in his observations, it is that they avoid the pitfalls and the snares of their Russian comrades.

Not much in all this for anti-Marxists to gloat over. But neither, it would seem to me, is there anything for revolutionists to lament and call names about, as L'Humanité and Pravda are now doing, still less to make them exert pressure—as I learn on good authority the French Communists did—in the hope of persuading the author to withhold his book from the public. Gide, to be sure, is not an orthodox Marxist. He never pretended to be. He has not subscribed—to judge from a letter to a friend after the publication of his "Pages de Journal"—either to the class struggle or to the materialist dialectic; and if now he declines to be restrained by the superstition that a revolutionary must hew to the "line," follow the leader, and for the rest keep mum, the party directorate can hardly be surprised.

On certain tendencies in the U. S. S. R. Gide cannot be said to mince his words. Perhaps the reason for that is that he hews to the line too firmly. "Was I mistaken at the outset?" he asks. "Those who have followed developments in the U. S. S. R. for barely a year past will decide whether it is I who have changed or the U. S. S. R., and by U. S. S. R. I mean the man who rules it. . . . Dictatorship of the proletariat, we were promised. We are a long way from it. Dictatorship, yes, of course; but dictatorship of a man, not of the united proletariat, not of the Soviets. It is as well not to be deceived; let there be no mistake about it: it is not this we wanted. Another step and we might even say that is exactly what we did not want."

His chief complaint is about the depersonalization of the individual. Economics and social reorganization he leaves to the experts. That in the "classless society" so widely heralded there is nearly as much inequality of income—the only kind that matters—as elsewhere, that clinging, wretched poverty remains an apparently permanent phenomenon in "the workers' fatherland," he is ready to accept and forgive. That is not his department. His province is the spirit. He had hoped to find in the Soviet Union a mankind liberated of servility and conformity, a race that held its head high and spoke its mind freely. But "I doubt whether in any other country today, be it in Hitler's Germany, the mind is less free, more servile, more fear-ridden [terrorized], more vassalized." Is this the land of revolution—"his patrie d'élection, his guide and model"?

A number of instances illustrate for Gide this curious deformation of the temper that but twenty brief years ago shook the world. When, at a gathering shortly after his arrival in Moscow, Gide made some comments on the Spanish civil war, everyone looked uncomfortable, everyone seemed to look to his neighbor for a cue. The party line had not been announced. Therefore "no one knew what to think on the question." Several days later the Politburo took its stand, and Gide's words were greeted with general enthusiasm. In the U. S. S. R. a great deal is made of "self-criticism." Gide in Paris admired it and the results it must have. "But I grasped that apart from denunciations and remonstrances (the soup in the refectory is not cooked enough, or the reading-club hall is not swept properly) this self-criticism consisted in wondering whether this or that were or were not 'within the line.' The line itself is not discussed. What is discussed is whether such a work, such an act, such a theory is consistent with this sacred line. And woe to him who tries to push on farther."

* "Retour de l'U.R.S.S." By André Gide. Paris: Gallimard. 6 francs. The English translation will be published in this country by Alfred A. Knopf.

Between Tiflis and Batum the Gide party paused at Gori, the little town where Stalin was born. It occurred to Gide that it might be courteous to wire a word of thanks to the new ruler of Russia for all the hospitality that had been shown him and his friends. He drew up the message: "Passing through Gori in the course of our wonderful journey I cannot refrain from addressing to you . . ." But that was as far as he got. The translator was scandalized. One could not say just "you" to Stalin. It would not be decent. One must add a flourish of some sort: "you, leader of the workers," or "you, master of peoples." There was nothing for it but to submit.

But there is more than mere fault-finding in the little book. On Russian youth, on industrial renovation, on the rest-and-culture establishments, and on a score of other achievements Gide has many an enthusiastic word to say. His praise is whole-hearted, warm, unreserved. And even where he is most severe, his tone is never captious. "My conviction," he says, in concluding his preface, "remains whole and unshaken that on the one hand the U. S. S. R. will conquer the grave errors which I am pointing out, that on the other—and this is more important—the mistakes of one country cannot possibly compromise the genuineness of a cause which is international and worldwide." Were I the editor of L'Humanité or the Pravda, I should have remembered the services that Gide has rendered to the cause both of the U. S. S. R. and of the world's proletariat, and that, his strictures notwithstanding, he still remains the friend and defender of both.

BOOKS

Lloyd George Sees It Through

WAR MEMOIRS OF DAVID LLOYD GEORGE. Volumes V and VI. Little, Brown and Company. Each Volume $3.

WHEN a man starts a new craft in his seventieth year, Mr. Lloyd George remarks in the preface to his concluding volume, he cannot become anything better than an amateur. This conspicuous amateur makes one specific claim for his Memoirs—namely, that apart from the official histories of the war they contain the most careful and richly documented account of the great conflict. I am not competent to assess the precise significance of the words "most careful" as used here, but it is undeniable that Mr. Lloyd George's achievement is remarkable. Six stout volumes, one million words (they might easily have been reduced by 20 per cent)—such is the chronicle of the war Prime Minister's Dolorous Way. Its literary quality, save in those chapters which recall the fighting speeches of a happier time, is not likely to be considered by most readers; but the book, we may assume, will receive attention in many lands for many years. That should suffice for the author by way of imponderable reward.

Mr. Lloyd George warmly resents the accusation—made, he implies, by many critics of the earlier volumes—that he has condemned every general, admiral, and statesman who took any part in the war. He offers a selection of the "military and naval chiefs and a few of the politicians" whom he "sought out for laudation." They make a varied list, not long, and I think one would be accurate in pointing out that the majority of the men named, although highly placed, were not at any time intrusted with tasks, either military or political, which could be described as of crucial importance. The unmistakable exceptions are Foch and Clemenceau. Mr. Lloyd George's admiration of Foch is unbounded, and a good part of the sixth volume is devoted to a demonstration of the claim that the Generalissimo's grand opportunity in 1918 was due to the Prime Minister's insistence upon the imperative necessity of unity of command through Foch. Then there is Clemenceau. We must suppose that Mr. Lloyd George looks upon him as both great and necessary. We are told among many other things that France was his sole concern. Yet that he was "an inexorable cynic" and a volcano of hatreds, while, surprisingly, Mr. Lloyd George seems to believe that he was the first to utter the bright saying, Might is right! "As long as France was victorious he did not worry in the least about the tribulations of any other country," and when he ended his career, adds this eulogist, he left France the most powerful state in Europe. Yes, sixteen years ago; but the results of Clemenceau's labors of hate are sickeningly evident today. After the measureless heroism of her sons through fifty sacrificial months France cannot have deserved the ruin brought upon her by this horrible old man.

The central villain of the two volumes is Douglas Haig, as every reader of the author's description of the "squalid tragedy" of Passchendaele must have expected. The denunciation is detailed, persistent, merciless, and it is rounded off in a final chapter dealing with Haig's Diaries and Mr. Duff Cooper's panegyric, a chapter which can have no parallel in the personal records of our age. Mr. Lloyd George sets out to destroy the last vestiges of Haig's reputation as commander-in-chief. He cannot make any reference to the strategy of the Flanders campaign save in words of withering contempt. He insists that Haig was obstructive and dishonest in the great business of the unity of command. He brings against him definite charges of both meanness and disloyalty. He makes Haig and Sir William Robertson, the imperial chief of staff, the main targets for his anger and scorn when building up his case against the professional-soldier caste, its training and mental equipment. In England, he reminds us, the army was never considered a career for talents, and "Robertson never saw a battle." Mr. Lloyd George's indictment, when completed by the riddling of Duff Cooper, will, I believe, be accepted as cruelly triumphant. It stands as a fully documented companion piece to the brilliant castigation of the army bunglers which came recently from England's most effective military historian and critic, Captain Liddell Hart, and I should be surprised if a rebuttal of any force can be made to Mr. Lloyd George's argument for control of the generals in war time by the civilian government.

Manifestly, however, all this is only a part of the question as it affects the all-powerful war Prime Minister, his policy and actions. Why, for instance, the reader will ask, did he continue Haig in the chief command? And why, when Robertson was removed, did he decide that the Cabinet was virtually without any choice in the appointment of his successor. Mr. Lloyd George indicates that they were compelled to choose the outrageous Sir Henry Wilson, notwithstanding their knowledge of his reckless ways, his habit of intrigue, his dangerous and malignant temper. Mr. Lloyd George reprints the memorandum of July, 1918, in which Henry Wilson surveyed the probabilities of the war. It was written at the turn of the tide, actually after the great counter-offensive had begun. A more grotesque document it would be impossible to imagine. One wonders whether anything comparable with it in folly and perversity could have been turned off by the silliest military "expert" on the daily press. But it was the work of the officer upon whom next after the commander-in-chief in the field the life of England and the fate of the British system depended. Mr. Lloyd George is unsurpassed when playing this game of documents.

I have touched, of course, upon no more than a trifling percentage of the controversial topics in these volumes. Virtually every page relating to the grave events of 1918 contains matter for debate. Inevitably Mr. Lloyd George restates and defends the points concerning himself in the tragic affair of the Fifth Army in March, and the Commons debate which arose out of Sir Frederick Maurice's famous letter to the press accusing the Prime Minister of lying to Parliament about the size of the British army in France. The debate was initiated by Asquith; Mr. Lloyd George says that it had important results upon the future of the Liberal Party. That is emphatically so; but he should have added the essential fact that when making the deal with his Tory allies for the calamitous election at the end of the war, he took pains to mark down every member of parliament who had voted for the Maurice motion. That maneuver broke the Liberal Party and made impossible the return of Mr. Lloyd George himself to power after his fall from office in 1922. The author is self-revealing in everything he has to say about President Wilson, and hardly less so in his account of the statement of war aims made by himself at the time of the Fourteen Points. Mr. Lloyd George avers that the terms he then outlined "were subsequently embodied in the Treaty of Versailles." In this speech he announced that the Allies were not fighting to destroy Austria-Hungary, and he affirmed that the insistence upon restitution was "no demand for a war indemnity such as that imposed on France by Germany in 1871." Suppose it had been, and had been relatively no more, what an ocean of trouble for Europe would have been saved! But at least, Mr. Lloyd George could explain that there was no indemnity set in the Treaty of Versailles.

S. K. RATCLIFFE

Gentlemen May Cry Peace . . .

VIEWED WITHOUT ALARM: EUROPE TODAY. By Walter Millis. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

THE word "smug" has such unpleasant connotations that one hesitates to apply it to a book which is obviously well-intentioned and which the author himself severely admits to be limited in scope. But what is one to say of Mr. Millis's armchair optimism? I agree with some of his conclusions. But what about what is happening in Europe today? Mr. Millis doesn't think that there is going to be a war. But a war is going on. Has Mr. Millis never heard of General Franco and his butchery in Spain? Does Mr. Millis not know that Italians and Germans are fighting today in what is already quite a nice little war? Mr. Millis is almost unbearably complacent about the factors, technical and diplomatic, which may keep the Germans from fighting. But the fact is that Germans are fighting at this very moment.

"Viewed Without Alarm" begins with an account of the author's recent brief trip across Europe from Paris to Moscow. He compares it with a similar trip from New York to North Dakota and summarizes all the nuisances the European traveler must undergo, the investigations of his passport, his cash and credit, and the literature he carries. This is amusing enough, but I think that Mr. Millis slightly exaggerates. I know that on many similar trips I wasn't awakened quite so often. (All you must do to avoid the money examination, even in Germany, is tip the wagon-lit conductor, so far as my experience goes.) However, Mr. Millis makes his point, and a valid one it is, that continental Europe is a prisoner of its frontiers. (On the other hand, the great lesson of the Spanish war is that frontiers, politically speaking, no longer correspond to geography. The German frontier just now is right at Malaga.)

Mr. Millis's impressions of Moscow are illuminating. Much of the inefficiency and red tape of the Soviet Union, he suggests, arise from Russian—that is, Oriental—rather than Marxist characteristics. Mr. Millis stops off in Germany and sees the autumn maneuvers of the Second Army near Bad Nauheim. This is brilliant reporting. Regiments, he says, were "just little strings of men, each a squad in single file led by its corporal (and looking for all the world like microphotographs . . . of certain types of disease germs), scattered all over the whole area." But from this and other items he draws what seems to me a dubious conclusion—that warfare is so experimental nowadays that no staff can be certain of victory, and that therefore the professional military folk are on the side of peace. Perhaps. But it isn't armies that make wars. No war ever comes just when a general staff wants it. The general staff in Italy desperately disapproved of the Abyssinian adventure.

The solidest part of Mr. Millis's book is about England. He gives a satisfying picture of the immense power of London—"still lying beneath her smoking chimneys along the Thames, still rich with her solid wealth, her immense accumulated equipment of technical skills and material facilities, her great social and political traditions scarcely touched as yet by all the storms of Continental dogma." London and Moscow are the two capitals of Europe, Mr. Millis feels. And by inference he concludes that the major European struggle, if it comes, will be between liberal democracy, represented by England, and the dictatorships; and here he seems to be thinking less of Nazi Germany, more of the Soviet Union.

The British have not committed themselves, Mr. Millis says, to the line they will take against Germany, assuming that the Germans are the power most likely to cause an immediate clash at arms. And this, according to Mr. Millis, is a very good thing: "Nobody, least of all the British, knows what they (the British) will do. I think it is a great aid to peace."

With all respect, I should like emphatically to disagree. British equivocation and shiftlessness are, it seems to me, very important factors that may tend to produce just what Mr. Millis doesn't want. As long as Hitler thinks that the British will remain neutral, he is encouraged to expand. Obviously a neutral Britain helps to give Germany a free hand on the Continent; conversely, an absolute knowledge—in advance—of what the British will and will not stand for would be the biggest possible deterrent to German flamboyance and German activism. If the Kaiser had known in advance that the British would fight for Belgium, there just possibly might not have been a war in 1914.

JOHN GUNTHER

BOOK BARGAINS

These offerings by America's oldest mail-order Book House save you up to 80% of their regular retail prices (shown in parentheses). Each is a worthwhile addition to the finest libraries. In many cases, the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks of individual titles. All orders promptly filled—and backed by our 53-year-old MONEY BACK GUARANTEE!

Up to 80% Off Regular Retail Prices

1. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOES. Twelve prints in full color. Size 9 to 12 inches. Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued, they were sold at FROM $5.00 to $8.00 PER PRINT. ($7.50) Our New Special Price for the 12 Prints, 98c

2. GOYA, HUNT, LEIGHTON, ROSETTI, RAEBURN, CONSTABLE, LORRAIN, INNESS, STEVENS, LE BRUN. Ten long-out-of-print paper-covered books, 7 1/4"x10". With 100 beautiful full-page plates. Masters of Art series. Our Special Price for the 10 books, $1.59

3. PHIDIAS, TENIERS, WILKIE, PERUGINO, DUCCIO, METSU, CHARDIN, GREUZE. Eight long out-of-print books showing the best works of these old masters in 80 full-page plates. Masters of Art series. Our Special Price, the 8 books, 98c

4. PRESIDENTS AND POLITICS FROM GRANT TO COOLIDGE. As I Knew Them. By Henry L. Stoddard. Profusely illustrated. The N. Y. Times said: "If you want to get your political history straight, READ STODDARD. You will find some men larger and others smaller than you thought, but you will have the truth." ($5.00). Our Special Price, $1.29

5. The Complete Writings of BRANN, THE ICONCLAST. His entire works, formerly in 12 vols.—now complete in 2. Of Brann, the "WIZARD OF WORDS." Elbert Hubbard said: "Brann took the English language by the tail and snapped its head off." If you want something that will make you think deeply and sincerely, you must read Brann's writings—"an intellectual cocktail." Formerly available only in the $35.00 edition. Our Special Price, $2.98

6. GEORGE WASHINGTON'S COMPLETE DIARIES. The first complete issue. From his first expedition as a youth of 16 to the days of his final illness. Illustrated from old prints, engravings and facsimiles. "The material contained in these handsome volumes constitutes beyond question, ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT HUMAN DOCUMENTS THAT HAS BEEN LATELY ADDED TO THE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN HISTORY."—Sat. Review of Literature. ($25.00) Our Special Price, the 4-vol. set, only, $3.98

7. STATESMEN AND SOLDIERS OF THE CIVIL WAR. Major General Sir Frederick Maurice. Illustrated. "The author writes as a military expert discussing all the main figures and forces of the Civil War, seeking to explain the lessons of statesmanship and government to be learned from the history of that period and linking it with certain aspects of the World War." ($3.00) Our Special Price, 89c

8. THE THEATRE: 3,000 Years of The Theatre. By Sheldon Cheney. Profusely illustrated with 204 interesting illustrations. 558 pages. "A thoroughly readable, well-documented and beautifully illustrated history of man's whole adventure in the theatre."—Outlook. Chautauqua Edition. ($10.00) Our Special Price, only 98c

9. MILTON'S "PARADISE LOST." Including ALL His Other Poems. Profusely illustrated by the famous Gustave Doré. "Second only to the Bible and Shakespeare."—Encyclopedia Americana on "Paradise Lost" contained in this volume. 688 pages. ($10.00) Our Special Price, $1.98

10. DON QUIXOTE. By Cervantes. With over 400 Gustave Doré illustrations. 855 pages. ($12.50) Our Special Price, $1.98

11. THE EVOLUTION OF CLOCKWORK. With over 100 interesting illustrations of examples selected from public and private collections. Original and patient research has gone to the making of this book—the most important and authoritative ever published on the subject. ($8.40) Our Special Price, $2.98

12. THE BEST LETTERS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON. Selected and edited by J. G. deRoulhac Hamilton. As a master of English style, Jefferson has had few equals among American writers, and his letters are delightful reading quite apart from their value as a revelation of the man and his period. Illustrated with frontispiece. ($2.50) Our Special Price, 89c

13. RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. With the illustrations by Edmund J. Sullivan. Translated by Edward Fitzgerald. Handsomely bound in buckram. Our Special Price, 89c

14. FAMOUS VAN GOGH PAINTINGS IN FULL COLOR. Zuave—Still Life—Cornfield—Blooming Apple Orchard—four famous Van Goghs beautifully reproduced in full color. Ideal for framing—they look like original oil paintings. Together with Introductory Booklet by G. Benson, containing 17 Van Gogh halftones. Size 14 1/4"x18 inches. Our Special Price, for all, $1.98

15. JOSHUA TODD. By Fulton Oursler. Popular demand has required five large editions of this work, which JOHN ERSKINE called, "The best book I have read by anybody in an age." RUPERT HUGHES called it, "A Modern 'Tom Jones.'" ($2.50) Our Special Price, 69c

16. SIXTEEN AUTHORS TO ONE. By David Karsner. Intimate sketches of leading American writers. Fully illustrated. "Meet your favorite authors—and spend delightful evenings in chatty visits from Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Sinclair Lewis, Booth Tarkington, Eugene O'Neill, Carl Sandburg, Christopher Morley, Clarence Darrow, Will Durant, etc." ($2.50) Our Special Price, 69c

17. VOLTAIRE'S COMPLETE WORKS. The famous Arout edition. 43 volumes complete in 22 handsome illustrated volumes. Revised and modernized translation. Containing Lord Morley's masterly Critique and Biography; Victor Hugo's well-known Appreciation; the Tobias Smollett Notes, and including Voltaire's famous PHILOSOPHICAL DICTIONARY. Complete, unabridged, unexpurgated sets previously have sold for as high as $2,500 and this set was published at ($88.00) Our Special Price, the 22 volume set, $27.88

18. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. Translated by Henry F. Cary. With 130 full-page illustrations by the famous Gustave Doré. Contains "Inferno," "Purgatory," "Paradise." With complete notes. 652 pages. ($10.00) Our Special Price, $2.98

19. LEWIS CARROLL'S COMPLETE WORKS. Limited Edition. Complete for the first time in one volume. "Here are all the inimitable Lewis Carroll Fancies—not only Alice's immortal adventures and other old favorites, such familiar and beloved books as "The Hunting of the Snark" and "Sylvie and Bruno," but also many shorter works that are here collected and reprinted for the first time. This volume also contains one hitherto unpublished item. ($25.00) Our Special Price, $6.95

20. WAR LETTERS OF GENERAL PICKETT TO HIS WIFE. Soldier of the South. Illustrated "That charge at Gettysburg established Pickett forever as a magnificent fighter. But these letters show, to me, a spirit that is finer than fighting, a broad, tolerant, sweet, human spirit that I have not often found in such a degree in a rather wide study of Civil War figures."—Boston Transcript. "Pickett, if there is anything on top of God's green earth that I can do for you, say so."—U. S. Grant, 1865. ($2.50) Our Special Price, 79c

21. WOMAN AND LOVE. By Bernhard A. Bauer, M.D. Complete in 2 large illustrated volumes. Men will find in these pages the answers to many perplexing questions which they ask themselves about their wives. To the woman, it is an intimate necessity if she wishes to lead a full and happy life. Here she will find cleared up for her in easily understandable language many personal "mysteries." ($10.00) Our Special Price, the 2-vol. set, only $2.98

22. THE SEXUAL LIFE OF SAVAGES. With over 90 photographic illustrations from Dr. Malinowski's unrivalled collection. An account of courtship, marriage and family life among the natives of Trobriand Islands, British New Guinea—with a preface by HAVELOCK ELLIS. Complete in one volume. ($10.00) Our Special Price, $1.49

23. ENCYCLOPAEDIA SEXUALIS. Written by 117 world-famous authorities. A comprehensive encyclopaedia-dictionary of the sexual sciences. Profusely illustrated. Complete in one large, well-printed volume, handsomely bound. 819 pages. "No volume of similar character has ever before been published in this or any other country." It contains "up-to-date information on all sexual matters, in a concise, authoritative and lucid manner." Our Special Price, $3.94

24. FUNDAMENTALS OF MUSICAL ART. Complete in 20 volumes. Introduces readers to the immense wealth and range of musical knowledge. The major forms of musical composition are considered, the folk song and dance, the art song, the choral forms, the Passion and the oratorio, the piano, organ, the violin, the violoncello, the string quartet, the orchestra, the opera. Explains significant works of GREAT COMPOSERS. Includes biographies of most famous composers, etc., etc. Handsomely, durably bound. ($40.00) Our Special Price, the complete 20-vol. set, $6.95

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED ON YOUR MONEY BACK!

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, (Est. 1884)
367-373 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

N-15

Gentlemen: I enclose $1.00 Please send, delivery charges prepaid, the books circled below:

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	Name
9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	Address
17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	City
								State

☐ Please send me FREE CATALOG No. 279-N.

Discord in Experience

ON THIS ISLAND. By W. H. Auden. Random House. $1.50.

IN THIS new book Auden is concerned very largely with the experience of personal love. But Michael Roberts is correct in placing Auden among those poets who "deliberately leave a discord in experience which is to be removed only by action, not by an inner balancing of impulses." Almost every poem in this group expresses a "discord in experience" between the poet's inner desire for peace and his will-to-action. For Auden the only reality is the present—seen intellectually always as receding. Unlike Eliot, who compared past and present and thereby arrived at a concept of the absurdity of action and of belief in progress, Auden compares the present with a desired future and arrives at a concept of progress. Auden is, as it were, always on the rear observation platform of a train. Here he observes scenes of nature, of ordinary human life, receding so rapidly as to suggest a kaleidoscopic and somewhat terrifying journey toward a hoped-for future. Terror, ever present in such a sense of life, for Auden as for Malraux, points each personal experience toward a dramatic change into its opposite. Auden would reconcile continuity and discontinuity, continuity being biological and historical, discontinuity psychological or Freudian.

Auden is the finest of the younger English poets, and this is his best book. Completely within the English poetic tradition as to conventional form, imagery, and syntax, Auden, nevertheless, is new. He illustrates one way in which the poet may keep the newer psychological awarenesses and fuse these with the more recent historical determinism. Each characteristic symbol in these poems is so used that it may be dwarfed to signify the personal impulses or magnified to mean the radical's perspective of England or the world. The "island" is itself such a symbol. "Love" is another. But these symbols are not treated as they were in the earlier romantics. The early romantic poets drew realistic imagery from the personal responses and allowed it to emerge as an intermingling of the real and subjective, pointing not toward a will-to-action but toward a desire to dream. The last group of important poets in England, of which Auden is the best, select simple, descriptive imagery to express the personal impulse toward peace and then, as if by act of will, project this imagery, by distorting it and magnifying it, into a picture of a future, both horrible and desirable, toward which inevitably we move.

In almost every one of these new poems we are given first a simple, realistic scene or action representative of the old securities of life. Next the poet examines his own inner impulses and old methods of balancing them. Then, lastly, he sees these recede into the past as he moves rapidly into an unknown but willed future of action destructive of the old personal values. Moments of personal satisfaction are all charged with the possibility of death, not as chance or as the course of life, but as historically inevitable. Each simple family portrait or figure in a doorway may be, as it were, a spy and armed. A poem begins, for example, with the poet at his window, shifts into a prayer to the "Lords of Limit" (lords of endurance, personal and historical, to which each man in his isolated personal life must submit), and advances rapidly to a picture in which all familiar attachments are distorted and destroyed by revolutionary terror.

Auden's poetry expresses a pause between worlds. He uses no scientific, strained, or forced revolutionary imagery, but the simple and established imagery of the old order seen through a mind that realizes that this very imagery typifies a certain social era and is for us today comic, horrible, or prophetic. In this last book the poet has largely neglected satire—a vein in which he is very clever but not very important. These poems are personal lyrics, expressing the inevitable discord between the heart's necessities and the mind's convictions. In them the personal romantic moment is always absorbed by the will-to-action. In this clash between mind and emotions there is certainly some horror for the poet. There is, however, also hope. Even after turning to Iceland, the new source of the romantic imagery of pure escape for these younger poets (used as once the Alps were by the early romantics), Auden, in a new poem recently published in Poetry, not included in this book, finds that in this austere, remote island, too, "the world is, and the present, and the lie."

One might add that Auden has given up Gerard Hopkins's influence for A. E. Housman's. That stoic's classic simplicity and even his philosophy have somewhat affected these later poems. His influence, however is good. Auden is never imitative. He could sometimes be briefer—and more dramatic. He is sometimes just a shade too clever. But on the whole this last book proves him a poet to whom we must pay our respects.

EDA LOU WALTON

A Twelve-Cylinder Idyl

APRIL. A FABLE OF LOVE. By Vardis Fisher. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

VARDIS FISHER'S narrative muse is like one of those racing cars that cannot go less than sixty miles an hour and are therefore useless on an ordinary highway. Merely to crank them is to create thunder; low speed for them is the speed of a hurricane; they are not to be thought of, as indeed they are never seen, save on Daytona Beach or the salt flats of Utah. There of course they may be magnificent, but it is scarcely proper to inquire whether they are real automobiles. To the extent that they cannot turn a corner and convey passengers and stop for gas they are of course preposterous; though on their native stretches they may suggest all that an automobile can be in terms of strength and speed.

Any novel by Mr. Fisher is incapable of slow motion or plain statement. He writes every sentence with all the might he possesses, for he is never calmer than his characters, all of whom are constantly excited to the point of explosion. The result is that he cannot be called a reviewer of life, or even a critic of it, since we have never been where he has been. But at the same time the experience of reading him can be very exhilarating, and can remind us that there is such a thing as pure literary power, as naked literary energy. The experience of reading his tetralogy about Vidar Hunter was bound to be more or less stupendous even if one deplored its excess of autobiography at the close. And this much slighter tale, in which Mr. Fisher so happily escapes from his private problems, has in its own queer way something titanic at the core.

With an almost monstrous exaggeration Mr. Fisher gives us the thoughts and feelings of a homely girl in Idaho whose only distinction, her imagination, is unappreciated by the barbarous society into which she has been born. Mr. Fisher exaggerates both the society and the girl; it becomes a circle of oversized apes and she in its center becomes a poetess eloquent beyond belief. June—or, as she renames herself, April—has the misfortune to contain within her bumpy, un-

For $3 — A Group of Experienced Technicians Goes to Work for You

HOW can you, a consumer, know what you're getting when you go to market? The government knows what it's getting—because it conducts technical tests of the merchandise it buys. The manufacturer knows what he's getting—because he does the same with his raw materials. It hasn't been so easy for the consumer. Lacking the technical knowledge and the facilities required for testing products, he also lacks the funds to test even a fraction of the products he uses. Now, however, the consumer can have merchandise tested for him—honestly, dependably, without bias, and at a very nominal cost—by a nation-wide, technical organization set up and controlled by consumers interested in getting the most for their money.

The name of this organization is Consumers Union of United States, Inc. Formed on a strictly non-profit, membership basis under the laws of New York State, the purpose of this organization is to serve its members in the capacity of a consumers' testing laboratory by providing them with accurate and unbiased technical information about their everyday purchases. More than 2,000 readers of the Nation—and more than 26,000 other consumers throughout the United States are now members of Consumers Union.

To them every month goes Consumers Union Reports, a compact magazine provocatively illustrated, written in straightforward language, and describing and rating tested products by brand names as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," or "Not Acceptable." Competent, unbiased technicians, either on the staff of Consumers Union or employed as consultants, working in university and other laboratories, make the analyses and determine the ratings by means of laboratory and other standard tests, the results of which are painstakingly checked and verified. Products reported on include most of the merchandise you have occasion to buy from day to day: shoes, toothpastes, radios, foods, drugs, cosmetics, vacuum cleaners, soaps, liquors, clothing, tires, oils, and many things besides. Notes are also included in the Reports on the labor conditions under which many of the products are manufactured, these notes, however, being entirely independent of the technical recommendations.

Consumers Union has no connection with any commercial interest. Its income is derived solely from membership fees and contributions and is used solely in the interests of its members. The membership fee (which confers voting rights) is $3 a year. It includes twelve issues of the monthly Reports and a yearly Buying Guide (the 1937 edition of this Guide, running to nearly 200 pages, is now in preparation). An abridged edition of the Reports, covering only the less expensive products, is also available at $1 a year.

To become a member of Consumers Union, mail the application form below. Your membership will begin either with the forthcoming March issue or with any previous issue you may indicate. Listings of the principal subjects covered in past issues are given in the coupon below. (Note: Consumers Union Reports is not sold on newsstands and is available only through membership, subscription, or at the office of Consumers Union, 55 Vandam Street, New York.)

CONSUMERS UNION OF U. S.

COLSTON E. WARNE.....President

ARTHUR KALLET.....Director

D. H. PALMER...Technical Supervisor

Some of the More Than Seventy Sponsors

JACOB BAKER—President Roosevelt's Special Commission on Cooperatives.

PAUL BLANSHARD—Commissioner of Accounts, New York City.

HEYWOOD BROWN—Well-known columnist and a director of Consumers Union.

WINIFRED CHAPPELL—Methodist Federation for Social Service.

MALCOLM COWLEY—An editor, "The New Republic."

DR. ABRAHAM GOLDFORB—Secretary, American Society of Experimental Biology and Medicine.

FRANCIS GORMAN—Vice President, United Textile Workers of America.

DR. ALVIN JOHNSON—Director, New School for Social Research.

PROF. ROBERT S. LYND—Department of Educational Sociology, Columbia.

EVELYN PRESTON—President, League of Women Shoppers.

Ratings of 1937 Cars

Divided into three price classifications under $1,000, over twenty-five leading models of 1937 automobiles are rated in the forthcoming March issue of Consumers Union Reports (ready for mailing about February 25). Some of them are rated as "Best Buys," some as "Not Acceptable," and others as "Also Acceptable" in the estimated order of their merit. Based on such factors as economy, comparative safety of operation, general performance and other engineering features, these ratings were made by competent automotive engineers after thorough examinations and actual performance tests. Such features as hypoid gears, automatic choke, frame durability, driver-visibility, and others are discussed at length. Tables on comparative gas consumption are also given. This report—which should be read by everyone contemplating the purchase of a new car—will be followed in an early issue by ratings of cars in higher-priced groups. Previous issues of the Reports (still available) have analyzed and rated tires, gasolines, motor oils, and anti-freeze solutions.

Also discussed in the March issue are the following products: RADIO SETS, FLOUR, SHEETS, CAN OPENERS, BAKED BEANS, CANNED ASPARAGUS AND CHERRIES.

SOME OF THE CARS RATED IN THIS ISSUE

Willys	Ford	Chrysler
Chevrolet	Buick	Dodge
Plymouth	Studebaker	DeSoto

Begin my membership with issue checked.

- ☐ MAY—Toilet Soaps, Breakfast Cereals, Milk.
- ☐ JUNE—Automobiles, Gasolines, Seeds.
- ☐ JULY—Refrigerators, Used Cars, Motor Oils.
- ☐ AUG.—Oil Burners and Stokers, Hoaxery, Blacklist of Drugs and Cosmetics, Meat.
- ☐ SEPT.—Shoes, Tires, Whiskies, Women's Coats.
- ☐ OCT.—Men's Shirts, Gins, Electric Razors, Dentifrices, Anti-freeze Solutions.
- ☐ NOV.—Radios, Toasters, Wines, Children's Shoes, Winter Oils.
- ☐ DEC.—Vacuum Cleaners, Fountain Pens, Electric Irons, Blankets, Nose Drops.
- ☐ JAN.-FEB.—Men's Suits, Cold Remedies, Shaving Creams, Children's Undergarments.
- ☐ MAR.—1937 Autos, Radio Sets, Sheets, Flour, Canned Foods.

To: CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.,
55 Vandam St., New York

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

- ☐ $3 for one year's membership, $2.50 of which is for a year's subscription to the complete edition of Consumers Union Reports.

- ☐ $1 for one year's membership, 50c of which is for a year's subscription to the abridged edition of Consumers Union Reports. (Note: Reports on higher-priced products are not in this edition.)

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Signature

Address

City and State.....Occupation.....N-2

attractive body not only a desire for love but a superior understanding of it; yet among the clowns of Antelope there is nobody to share this understanding with her, let alone marry her as she might like. All but one of the men are blind to what is within her, and he—poor old Sol Incham—miscalculates its intensity, supposing it to be something like his own simple, sentimental soul. As for April's mother, Mrs. Weeg, many years of reading paper-backed novels have rendered her virtually idiotic; she believes in love, but not in the realities of it which April is forced to worship on lonely walks up and down the beautiful mountain where her imagination has been nourished. The story, in so far as there is one, is of how June fiercely confronts her problem at last and blazes her way through the underbrush of indecision to a clearing where she achieves some kind of union with Sol.

The exaggeration of which I have spoken could in other hands than Mr. Fisher's have ruined this simple tale. In his hands, despite the temptation we occasionally feel to disbelieve everything and everybody, something else happens altogether. For as the personages grow in size, the space between them widens too, so that the tale takes on a certain abstract, primordial quality; we get love in the large, as one can fancy it actually to have moved the lives of the diplodocuses and brontosaurus which once towered above the earth's great trees. Doubtless we learn nothing from the spectacle, but the spectacle itself is in some gross way fine; particularly in view of the humor with which Mr. Fisher has handled it. There were moments of mad humor in his tetralogy which did not relieve the unwholesome tensions already set up, and indeed it was never quite clear that they were humor. Here it is very clear; Mr. Fisher is enjoying his vision, and the book in some mammoth way relishes the fact that it is being written. One may therefore welcome "April" for other reasons than that it is a good book of its kind; it is a sign that Mr. Fisher has loosened up, and consequently it is a promise of still better books to come.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Iron Maiden

PRIMITIVISM AND DECADENCE. A STUDY OF AMERICAN EXPERIMENTAL POETRY. By Yvor Winters. Arrow Editions. $2.50.

YVOR WINTERS, writing like a combination of a medieval scholastic and a New England divine, is a critic of a type that one has become accustomed to regard as practically extinct. Yet it is a type that is always with us—through innumerable changes of disguise. Although he would doubtless shudder at the comparison, the distortions effected by his method are not fundamentally unlike those of the extreme left in current criticism—the writings of someone like Granville Hicks, for example. What his little volume most generally illustrates, as a matter of fact, is the characteristic defect of any critical method too literally applied: the substitution of a self-propelling system of logic for that ever more supple cooperation of intelligence and sensibility required in genuine interpretation. Both intelligence and sensibility are put to rout before the antics of a distinctly tipsy intellect. Mr. Winters, the author of some charming lyrics in the imagist manner, is not without sensibility, and there are moments of the finest intelligence in these pages. But there are also moments when they achieve what Ezra Pound has described as "the nadir of solemn and elaborate imbecility." It is intellect, and nothing else, that speaks when we are told that such feebly endowed traditionalists as T. Sturge Moore and Robert Bridges are more important poets than Yeats, Eliot, Crane, Stevens, and certain other contemporaries not even mentioned. It is again an abuse of intellect that leads to the conclusion that one of W. C. Williams's narrative pieces is "superior in all likelihood to any other prose of our time," and that Bridges's daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Daryush, is "one of the few great poets living." These claims are rendered absurd not through any preconceived judgments of the reader but through the very evidences offered in their support. The mistake is to quote the specimens by Moore and Bridges and Mrs. Daryush, for the reader is then forced to measure his own perception against Mr. Winters's logic, and the result is disastrous. But it is perhaps foolish to quarrel with these particular judgments when the sophistry behind all of them is so manifest.

Evidently Mr. Winters began with a temperamental distaste for the general atmosphere of distress, the hectic experimentation with forms and with style, that has characterized so much contemporary verse. But to this situation he responded with that mechanism of the mind which consists in reacting to any phenomenon by celebrating its opposite. If Hart Crane was a disorderly sort of poet, then Bridges is a model to be emulated. If free verse has led to some unfortunate formal consequences, it follows that poetry must return to the strictest metrical conventions. (The book closes with a long dissertation on meter.) The assumption is made that the attainment of order or form has nothing directly to do with the experience with which literature has to deal. Instead of seeking in contemporary experience a possible explanation for the formal vicissitudes of contemporary verse, Mr. Winters directs himself to charges of an almost universal and wholly inexplicable wilfulness on the part of the poets themselves. For him poetry is not something subject to the main philosophical, ethical, and social buffetings of an age. It is an independent formal discipline; and form itself is finally represented as a kind of Iron Maiden, whose custodians are Churchill, Pope, Gay, Voltaire, and, presumably, Mrs. Daryush. In short, he would reform poetry by having it lift itself by its own boot straps.

Mr. Winters is narrow, dogmatic, parochial; and these are all the defects of his method. But it would be unjust not to mention the virtues of these defects: the sharpening of focus on important problems, the formulation of useful distinctions, and the construction of definitions that at least provide a springboard for discussion. For the reader already familiar with the field the book will be full of incidental rewards; but for anyone else it is likely to prove an unreliable and mischievous guide.

WILLIAM TROY

Biography of a River

THE NILE: THE LIFE-STORY OF A RIVER. By Emil Ludwig. Translated by Mary H. Lindsay. The Viking Press. $5.

IN SPITE of a few lush passages, to be expected from a man who has made his fame by popular biographies, in spite of certain strongly individual judgments which will find objectors, this is a magnificent book. In the main Ludwig writes a prose that is vivid, forceful, and packed with information. Like Gibbon he has often summarized in a paragraph the knowledge gained from many books.

He begins with the rise of the White Nile in the Mountains of the Moon near Lake Victoria, a beautiful inland sea larger than Switzerland, and of the Blue Nile near Lake Tana.

Both lakes were unknown to the Pharaohs; both have recently figured in international news. Is Ludwig heaping new confusion on old by thus reversing accustomed chronology, by beginning with the present day, bringing us after two hundred pages to the great story of Chinese Gordon at Khartoum and a little later to Colonel Marchand's romantic and tremendous adventure at Fashoda, reaching the Pharaohs only in the latter half of the book, and then taking up the conquering nations in the Delta, the Persians, Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, Turks, the Mamelukes, the emerging Egyptian state, the English Protectorate, King Fuad? Not at all. The great story achieves a unity it has never been given before. Whoever would understand the full significance of the present attempts of the Egyptians to establish an independent state, of Mussolini to conquer Abyssinia, of England to block him, of all the European nations to seize a part of Africa, had best begin with Ludwig at the sources of the Nile.

"The river has been bridged in the first moments of its life: a short distance downstream a gray iron bridge bears the train which connects the mighty lake with the Indian Ocean." On either side this train is jungle which Ludwig describes with delightful particularity. "From out the carmine convolvulus that muffles up the mimosa the turquoise-blue kingfisher, hanging close above the water, peers motionless, spying down to snatch the fish. Rocking to and fro on the flexible points of the palm-fans are the nests of the weaver-birds, who at these airiest points can elude the grasp of the monkeys and snakes." With the same vivid precision he describes the vegetation of the country, and its natives—the pigmies who dwell on the slopes of the Mountains of the Moon, the tall Dinkas, the cannibals, the Bongo, the Madi, the Banjoro, the Shilluks.

From its earliest history the wealth of the Nile has been seized by the few, who have oppressed the many by their manifold exactions. Conquerors have differed only in their methods of grinding down the poor. But they never reached these upper regions of the river. Ludwig shows Uganda as an earthly paradise before the whites first came eighty years ago to enslave the natives by offering them wages. "The first month of the year is the month of sowing," so a popular saying goes, "the others are for eating." Now the natives labor all the year for the English and eat no more than before.

But the English have done more for Africa than bring it the new slavery of the wage system. Ludwig's account of their creative accomplishments, their rapacities, their justice, their pride of race, is a model of impartial, discerning writing. In Cairo the sons of peasants are being educated at Gordon College. They will soon take their own back, he prophesies, and "the rise of the Sudan will have changed the fate of Egypt and even of Abyssinia by the end of the twentieth century."

Throughout Ludwig is more concerned with the fellah than with his numerous conquerors. "The boy is begotten," he quotes a popular rhyme, "only to be torn from his mother's arms. When he is grown to manhood his bones are broken." Not until the last century have real leaders of the people appeared. Arabi and Zaghul are dead, but clearly Ludwig hopes that soon for the first time in their history the Egyptian workers will come into their own. Yet his book abounds in material that should forewarn the social reformer. The greatest exploitation in all this long history of rapacity fell upon the people after the Christians, in pursuit of their absolute God, had broken down the traditional government and, occupied with arguing the difference between "homoousian" and "homoiousian," had left the country defenseless before the Mohammedans.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

This important biography of HEARST has just been issued in the

Modern Library

No. 81

Was $2.75
NOW ONLY

95¢

COMPLETE AND UNABRIDGED

Imperial Hearst

By FERDINAND LUNDBERG

THE true story of Hearst's whole journalistic, political, and financial career—soberly set down, documented with facts, and brought up to the minute! Of this brilliantly written, devastating biography Oswald Garrison Villard says: "No future biographer or historian will dare write without building on Imperial Hearst. Nowhere else can as many documented facts be found and nowhere else as true a measure of this man." No. 81.

Some other modern classics in the Modern Library:

- No. 63 THE THEORY OF THE LEISURE CLASS by Thorstein Veblen
- No. 104 WINESBURG, OHIO by Sherwood Anderson
- No. 160 THE DANCE OF LIFE by Havelock Ellis
- No. 164 THE AMENITIES OF BOOK COLLECTING by A. Edward Newton
- No. 176 OF HUMAN BONDAGE by W. Somerset Maugham
- No. 197 TONO BUNGAY by H. G. Wells
- No. 202 CAPITAL by Karl Marx
- No. 209 ANTIC HAY by Aldous Huxley
- No. 215 TEN DAYS THAT SHOOK THE WORLD by John Reed

*See coupon for FREE examination offer;
send for complete list of 215 titles.*

To any bookseller, or The MODERN LIBRARY
20 E. 57 St., New York, N. Y.

Send me the Modern Library books whose numbers I have encircled below. () I enclose remittance (95c each). () Send C.O.D. () Include complete list of 215 titles.

63 81 104 160 164 176 197 202 209 215

Name.....

Address.....

City & State.....

NOTE: Books may be returned within five days for full refund if you are not completely satisfied.

Harper Headliners

I VISIT THE SOVIETS

BY E. M. DELAFIELD

The famous "Provincial Lady" went to Russia: lived for several weeks on a Collective Farm; wandered through city streets; visited factories, schools, nurseries—and saw, not a Movement, but human beings revealing under a new regime the same old frailties, absurdities, paradoxes and eccentricities. Her book is a refreshingly new note on Russia. Illustrated by Leo Manso. $2.50

INSIDE EUROPE

BY JOHN GUNTHER

A continuous best-seller for over a year, this famous book remains fresh, up-to-the-minute and completely indispensable. The 4th revised edition, just out, contains new material on the Simpson crisis, Spain's death struggle, Blum's bloodless revolution, etc. "The best book about Europe anyone ever wrote."—Walter Duranty. $3.50

AARON BURR THE PROUD PRETENDER

BY HOLMES ALEXANDER

"The best complete picture of Aaron Burr I have ever seen."—James Truslow Adams. "Holmes Alexander has succeeded more fully than any other biographer in recreating the person of Aaron Burr and in explaining him."—Henry Steele Commager in N. Y. Herald Tribune $3.50

THE HUMAN COMEDY

BY JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON

The important new book by the author of "The Mind in the Making." "The modernity of his attitude is again strikingly revealed. His general sanity and soundness are obvious, the flow of his thoughts and words compelling."—N. Y. Times. $3.00

MAN'S WORLDLY GOODS

BY LEO HUBERMAN

"The most successful attempt to date to link the history of man to the history of economic theory"—Clifton Fadiman in The New Yorker. "Huberman has traced the development of economic thought in the framework of economic history. Simply, clearly and fluidly."—Max Lerner, Editor of The Nation. Illustrated. $2.50

SALVAGE

BY ROGER VERCEL

"A magnificent sea drama."—N. Y. Times. "In its suspense and power it recalls Victor Hugo. In its conviction and realism it reminds one of Conrad"—Book-of-the-Month Club News. $2.50

Pushkin the Man

PUSHKIN. By Ernest J. Simmons. Harvard University Press. $4.

HERE is an ample chronicle of the works and, more especially, the days of the man who is being commemorated, a hundred years after his death, as the national poet of Russia and the tutelary genius of its literature. The book has considerable merit and indeed supersedes the only existing biography of Pushkin in English, that by D. S. Mirsky. It is on the whole a scholarly performance, and not without lively moments, for Pushkin's story is quick with human interest. These pages allow one to glimpse the precocious child, the giddy youth parading a cynicism which hides his sensitiveness, and at last to know the mature man, passionate, impulsive, outgoing, keen. Although the author is aware of his hero's stature, he makes no attempt to glorify the poet by ignoring the weaknesses of the man. Sufficient space is accorded his amorous experiences, which were legion and not seldom tawdry, the matter being treated with candor that avoids both prudishness and prurency. One comes to perceive the roots of his tragic end both in the outward circumstances of his life and in the nature of his personality.

Repeatedly Mr. Simmons returns to the question, now so timely, of Pushkin's political and social views. He makes it plain that although Pushkin hated oppression and obscurantism and was, during most of his short life, a political suspect, he was not a revolutionist either by temperament or conviction. In his youth he had radical sympathies, and indeed his civic lyrics contributed to the movement which culminated in the Decembrists' attempts to overthrow the autocracy. After, if not because of, the failure of that attempt, his outlook was that of a mild liberal with a lingering faith in reforms from above and a dread of a popular rising. His art, though it evinces a concern with the rebellious spirit, on the whole expresses an attitude of acquiescence. It is perhaps not without significance that, as a Russian critic has recently observed, Pushkin's prestige has not been at its highest during the critical periods of Russian history, so that his immense vogue at present may be another sign that the country is entering upon an organic phase of development. One must recognize, however, that his work manifests a sympathy with the common man and a humane quality which must endear him to a society that seeks to establish itself upon a broad democratic base.

"A biographer," writes Mr. Simmons, "must study Pushkin as a man, as a poet, and as an historical figure." The poet and the historical figure fare less well in this account, however, than does the man. The comment on the writings is meager, conventional, occasionally feeble, and is introduced into the narrative in a somewhat mechanical fashion. Problems relating to the genesis and technique of the works are either disregarded or slurred over. "The Captain's Daughter," Pushkin's main prose work and the one by which he is best known to the outside world (there are over a dozen versions of it in English alone), is dismissed in some fourteen rather inadequate lines. The author gives more attention, and justly, to Pushkin's verse than to his prose, but unfortunately he yields to the natural temptation of backing up his superlatives by citing rhymed English translations. The best of these versions are apt to leave the reader cold. Some of them, notably the lines on page 313, those on page 325, and the rendering of the exquisite, profoundly moving lyric "Tis time, my friend," indicate that the translator failed to understand certain of the Russian phrases. One could more readily forgive Mr. Simmons had there not been available translations closer to the spirit and the letter of the original. A single example is that noble lyric, "Message to Siberia," admirably done into English verse by Max Eastman some years ago. The stanzas presented are so faulty that one is surprised to find them here. Indeed, after reading this volume, the reader with no knowledge of Russian will still have to take on trust Pushkin's indubitable greatness as a poet.

HARPER & BROTHERS

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

It belonged to his genius to use the stuff of the life around him as the material of his art, but in doing so he availed himself of the values that he found both in the classical tradition that he inherited and in the romantic influences of his own day. Furthermore, he completed the labor begun a century earlier of balancing the three elements of the Russian language—the Slavonic of the church books, the vernacular, and the borrowings from the West—thus implementing the work of his successors with a strong and pliant tool. He stood on the threshold of an age in which Russia, the period of its apprenticeship over, made an original contribution to Western culture. In many ways his writings prefigure the performance of the men who came after him. Mr. Simmons mentions these points, but he does not elaborate them sufficiently to bring into focus Pushkin as "an historical figure." In fine, he has not accomplished the ambitious task he set himself, but has provided an introduction to Pushkin which is biography in the narrower sense of the word. It is to be hoped that the book will help to stimulate an interest in Pushkin outlasting the centenary celebrations.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

American Peace Movement

PEACE OR WAR. THE AMERICAN STRUGGLE 1636-1936. By Merle Curti. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THE complete history of the American peace movement is still to be written. Neither Professor Curti's volume nor the similar one by Devere Allen wholly covers the field. Mr. Allen added to his history an interpretation of the present movement and its future; Professor Curti has analyzed the spirit and philosophy of the peace movement. This is the more rewarding portion of his book. He properly records the inconsistencies of some of those who advocated non-resistance when the Civil War came, and could well have added the story of the many who abandoned their convictions in the war to safeguard democracy. He puts his finger on a genuine weakness of the peace movement when he says that "most friends of peace, coming from the middle classes, have naturally accepted the existing order and have not seen the threats to peace inherent in it." He is aware that the pioneers in the movement failed to respond to the pleas of early labor leaders, and he notes the deafness of latter-day peace advocates to the argument that peace cannot come as long as our whole society is built on the desire for profits. Professor Curti is certain that a continuation of the "peace policies and tactics of the past will bring diminishing returns" and that the present economic and social order will "have to be replaced by one more definitely collectivistic and democratic."

Professor Curti also sees that the peace movement has suffered from internal conflict, duplication of effort, and ineffective marshaling of its forces. He might have added from the incessant compromising of many individuals and societies, as when the New York Peace Society named to its Board of Directors the head of the Navy League, generals, and admirals, and supported a proposal for more battleships for the United States navy. The folly of a pseudo-devotion to peace like this is obvious. It has naturally created in the

LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH

Reperusals and Re-Collections

The new book by the author of ON READING SHAKESPEARE and ALL TRIVIA. A collection of essays written over a period of years, it includes appreciations of Logan Pearsall Smith's favorite authors—Montaigne, Madame de Sévigné, Jane Austen, Jeremy Taylor, as well as portraits of people of interest he has known.

$3.50

KARL MANNHEIM

Ideology and Utopia

This new volume in the famous International Library of Psychology, Philosophy, and Scientific Method is an introduction to the sociology of knowledge, translated from the German by Louis Wirth and Edward Shils. In sharp contrast with the post-War literature which has talked about the "decline" and the "death" of Western civilization, Mannheim's work stands out as a sober and scholarly analysis of the social currents of our time. "IDEOLOGY AND UTOPIA is one of the three or four books that must be read by everyone who wants to discuss public affairs intelligently."—Charles A. Beard. $4.00

Just out, the new novel of Lord Peter Wimsey and Harriet Vane

BUSMAN'S HONEYMOON

by Dorothy L. Sayers author of "Gaudy Night"
$2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE and COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

A clear, unbiased study of the Arab-
Jewish Problem

PALESTINE AT THE CROSSROADS

By Ladislav Farago

Author of "Abyssinia on the Eve"

One of the world's potential danger points—the Jewish-Arab problem is far from being a simple one between native and intruder. The Palestine riots are rather the result of clashing temperaments, ideals and habits. The author, from personal observation in the summer of 1936, describes background and events as he saw them.

This is a sincere book by a keen observer who makes no arguments for either side, but lets facts, conditions and realities speak for themselves. Illustrated. $3.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, 2 W. 45th St., N. Y.

ZERO HOUR

By RICHARD
FREUND

The ONLY Complete Up-to-the-minute Guide to WORLD POLITICS

Here are all the answers to queries about the present world crisis. It is the only book that explains in terms of recent background the world events of today and surveys the possibilities of tomorrow. In Europe, around the Mediterranean, in China, Japan, India, Africa and the United States forces are at work that may push the world into war at any moment. Zero Hour tells Who, What, Why and How. $2.50 public mind a belief that the peace movement is none too sincere and that it will always collapse in the face of a war.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 114 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

On the whole Professor Curti's book is disappointing. He has brought valuable material together, but his narrative is full of omissions and seems to lack continuity and directness. Opinions must, of course, differ as to the amount of space to be given to any phase of a subject when the author is limited to one moderate-sized volume. It does seem odd, however, that only thirty pages are given to all the peace pioneers and their work prior to 1861. The result is a failure adequately to portray such men as Elihu Burritt and William Ladd, and a slighting of the work of the Garrisonian Non-Resistants to the extent that their remarkable three-day convention in Boston, September 18-20, 1838, is not even mentioned. Since Leo Tolstoy declared that he got his non-resistant ideas from Garrison, and Gandhi states that he took his from Tolstoy, it seems not unreasonable to say that the short-lived American Non-Resistant movement and its shorter-lived organ merited at least a recording of their existence by Professor Curti. Similarly the treatment of the Quakers and especially of their role in the Civil and the World War is scarcely adequate. Again, there is no complete presentation of the circumstances leading up to the war with Spain, or of the admirable part played by many newspapers in the furthering of peace. Professor Curti has labored hard, but defects of style and arrangement militate against the value of the book.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

For the Defense

BERNARD SHAW, FRANK HARRIS, AND OSCAR WILDE. By Robert Harborough Sherard. With a Preface by Lord Alfred Douglas. The Greystone Press. $3.50.

THIRTY-SIX years after Oscar Wilde's death, and despite a mounting pile of intimate documents, it seems as difficult as ever to know the truth about his life. Each witness in this distressing case contradicts his predecessor, and not infrequently himself. Confessions and retractions, forgeries, lawsuit on lawsuit, this seems to be the natural atmosphere of the Wilde coterie—and unfortunately Frank Harris's "Oscar Wilde" is hardly the exception to this rule. Hailed in 1916 with extravagant praise by such critics as Bernard Shaw, H. L. Mencken, Upton Sinclair, and even by the restrained Ernst Paulus Bendz writing in the restrained Englische Studien, Harris's biography has lost by now its original stature. Its emphasis on the bacchanalian aspects of Wilde's history, its engaging absurdities, its continual feeding of Wilde to the flames of Harris's egotheism, have rendered suspect even those passages which contain authentic information and shrewd insight. In this sense Mr. Sherard's study was hardly necessary; nevertheless, as a sort of labor of hate, he has compiled here a detailed record of Harris's probable fictions and plagiarisms. But Mr. Sherard weakens an eminently sound argument by his garrulity and painful whimsicality, his lack of literary discrimination; he expatiates on Harris's minor inaccuracies, he juxtaposes incontestable and frail evidence, he bears a childish animosity toward Harris and Bernard Shaw. And it must be remembered that Mr. Sherard, in the course of his long career as a Wilde apologist, has probably misrepresented as many facts in order to exculpate the unhappy Wilde as Harris has to incriminate him—and without Harris's talent.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

DRAMA

The Deaths of Kings

IT HAS been shrewdly said that a really great and successful writer must have a good deal of talent as well as a good deal of genius. That means, I take it, that the facility and ease which may seem so little important when they constitute the whole of an artistic equipment are nevertheless indispensable if genius is to be rendered fully effective, and that Shakespeare, for example, would not be universally recognized as the supreme example of greatness in literature if he had not been, incidentally, perfect master of all the minor ingeniosities which taken by themselves are no adequate measure of his stature as a writer.

But it has not, so far as I know, ever been pointed out that this fact also supplies the reason why these really great writers are often misjudged in their own time and put on the same level as lesser men who approach them in talent without having any genius at all. Time was necessary before it could be universally agreed that Shakespeare was more than a popular entertainer, just as, to take a more recent example, Dickens was conventionally placed below Thackeray largely because the exuberance of his talent aroused doubt about his solid virtues even in minds which perceived them without quite daring to trust their perceptions. Genius which comes rough and without the art to recommend itself we recognize easily if we are able to recognize it at all, because, if we are pleased, we know that it can be for the one reason alone. But art that is wholly amiable is often, like men or women who are the same, unjustly suspect, for the simple reason that we are so often not quite sure whether we are being legitimately charmed or only seduced. Even this, alas, is not the only difficulty, for the danger is double-edged, and the writer whose talents are so conspicuous that we tend to overlook his genius is rather less common than his false twin whose talents win a reputation which only time can reduce to its proper proportions.

This long preamble is in itself, I fear, sufficient indication of the extent to which I am personally unsure in my judgment of Maxwell Anderson, whose third play of the season, "The Masque of Kings," has just been produced by the Theater Guild at the Shubert Theater. His facility and his talent are no less than phenomenal; that he is, at the very least, one of the two or three most interesting American playwrights of our generation could hardly be doubted; and yet I must frankly confess that even now, more than a dozen years after I saw his first play, I still have no settled judgment upon him so far as concerns the question whether his talents lead his admirers to overestimate his solid worth or whether those who take the easier way are wrong in assuming that facility is being mistaken for greatness.

Nor does the new play give me greater assurance. Theatrically it is, I think, extraordinarily effective, and I know of no other living playwright who could refurbish the familiar romance of splendid courts and sinister intrigues as successfully as Mr. Anderson does in this possible version of the events which led up to the finding of Prince Rudolph of Austria dead in the hunting lodge at Mayerling. That he has thoroughly mastered the grand romantic manner in so far as its purely theatrical aspects are concerned seems to me

CHAPEL HILL BOOKS

The Ejido: MEXICO'S WAY OUT

BY EYLER N. SIMPSON A comprehensive study of Mexican land problems with special emphasis on agrarian communities. Suggestions for the future economic and social organization of Mexico. This work will be of basic importance for years to come. 850 pages. Illustrated. $5.00.

Preface to Peasantry

BY ARTHUR RAPER "... it belongs on a must list for all who wish to understand the agricultural, labor and racial problems of the present-day South." Martha Gruening in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle. $3.50.

The Blessings of Liberty

BY FRANCIS P. MILLER "Perhaps never before has the case for the defense of liberty been presented in a more compact manner. . . ."—Dallas (Tex.), Morning News. $1.00.

The American State University:

ITS RELATION TO DEMOCRACY

BY NORMAN FOERSTER Has the American state university progressively tended to subvert the higher interests of our democracy? $2.50.

The Supreme Court and the Commerce Clause

BY FELIX FRANKFURTER "... those who would like to know where the President got some of his ideas concerning the Supreme Court's functions may find some of the answers here."—Philadelphia (Pa.), Evening Public Ledger. $1.00.

Paul Laurence Dunbar

BY BENJAMIN BRAWLEY The only biography ever published singly of the young Negro poet. $1.00.

The Magic Plant: THE GROWTH OF SHELLEY'S THOUGHT

BY CARL GRABO "... commended to all who are interested in Shelley, or in the forces which operated in the first half of the nineteenth century; or in their own psychology and that of their fellow-men."—The New York Times Book Review. $4.00.

Under the Swastika

BY JOHN B. HOLT An interesting, accurate, and objective account of Nazi Germany, its origin and present political structure and functioning. $2.50.

German Agricultural Policy 1918-1934

BY JOHN B. HOLT "The reviewer does not see how one can understand postwar Germany unless one is well acquainted with the issues and facts set forth here in detail."—Carle C. Zimmerman in The Annals of The American Academy of Political and Social Science. $2.50.

Wage and Hour Legislation for the South, Southern Policy Pamphlet No. 9. By H. M. DOUTY. $1.50.

Write for a copy of our complete catalog

U. N. C. PRESS—CHAPEL HILL, N. C.

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS ARE FOR ONE YEAR. They may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed thirty days. To make certain there is no increase in your cost, we suggest you order immediately on the form below.

The Nation and Reader's Digest

Two of America's most outstanding magazines at a discount of 25%! The Reader's Digest affords a delightful but inexpensive means of keeping well informed. Each issue of 112 pages condenses over 30 articles you would probably mark for reading if you checked all current magazines. When ordering this combination, you save $2. $6

The Nation and Harper's Magazine

One of the most popular combinations offered Nation readers. Harpers regularly presents brilliant writers on significant topics concerning our rapidly shifting scene, and noteworthy short stories. Next year, 120 impressive articles and 40 first rate stories! You save $6.50 $2.50.

The Nation and Guardian

The Manchester Guardian remains one of England's most outstanding liberal weeklies, featuring news and interpretation of English politics and literature. It is an extraordinary paper for any one concerned about the English point of view on international affairs. $7.75

OTHER COMBINATIONS

The Nation with
Atlantic Monthly	$7.50
Common Sense	7.25
Current History	6.50
New Republic	8.75
New Yorker	9.75
Saturday Review	7.75
Scribner's	6.00

Order Form

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Please send me the magazines specified below. ☐ I enclose payment in full ☐ OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

MAGAZINES

SEND TO

beyond dispute. When one adds that the play has been given brilliant performance by a superb cast of actors including Henry Hull, Dudley Digges, Pauline Frederick, Glen Anders, and Margo, it ought to be plain enough how difficult it is to be sure that all these things are not alone sufficient to account for the effect produced. Yet Mr. Anderson has an important theme which he has developed in eloquent language. Prince Rudolph, having dreamed of a just government established upon revolution, abdicates before he has been crowned:

To the old and dying

I leave their dying kingdoms to be plowed
By the new sowers of death—fools like myself
Who rush themselves to power to set men free
And hold themselves in power by killing men,
As time was, as time will be, time out of mind
Unto this last, forever.

With the exception of "Winterset," "The Masque of Kings" is, I think the best of Mr. Anderson's tragic plays written since he abandoned naturalism for poetic drama, and it is inferior to "Winterset" chiefly because it is less startlingly original in both theme and manner. And though I must persist to the end in shirking the duty of final judgment I shall not do it without adding that there is no contemporary playwright to one of whose new plays I go with greater anticipation. There are half a dozen about whom I know with assurance satisfactory to myself exactly what I shall think. I do not know yet how much my pleasure in Mr. Anderson is due to the fact that I am being carried away; how much to the fact that I am being taken in.

Only lack of space prevents me from enlarging to an equal extent upon the merits of Maurice Evans's production of "King Richard II," which is beautifully staged at the St. James Theater and acted with a fine sense of the play's peculiar values. I dare say that it had for Shakespeare's contemporaries an emotional significance which it has to a large extent lost, that for them the spectacle of a weak king wallowing luxuriously in his own weakness had a sort of mystic horror which we feel but dimly. What remains—the brilliant portrait of a narcissist perennially occupied with what he calls "the lamentable tale of me"—is still one of the most fascinating of all "sad stories of the deaths of kings." This production should, and I think will, very considerably prosper the new popular interest in Shakespeare on the stage.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

To the season's gallery of the great and the near-great, add "Frederika" (Imperial), purporting to depict the passions and pastimes of Wolfgang von Goethe—with music by Franz Lehar and as much of the poet as Dennis King can salvage in a powdered peruke and a drawing-room full of prisms. Under the circumstances too much cannot be expected of the libretto, and "Frederika," in spite of the presence of Ernest Truex and lavish upholstery on the part of Hassard Short, does not improve upon the dismal tradition to which the operetta falls heir. Fortunately, there is an abundance of charming tunes at the disposal of Mr. King and Miss Helen Gleason (Frederika), and both not only make effective use of the melodies, with the aid of choruses in spun sugar, but handsomely complement each other in general good looks and quality of voice. The author of "Faust" may revolve in his grave to discover himself in 1937 reduced to a sequence of ballads sung, in the parlance of the playbill, by "Goethe and girls," but rarely have the tunes been pleasanter or the girls more ornamental.

B. B.

RECORDS

AFTER many years of the customary snobbish attitude toward Verdi, based on the customary knowledge of the Anvil Chorus and "La donna è mobile," I heard "Otello" and "Falstaff" and was amazed. And having begun with his masterworks I had the pleasure of discovering their qualities, subsequently, in "Aida," in "La Traviata," in "Rigoletto," in "Il Trovatore." The dramatic force of the earlier music is exciting even to a person who doesn't know what it is about; but with this force and occasional crudity in an opera like "Rigoletto" there is the delicacy that is to be heard in "Falstaff." And the value of the music comes not only from the extraordinary skill and musical talent for the specific purpose, but as much from the wonderful honesty and unpretentiousness that also are involved.

In Columbia's set of "Rigoletto" (15 records, $22.50) the Duke (Dino Borgioli) and Gilda (Mercedes Caspir) are none too good, but Riccardo Stracciari is a magnificent-voiced Rigoletto, other parts are sung very much as they would be at the Metropolitan, chorus and orchestra are good, and Molajoli's conducting is excellent. Recording is good, and the set comes with a complete text in Italian and English.

Ernest Newman once pointed out the inadequacy of most of the musical treatments of Goethe's "Faust," but had high praise for Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; and rehearing the work I have been impressed by the poetic and musical quality of much of it, though it is by no means without its banal and inflated moments. I owe the rehearing to Columbia's set (7 records, $10.50), which offers an excellent performance by the Grand Orchestre Philharmonique of Paris, the D'Alevis Vlassoff Russian Choir, and the tenor Villabella. Once the grooves are cleaned out, the set also offers orchestral recording that is among the finest of the year in its clarity, spaciousness, and fidelity to timbre.

Yella Pessl's playing of the harpsichord on Columbia records of Bach's Toccata in D (3 sides of 2 records, $3) continues to be heavily and unrelievedly emphatic. Moreover, it is less well recorded than some of her earlier performances; and even these are not as well recorded as Kirkpatrick's on Musicraft records.

Musicraft will, I am sure, want to improve the surface and stock of its records. What with the thinness of its first records and the brittleness of the stock, it was possible for one to crack them merely by waving them in the air. As for the surface, on a Scott machine equipped with an Astatic crystal pick-up it was a little quieter than Victor's surface on the first side of the Toscanini Beethoven Seventh, and a little less quiet than Victor's surface on the first side of the Toscanini "Italians in Algiers"; on a Panharmonic equipped with an Audak magnetic pick-up it was much less quiet than the "Italians in Algiers." On the Scott the noise of the Musicraft surface was not disturbing; on the Panharmonic it was more acute and obtrusive. What this demonstrates is the important fact that the result one gets with a record varies appreciably with every instrument the record is played on.

Columbia, for no reason that I can discover, offers a new set (5 records, $7.50) of Beethoven's Quartet Opus 132, made by the Lener String Quartet. I find the performance inferior in style to that of the London Quartet on the older set; and it is murkily recorded.

B. H. HAGGIN

THE Nation DINNER

in honor of

ANDRE MALRAUX

Head of the International Air Squadron defending Madrid

and

LOUIS FISCHER

The Nation's Moscow Correspondent who has spent the past five months in Spain will be held at

The Hotel Roosevelt, Madison Ave. & 45th St., N.Y.C.

FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 26th, at 7:30

Tickets: $3; Dress Optional

Reservations: The Nation, 20 Vesey Street COrt. 7-3330

Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with

HENRY HULL
DUDLEY DIGGES

MARGO
PAULINE FREDERICK

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday and Saturday 2:30. Eves. 8:30
300 Seats $1.10

THEATRE UNION presents

MARCHING SONG

BY JOHN HOWARD LAWSON

■ An exciting drama with ■ stirringly topical background of a sit-down strike in a company-owned automobile town.

BAYES THEATRE, 44th St. W. of Bway. ■■ 9-3648
Eves. 8:40. Mats Wed. and Sat. Prices: 45c, 60c, 75c, $1, $1.50
For Benefit Theatre Party Rates Call BR 9-2375

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

offers graduate professional curricula for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills for social work, leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SOCIAL WORK AGENCIES increasingly require such knowledge and skill from candidates for positions.

*For information about requirements
for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to*

DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

Letters to the Editors

Evidence Is Essential

Dear Sirs: I want to protest against your editorial, Behind the Moscow Trials.

1. It attempts, through a very superficial comparison of the Russian-European and the Anglo-Saxon concepts of due process, to defend the lack of evidence in Moscow. But who cares about differences in method when the essential purpose of all juridical systems is absolutely the same: to find the truth and to approximate justice! I was brought up not in the Anglo-Saxon but in the European concept, and I too was "profoundly disturbed by the prosecution's failure to produce and publish evidence." One has only to compare the Moscow trial with the Reichstag-fire trial, to see that there is no barrier against the prosecutor's introducing evidence in open court for weeks and weeks, whether the defendants confess or not, and whether the evidence is worth a nickel or not. No, another method of procedure can never be used to excuse the lack of evidence!

2. The editorial discusses all kinds of implications which, allegedly, make the confessions sound true. Then it admits that the confessions of conspiracy with the fascists are "most difficult of belief," but tries to overcome this difficulty by suspending judgment for the next hundred years. But if you suspend judgment on the decisive accusation in a political trial, how can you judge at all? The really objective observer will suspend all judgment, and demand evidence again and again.

3. The editorial completely ignores the fact that one defendant in the trials did not confess; that he contradicts all the confessions. Not even his name is mentioned in three and half columns. It happens to be the name not only of the chief defendant but also of a prominent contributor to The Nation, Leon Trotsky. Would it not have been fair to give him at least the benefit of any reasonable doubt? Or does the editorial writer, in his futile longing to understand the Moscow juridical procedure, abandon this Anglo-Saxon feature of due process?

There must be some explanation for your editorial. Behind Behind the Moscow Trials is at best the fear and horror which certain liberal idealists feel when brought face to face with cruel expressions of moving history. Everything seemed to be so fine and consoling in Russia, a country to which the weak pessimist could look and become optimistic. And now, out of a clear sky, these trials—no, let's draw a curtain over them! Every human being has a right to feel low from time to time, and it is the legitimate right of The Nation to print occasionally an outstanding piece of defeatism. But The Nation should call it that.

Yes, behind the Moscow trials are political realities, and it is The Nation's proper function to point them out. There would be even no objection to "political and emotional commitments"—indeed, they would be easier to forgive than your editorial's pseudo-objectivity. If Stalin has to get rid of his opponents and gets rid of them, that is historical weather-news. You can be sorry it rains, but it may be good for the fields. This would be a cheap but possible argument in the realm of political ethics. To say it does not rain because you have no umbrella is grotesque.

FRANZ HOELLERLING

New York, February 8

Congratulations

Dear Sirs: May I have the pleasure of complimenting you on your editorial on the Moscow trials in the February 6 Nation?

Your paragraph the week before was open to serious criticism. Naturally, then, I welcome its sequel, which I believe is in the best Nation tradition of critical understanding and sympathy.

SIDNEY L. JACKSON

Mt. Vernon, N. Y., February 7

Protecting Slanderers

Dear Sirs: The bill introduced in Congress by Representative Curley of New York to protect newspaper publishers and writers against contempt-of-court proceedings for refusal to give the source of information alleged to be "confidential" should be entitled "a bill to protect fakers, slanderers, and libelers." Anyone familiar with the record of our sensation-creating newspapers knows that the courts have been altogether too lenient with those contemptible character assassins, who always, when cornered, fall back on the plea: "Sources of information confidential." The sentencing to jail for thirty days of a Hearst reporter was a timely climax to the scandal-mongering gentry who make money by concocting fakes that help sell the newspapers to the credulous public.

If the Curley bill becomes law there will be opened up still wider fields for the professional blackmailers, who will be able to extort hush money from innocent persons who are afraid of the publicity that can easily be given to all sorts of monstrous charges without the accusers being called upon for proofs of their inventions. I hope that your readers will write to their Representatives in Congress, urging them to aid in defeating this bill.

WHIDDEN GRAHAM

New York, February 1

Correction

[In our issue of January 23 the name of B. C. Place was erroneously included in a list of General Motors executives receiving $50,000 or more. The figure opposite Mr. Place's name was correct but his income is derived from the Gagnier Fiber Products Company of Detroit. All the figures were taken from the House Ways and Means Committee's report on salaries, commissions, and bonuses over $15,000 in 1935. The list being alphabetically arranged, the data on the General Motors Corporation appeared almost directly below those pertaining to the Gagnier Company, with which Mr. Place is connected. Our compiler inadvertently included the name of Mr. Place among the executives of General Motors. We are extremely sorry for the error, which was quite unintentional on our part and on the part of our compiler.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One Year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK . SATURDAY . FEBRUARY 27, 1937

NUMBER 9

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

225

EDITORIALS:

The Nation's FOOD SHIP

227

HOW TO STAY OUT OF WAR

228

THE EDUCATION OF GOVERNOR HOFFMAN

229

WALTER LIPPMANN AND THE COURT

by Max Lerner

230

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

231

J. EDGAR HOOVER by Kenneth G. Crawford

232

PAYING RANSOM TO HITLER by Robert Dell

234

KILL THE CONSCRIPTION BILL!

by Stephen Raushenbush

236

ESPIONAGE, INC. by Dwight MacDonald

238

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

240

BROUN'S PAGE

241

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

FANATICS—AND HOW TO KNOW THEM

by Joseph Wood Krutch

242

WEST BY THE RAIN by David Schubert

243

SOMETHING OF AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

by Maxwell Geismar

243

SODA PARLOR IN BROOKLYN by James T. Farrell

244

THE ENGLISH SYSTEM by Harold J. Laski

244

THE LURE OF THE LAND by Dorothy Van Doren

246

AMERICAN NOVELLA by Michael Sayers

247

DRAMA: STRIKE PLAY by Joseph Wood Krutch

248

FILMS: GERMAN REVIVAL by Mark Van Doren

251

The Shape of Things

★

THE SENATE WILL HAVE FIRST CRACK AT THE judiciary bill, and hearings have been set for March 9. This means that we shall have at least another month, and perhaps several months, of the Great Debate on the judiciary. This should surely convince all those who have been talking as if a coup d'état might momentarily be expected that no action is contemplated except through that most democratic of democratic procedures—interminable public discussion. Meanwhile it is becoming clearer that the labor, farmer, and progressive sentiment of the country is supporting the proposal. The Lewis and Green forces have for once found something on which to agree. The farmers' organizations are behind the measure, with the exception of the reactionary Grange. The group of liberals organized as the National Committee for Clarifying the Constitution by Amendment have come out in support of the proposal as the best course until an amendment is ratified. The leading progressive educators of the country are supporting the President. In the light of this unmistakable cleavage between the progressive forces and the propertied minority, it is difficult to see how a progressive like Senator Wheeler not only attacks the measure, but uses exactly the arguments of the tory editorials.

★

LOYALIST FORTUNES SHONE BRIGHTER IN Spain last week as a result of developments on the diplomatic and military fronts. An agreement definitely to ban foreign volunteers seems finally to have been reached. If the ban is really enforced it will be a great victory for Spain's democratic forces, for the "volunteers" have chiefly been Germans and Italians, conscripted by their government to help the Spanish fascists. Whether it is enforced will depend on the sort of patrol that is contrived for Portugal. A patrol of the Portuguese ports, with English officials included, has a chance of effectiveness. But if a handful of men try to patrol the long land frontier between Portugal and Spain, it will be worse than useless. The most recent reports that the Non-Intervention Committee has agreed upon 130 British border-patrol guards leaves us skeptical of the success of the attempt. On the military front the Loyalists have met and repulsed the most savage attacks of the war. Tens of thousands of Germans, the picked troops of Europe, have been beaten back on the Valencia-Madrid road. The undisciplined loyalist militia of the early days of the war have evidently been forged into an army of hardened fighters.

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

THE NAMING OF PAUL V. McNUTT, ONCE American Legion commander and recently governor of Indiana, as High Commissioner to the Philippines, completes an unholy triumvirate that will rule the islands. The other two are President Manuel Quezon, now on a visit here, and his military adviser, General Douglas MacArthur. It is understood in Washington that McNutt's appointment is only for a year. He has his eye on bigger game than the Philippines post, and is biding his time like a proconsul waiting to return to Rome. His biggest stumbling-block thus far has been the lack of affection between Jim Farley and himself. The Nation will publish in early issues several articles dealing with the Quezon regime and with economic and social conditions in the Philippines.

★

CHINA MOVED A STEP NEARER TO FORMING a popular front against Japanese aggression when the plenary session of the Kuomintang voted tentatively to abandon its ten-year campaign against the Chinese communist armies. More than a year ago the communists offered to place their armies under the control of Nanking and to abandon the soviet system in their territories if Nanking would form a genuinely representative government, guarantee civil rights, and oppose Japanese aggression. Reactionary elements in the Kuomintang have done everything in their power to prevent the acceptance of this offer. The kidnapping of Chiang Kai-shek early in December is now seen to have been a spontaneous last-minute development designed to head off a coup by these Chinese fascist forces. After Chiang's release the fascists sought to persuade him to go back on the commitment he made at Sian. It remains to be seen whether they will now follow General Franco's example and revolt against the new Popular Front.

★

PLANS FOR ORGANIZING STEEL ARE BEING advertised by the C. I. O. with a frankness that must be disconcerting to the owners. "Let the public be informed," seems to be its watchword. In a period when the right to bargain collectively is enjoying unwonted prestige, this is eminently sound policy. The Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers will need an informed public opinion at its back in the next few months. Meanwhile the sitdown is developing both as a technique and an issue. As a technique it puts the onus of armed violence on the owners and elected authorities—and the latter point is especially important when the key official has been elected by labor's votes. Governor Horner, in dealing with the sitdown at Waukegan, Illinois, has thus far followed the very sensible lead of Governor Murphy and has refused to order the militia to empty the Fansteel plant by force. As a legal issue the sitdown cannot be solved by injunctions. Like the automatic worker it is the outgrowth of the prevailing mode of production. It is becoming increasingly clear that its legal status cannot be determined, for practical purposes, according to the simple horse-and-buggy concept of private ownership.

GREAT BRITAIN'S FIVE-YEAR ARMAMENTS plan calls for the expenditure of $1,500,000,000 a year for five years—one-fifteenth of its national income—in a mad race to outdo Hitler at his own game. This is not only three times the amount Britain spent on armaments five years ago, but is approximately equal to the combined armament expenditures of England, France, Italy, Germany, Poland, and Belgium in 1931. Strangely enough, the largest outlay is on the navy, where Britain is already supreme except for the United States. It will be matched, according to Admiral Leahy, by a similar program on our part, and the Japanese militarists are already clamoring for bigger budgets. Meanwhile the world is asked to wait until Britain is "rearmed" before it can accept its everyday responsibilities in a system of collective security. But a hundred battleships cannot make up for the statesmanship and prestige that Britain lost in the Manchurian, Ethiopian, and Spanish controversies.

★

ITALY IS NOW GROOMING CORSICA FOR THE role of a new Abyssinia. Since the island belongs to France, Mussolini's tactics have to be somewhat more subtle than in the African adventure. The pen, in this case, is mightier than the gas bomb. The Ministry of the Press is conducting an active campaign of irredentist propaganda directed toward arousing annexation sentiment in Italy and anti-French sentiment in Corsica. From the French weekly Lumière we learn that several "Corsican culture Centers" have been established in Milan, Turin, and other cities for the purpose of giving lectures, publishing pamphlets, and holding exhibitions which demonstrate that geographically, ethnographically, and in every other way Corsica belongs to Italy. Also the Telegrafo, a newspaper widely circulated in northern Italy, now publishes a daily Corsican edition which it distributes all but free in the island. Editorials flame with a pseudo-Corsican nationalism; Napoleon, the Little Corsican, is acclaimed as a dictator in the great Roman tradition from Julius Caesar to Il Duce; and the whole bristles with attacks on the French administration.

★

MR. HAYS: "WHY, YOUR HONOR, I DEMANDED that the police arrest me, but instead they kept shoving me around. They let me picket alone finally when I persisted and whether my legal position is different from that of a seaman I don't know, but they apparently felt that it wouldn't be wise either to shove me out of Jersey City or arrest me." THE COURT: "That was probably because you had the American flag wrapped around you." MR. HAYS: "You bet I did. I need it in Jersey City." This is part of the testimony in a plea to the United States District Court of New Jersey to enjoin Mayor Hague and the Jersey City police from forcibly breaking up picket lines during the seamen's strike. Arthur Garfield Hays, attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, contended that the only legal course open to the police was to arrest the picketers and submit to a court test their right to be there. Refusing to arrest them and instead "escorting" them out of the city was clearly a lawless action. Counsel for the city contended that the picketers, including Mr. Hays, were "undesirable" because they were connected with an "unlawful movement," namely, communism. Judge Clark told the city's counsel that his position was "untenable," that "you cannot take the position that . . . any citizen, I don't care who he is, cannot come to Jersey City"; and agreed with Mr. Hays that whether any movement was unlawful "was a matter for the court and not for your police." Since Mayor Hague has long used the bum's rush tactics on picketers in order to protect runaway firms which come to Jersey City to avoid keeping their labor agreements in New York, it is particularly gratifying to see the law catch up with him.

★

WE HAVE LOST OUR ANCESTORS' ABILITY TO swing gaily through the trees and we have gained nothing but mental decrepitude in its place. So says Dr. Hooton, professor of anthropology at Harvard and president of the American Association of Physical Anthropologists. In an address entitled "Apology for Man" he states that there has been a distinct decline in the national intelligence because of the mess we have made of biological control. By prolonging our span of life we have preserved the unfit in society and increased the proportion of the immature and the senile. Thus all our vaunted scientific achievements have simply resulted in lowering the level of the average intelligence. Now this has more than a purely biological significance. Note well Dr. Hooton's conclusion; "Since the senile are not denied a voice in the government, we may expect ever-increasing social ructions as a result of senile decay dominating over dementia praecox." Which, as a statement of the opposing sides in the present Supreme Court struggle, seems to us rather hard on both.

★

ON THE CURRENT LISTS OF NON-FICTION best-sellers "Live Alone and Like It" has been running nip and tuck with "How to Make Friends and Influence People." In other words while Marjorie Hillis is turning thousands into contented hermits, Dale Carnegie is turning them back into hail-fellows again, and thus the balance of nature is maintained. It is all very well to urge, as Mr. Carnegie does, that we should always talk about what interests our companion, not about what interests us; that we must let the other fellow do the talking, etc., etc. But what happens when two of his enthusiastic pupils meet? Does a dead silence fall? Does each talk so loud about the interests of the other that neither can be heard? Or is there a point at which a disciple would actually rather practice the system than express himself; so that the height of tact consists in letting him cultivate our egotism to his heart's content? It is a nice point, which Mr. Carnegie never touches upon. Of course, there remain the less subtle tactics of the Hollywood actor who felt that he had been boasting too much. "Tell me about yourself now. How did you like my last picture?"

The Nation's Food Ship

REPUBLICAN Spain needs food. Meat, flour, eggs, condensed milk, dried fish, beans. . . . Day after day through the news dispatches runs the theme of hunger, of the need for bread, sugar, milk. Thousands of noncombatants have been evacuated from Madrid but other thousands have poured in from surrounding villages emptied and destroyed by civil war. They need food desperately. Valencia has been ordered to go without bread for two days so that its usual supply might be sent to Almeria to feed thousands of refugees from Malaga.

Noncombatants and refugees are unarmed. Yet women and those too old or too infirm to fight must pass through shell fire to get food for their children and themselves. On a day in January a machine-gunner in a rebel plane flying over Madrid "turned his deadly spray of bullets straight into a long line of women who had stood patiently for hours waiting for their turn to enter a butcher shop. Several of them were wounded and some perhaps are now dead." Even children have not been spared. Norman Bethune, a Canadian doctor, saw the flight from Malaga, when 150,000 men, women, and children set out over a single road to walk a hundred miles to safety while German and Italian airplanes dropped bombs on that procession of human despair. At the little town of Almeria, where the refugees paused, thinking they were safe, ten bombs fell into their midst. "After the planes passed," said Dr. Bethune, "I picked up three dead children from the pavement where they had been standing in line waiting for a cup of preserved milk and a handful of dry bread, the only food some of them had for days."

"Some perhaps are now dead." The others are forming other lines, while the supply of meat in the butcher shops dwindles, while bread grows scarcer, and little children wait for milk that never comes. In Spain one segment of humanity is passing through inhuman agonies of hunger and fear. The rest of us cannot do less than keep flowing that thinning stream of food that maintains life and proclaims the continuity of simple human charity. The Spanish mother who stands in line though the skies rain bullets must find food at the end of the queue. She must not go back empty-handed, through broken streets, to a hungry child.

The Nation's Food Ship is our answer to Spain's need. We appeal to every American man and woman who has more than enough to eat, to every parent whose children are rosy-cheeked and without fear, to help us send food to the innocent women and children and old people of republican Spain. The Nation guarantees delivery. It also guarantees that the money collected will be used exclusively for food supplies for noncombatants.

Through a news dispatch or a photograph every American in the past few months has come face to face, in at least one horrified and compassionate moment, with the human tragedy that fills the hours and the days and the months in Spain. A check made out in the name of human fellowship will fill an empty Spanish plate and put fresh courage in a weary Spanish heart.

How to Stay Out of War

THE past two years have witnessed a greater change in American thinking on the question of war than any other similar period in our history. Instead of adopting a more or less fatalistic attitude such as preceded our entry into the last conflict, the American people have demanded positive action to prevent a repetition of the 1917 disaster. The investigations of the Nye committee have dramatized the hidden forces which led us into war, and we are resolved that we shall not be trapped by them again.

For the moment, at least, the chief hope of peace advocates centers around a revision of our traditional neutrality policy, which failed to protect us in 1917. There are three basic conceptions of what the new neutrality should be like: (1) The old-time isolationists, as represented by Senators Borah and Johnson, insist on a strict enforcement of our neutral "rights," especially the freedom of the seas; (2) the Nye isolationists would cut off all American commercial relationships with belligerents except those that could be managed on a "cash-and-carry" basis; and (3) the groups which Quincy Wright has dubbed the "cooperationist neutrals" desire a restriction in trade with belligerents but are troubled lest too drastic measures involve us in difficulties greater than those we are seeking to avoid.

The immediate struggle in Congress has been between groups two and three, although a compromise between the two was reached last week. Both the Nye-Clark-Bone-Vandenberg bill, for example, and the Pittman bill—which has been reported out to the Senate—contain identical sections imposing a mandatory embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war for belligerents. Public opinion has been educated to the point where it will not tolerate merchandising in death, no matter what the pretext. Both measures are alike, moreover, in prohibiting loans and credits to warring countries, though both leave what would seem to be a crucial loophole in permitting ordinary commercial credits at the discretion of the President. It seems to be generally forgotten that loans were also prohibited at the outset of the World War, and that the ban was only removed when credits to Europe became so large as to constitute an important vested interest.

The crux of the Nye measure, now incorporated in the Pittman bill as reported to the Senate, is in a section which would divest American citizens of all right or title to goods of any character shipped to any of the belligerents. Goods could not leave the United States except in foreign vessels and under foreign ownership. This is not strictly an isolationist proposal since it would permit trade with such belligerents as were able to maintain control of the seas as long as they were able to pay in gold or goods. Thus it might easily lead to the creation of a vested interest in the victory of the country that dominated the seas, especially since there could be no troublesome controversy over neutral rights such as marred our relations with England in 1915-16. It is doubtful whether an embargo could be maintained if it interfered with

OUR PEACE PLAN

1. A mandatory embargo should be imposed on munitions, basic war materials, loans, and credits to belligerents.

2. The President should be empowered to lift these restrictions, except the embargo on munitions, in case the majority of signatories of the Kellogg pact find that a country has been attacked in violation of that pact.

3. Munition industries should be nationalized, and the Nye proposals for limiting war profits passed.

4. Our national-defense policy should be revised to provide only for the protection of the continental United States, with an understanding that the roots of our present policy lie deep in the inequalities of our social and economic structure.

the profit-making opportunities of an important section of the population. And it is even more doubtful whether it could keep us out of war. For it assumes that America's only stake in the social and political struggles which are prostrating large portions of the world is that of trade. A more naive distortion of the doctrine of economic determinism would be difficult to imagine. Trade and loans are important economic factors, but they are only two of a half-dozen similar influences which lie at the root of international conflicts.

The Pittman bill leaves to the discretion of the President the question of embargos on cotton, oil, scrap iron, and other materials necessary to the successful conduct of war, but does not empower the Executive to impose or lift restrictions on one of two parties in a conflict. In practice this probably means that no embargo will be imposed in a major war, since the President is far from unaffected by pressure of business interests and since any action might offend one of the two participants in the struggle.

We find both bills almost equally unsatisfactory. We believe that the best chance of averting war lies in the creation of a mechanism for enforcing collective security. The League cannot build a system of collective law as long as it is being constantly sabotaged by the United States. The fiasco over oil sanctions in the Ethiopian conflict was partly due to the greed of English capitalism and partly to the timidity of the League statesmen. But that timidity was increased by the knowledge that President Roosevelt lacked the power to cooperate. In the world as it is today an inflexible neutrality serves notice to the fascist powers not only that we shall fail to oppose aggression, but that we shall hinder the nation attacked from obtaining the supplies it could normally expect under international law. There can thus be no hope of preventing war unless the President is given authority either to impose a one-sided embargo on nations which violate the Kellogg pact or to raise the general embargo from states which the majority of signatories of the pact find to be victims of aggression.

But neutrality of any sort is likely to prove more of a liability than an asset if it lulls the American people into a false feeling of security. War is not a disease which is bred in foreign countries and smuggled surreptitiously into this country by bolshevik or fascist agents. Its germs may be found implanted in our social and economic structure. We can clean up one source of infection by adopting Senator Nye's plan for the nationalization of the munitions industry, and an even more threatening one by accepting his program for a drastic limitation of war profits. But the primary source of contamination lies still deeper. Our Far Eastern and Latin American policies are unmistakably imperialistic and must ultimately lead us into war irrespective of neutrality legislation. A shift in our armament policy which would adapt it solely to purposes of defense would ease national frictions and lessen the burden on American taxpayers. But it will not be undertaken as long as our overseas interests remain undisturbed. In the last analysis the best way to stay out of war is to put our own house in order.

The Education of Governor Hoffman

THE statement of Harold Hoffman, governor of New Jersey, that he will put down by force of arms any attempt of the C. I. O. to unionize the workers of New Jersey, represents a political move whose brazenness is surpassed only by its ignorance of the world today. The fantastic character who now rules New Jersey says that if organized labor attempts to gather the workers in rubber, automobiles, airplanes, silk and textiles into unions of their own choice, he will meet them by bloodshed if necessary. Hoffman is enheartened in his stand by the activities of his supposed Democratic opponent but in reality his ally, Frank Hague, labor-baiting boss of Jersey City and the "Hook" district generally. But when he fulminates against the newly formed Northern New Jersey Council for Industrial Organization he is taking on a large order. This Council is no overnight project. Long years of labor experience are behind its formation. Even the hard-boiled craft unions of Jersey favor this step toward the organization of labor. And once it is under way it will take more than the cohorts of the martial-minded chief of New Jersey to break its ranks. Governor Hoffman is in for some education.

Throughout the literate sections of New Jersey, Hoffman's statement is regarded as a bid for his candidacy for the Republican Presidential nomination in 1940. His activities in the Hauptmann trial came to naught as far as his Vice-presidential possibility in the last election was concerned. Now he tries the Coolidge "law and order" formula. He is counting on the defection of conservative Democrats from the Roosevelt ranks. He is simple enough to believe that with the help of Hague and other eastern reactionaries he may sweep the Republican convention three years from now on the ground that he is the Protector of Private Property.

But whatever Hoffman's private ambitions may be, labor in 1937 is not the docile movement it has been under Green and Frey. The rank and file are resolved to go to town these days no matter how much the capitalist politicians may thunder away at them. Hoffman has a lot to learn if he thinks he can stand up, like King Canute before the tide, and cry stop to the C. I. O. New Jersey's large German population is sown with Nazi sentiment to which the Governor is not entirely unsympathetic. It may be that out of this sympathy has grown his taste for government by ukase but he will have to learn that such tactics cannot be effective. He will have to learn that the force driving labor toward organization is more relentless than all his efforts to earn for New Jersey the reputation of the fiercest anti-labor state in the East.

While Hoffman may fool himself with his unctuous statement, "No one has a greater sympathy for labor, organized or unorganized, than I," he fools no one who knows his record. Consistently opposing the enactment of child labor laws and minimum wage laws for women, he has done his best to keep New Jersey labor free for exploitation. In some respects the Governor is quick to take advantages of opportunities for education. Watching the silk industry of Paterson, which used to represent almost half of that industry the country over, gradually slip away to the even more backward Southern states in order to escape the union threat, he learned what to do. Together with Mayor Hague he busied himself in making New Jersey the same sort of receptacle for runaway industries from New York and Pennsylvania and other industrial centers of more advanced labor legislation, as the Southern states were for New Jersey. The result has been sweatshop conditions throughout the state.

These are the conditions which prompted the C. I. O. drive. They are conditions that cannot be wiped out by a whiff of Hoffman grapeshot. Governor Hoffman should study the history of labor in this country and the history of high-handed attempts to suppress the movement for a better standard of living. He will find a tangled problem that does not yield to the simple solution of legalized murder. He will find that the forces that compose the movement for better wages and more decent lives are infinitely stronger than he is, because they are the essential stuff of the American experience.

Lippmann and the Court

FOR two weeks I have followed anxiously the serialized account of Walter Lippmann's hopes and fears for the Constitution. I had two motives for my religious pursuit. Here, I felt, in these flowers plucked from Mr. Lippmann's corner of the Herald Tribune crannied wall, I should get at the secret of his whole universe. And here too I should find summed up the mature thinking of conservatives on the constitutional issue.

In the first I was not disappointed. I found everything in Mr. Lippmann's career rolled up in these six articles as in a single ball. Something in his subject had clicked with him as never before. I found spread out before me the entire anatomy of his mind—his easy expository tone, his dialectical skill, his genius for clarity to the point of bareness, his rhetoric which is always just on the point of becoming eloquence, his magisterial air, his talent for opening his mind to no more of his subject than for the moment he cares to admit, his tone of fairness, his capacity for concealing the impulsions of his thinking while laying bare its framework, the smugness about his own motives and the attribution of dishonesty to others which I can only describe as a moral megalomania. And I found in addition what one finds when the usually cold Mr. Lippmann gets really excited—a sort of glacial hysteria that fascinated me by its union of opposites.

The second part of my quest was disheartening. Clearly Mr. Lippmann is heir to the whole tradition of American political thought. What use does he make of it? Confronted by President Roosevelt's plan for reorganizing the Supreme Court he calls it dastardly, dishonest, reactionary, "audacious, ingenious and at bottom stupid"—an act of "usurpation," a "bloodless coup d'état" which strikes at "the moral foundations of the republic."

This leaves one a bit breathless and stunned. It is possible to discuss the President's proposal on three planes—the plane of legality, the plane of morality, and the plane of the mechanics and dynamics of government. On the score of legality, Mr. Lippmann can have no quarrel with the President, except to say that the legality is only a cloak for dark motives and something morally sinister. On the score of morality I can have no quarrel with Mr. Lippmann: he is welcome to his own moral canons, provided he will let others have theirs. Mr. Lippmann should remember that "moral foundations of the republic" is one of those stereotypes which he so admirably analyzed years ago in his book, "Public Opinion," and which is chiefly used as an emotional substitute for thought.

Let us stay on the plane of political analysis. Mr. Lippmann's chief fear is that the measure will destroy the independence of the judiciary. He sees the court as being "packed" with "young henchmen" of the President, political hacks responsive to his desires. And then, by a parade of imaginary horrors, he converts a statute for retiring justices at seventy into a coup d'état.

What is not fantasy in this analysis is based upon faulty history and naïve political theory. The independence of the judiciary does not go beyond the constitutional safeguards. It does not extend to non-partisanship. Every President "packs" the court when he appoints a justice. Presidents have always wanted men of their own persuasion on the bench. Our greatest judges—Marshall and Taney, outstandingly—have been men of political and economic convictions, deeply embroiled in politics before their appointment. Surely Mr. Lippmann has read the letters between an earlier Roosevelt and Senator Lodge on the question of whether one O. W. Holmes, Jr., had the right sort of economic views. By accepting the myth of judicial neutrality Mr. Lippmann misreads history. By charging the President with seeking to change the Constitution he misreads judicial theory. The fact is that every important decision of the court changes the Constitution. It was a realistic tory lawyer who described the Supreme Court as an "adjourned session of the Constitutional Convention." Under the new plan the "independent judiciary," which has never been independent of Big Enterprise, would merely continue its work within new limits on age and numbers legally set by Congress.

So much for the critical portion of Mr. Lippmann's articles. There remains the constructive part. Mr. Lippmann admits that some of the Supreme Court decisions have distressed him. But he fears to limit the court's power to render such decisions, and he fears also too extensive a grant of power to Congress. After teasing our appetite, Mr. Lippmann finally advances his own proposal. He favors a specific amendment each time a new specific power is needed by Congress and refused by the court. But the amending process, he knows, is fearfully difficult. His answer is to amend the power to amend, with respect to the commerce clause only (with a six months' limit for ratification), and to leave the rest alone.

It was here that I really gasped. Commerce clause indeed! Surely anyone with Mr. Lippmann's background does not need an education in the obvious. He does not have to be told that there is more in the heaven and earth of the Supreme Court than is dreamt of in the commerce power. Hammer v. Dagenhart (the child labor case), is based not only on the commerce clause but on the Tenth Amendment. The Adair case or the railroad retirement pension case are based not only on the commerce clause but on the due process clause. The briefs in the Wagner Labor Act cases are built not only on the commerce power but on the First Amendment and the Fifth Amendment as well. In killing legislation the judges have been equipped with a whole quiver of arrows, any of which they could draw as the occasion demanded.

With his proposal Mr. Lippmann lets the cat out of the bag. He does not want to achieve real legislative flexibility. He thoroughly distrusts Congress, as he distrusts every organ of the people. He wants to intrench minority rule. He wants to consider the Constitution as a grant of specific powers, and he wants each additional specific power (that is, every important piece of new social legislation) to run the gauntlet of a two-thirds vote of Congress and a three-quarters vote of the states. This would be minority rule with a vengeance. And it is a tribute to Mr. Lippmann's intellectual athleticism that he can glorify minority rule in the name of democracy.

MAX LERNER

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, February 22

THE Senate committee investigating civil-liberties violations, including labor espionage, has performed two feats in the last few days that deserve the widest possible publicity. In the first of these Senator La Follette's committee has cast doubt on the good faith of General Motors' peace pact with organized labor, and in the second it has come close to furnishing proof of John L. Lewis's charge that the nation's largest corporations have joined together in an active, organized united-front campaign to violate the Wagner Act and smash or prevent unionization of their workers.

The record of the week shows, in fact, that General Motors today is still very much like the General Motors Corporation of 1934, when President Roosevelt's bogus peace plan and the Wolman board that it created were foisted on the automobile workers. It shows that after the 1934 settlement General Motors tightened up its espionage system. It also shows that when General Motors a few days ago signed its 1937 peace pact with organized labor, it was simultaneously engaged in creating a new and better espionage system. Corporation officials admitted on the witness stand that when they advanced their claim to having cast off as of February 1 the Pinkertons and all the other spy agencies on which they had spent over $800,000 in the last few years, they were engaged in setting up a new system and had hired as its nucleus two former G-men and a former United States deputy marshal. They were later to admit that they had not actually discarded the services of all private detective agencies and that Chevrolet at least still retained Railway Audit and Inspection, which up to the present stage of the committee's revelations stands as the most disreputable of all the big espionage agencies. Railway Audit's discharge will come no doubt when the ex-marshal and the two former G-men, who used to be stationed at Detroit, get the corporation's own espionage system working.

The La Follette committee's other major feat of the week was its disclosure that representatives of a dozen of the nation's giant corporations have been meeting once a month at New York to swap ideas on dealing with the labor problems common to them all. Represented on this committee are E. I. du Pont de Nemours Company, General Motors, Bethlehem Steel, Standard Oil of New Jersey, International Harvester, United States Rubber, Goodyear Tire and Rubber, American Telegraph and Telephone, General Electric, Westinghouse, Irving Trust, and the United States Steel Corporation, which was admitted to membership when it hired Arthur H. Young as vice-president in charge of labor relations. It is called the "special conference committee" of the National Association of Manufacturers and meets in a part of the Standard Oil suite of offices in Radio City. E. S. Cowdrick is the committee's paid secretary and makes trips to Washington for the purpose of surveying and reporting on the status of labor legislation here. Clarence J. Hicks, formerly of Standard Oil and now of Industrial Relations Counselors, Inc., is an honorary member of the committee and used to be its chairman. Industrial Relations Counselors is the company-union factory that the Rockefeller interests set up after the Ludlow massacre. General Motors officials who have represented or now represent the corporation on the committee blandly pointed out that almost all the member corporations have been "pioneers" in setting up "employee representation" plans or "works councils." They said the committee itself was the product of a "get-together" between Charles M. Schwab and Walter C. Teagle "a great many years ago." They testified that recently its members agreed to report to the committee all changes in wages, hours, and working conditions; that the results of company-union elections are reported to it; and that during the depression the committee discussed such things as "necessary reductions in salary" and the success some member corporations had had in handling them through their company-union set-ups. But they insisted that the committee does not attempt to lay down a "united policy" for all the member corporations and that the only united action it has ever taken was on a report on unemployment insurance which ended up in the Commerce Department's Business Advisory and Planning Council via Walter Teagle. Is it without significance that, as they testified, the only outsider the committee ever had address it at a night meeting was Dr. Leo Wolman and that the committee went to Detroit in 1934 to hear him and the industrial representative on the Wolman board, Nicholas Kelly, explain the board's designs?

Behind the dust screen of debate raised by the President's Supreme Court reform proposal the consumer is being double-crossed once more by Congress. The Senator for Vick's Vaporub (Bailey of North Carolina) once more has united with the Senator for Listerine (Clark of Missouri) and the Senator for Parke-Davis (Vandenberg of Michigan) to put over a new food-and-drug act that will undermine the already ineffectual defenses the consuming public has managed to write into law over a long period of years. And in the House, Representative Clarence Lea of California stands ready with a plan to convert the bill into an even worse betrayal of the consumer. Lea has just become chairman of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, succeeding Sam Rayburn of Texas, who proved himself last year an indomitable champion of the theory that men should not be free to sell eyelash paints that blind the users. The bill that Senators Bailey, Clark, and Vandenberg are backing is the Copeland bill, and Lea intends to see that when it reaches the House it does not fall into the hands of the subcommittee that under the chairmanship of Representative Chapman of Kentucky did such yeoman-like work for the consumer last year.

The Copeland bill, which has just been reported out of the Senate Commerce Committee, contains at least three vital pitfalls. One is a section prohibiting multiple seizures of misbranded merchandise and carrying with it the vicious Bailey amendment. The Food and Drug Administration for years has been empowered to seize all identical shipments of a misbranded commodity after it has convinced a court that a single, sample shipment was misbranded, and it has exercised this power as the only effective consumer-protection weapon that it has. Yet Senator Copeland's report for the committee commits the bland falsehood of asserting that it has been the Food and Drug Administration's "declared policy . . . in enforcing existing law" to eschew multiple seizures, and that the Copeland bill "therefore does no more than write into the law what is declared to be the policy of the administration." Another hooker in the Copeland bill is a provision excusing the courts from issuing injunctions against violators of the law if a judge is satisfied that the accused really intends to go and sin no more. Imagine, if you can, a typical federal judge subjecting a rich manufacturer of quackeries to the damaging publicity of an injunction after he has promised to be good.

The third trap in the bill occurs in the section on advertising claims which are "false or misleading in any material particular." That word "material" is the snag. It has been inserted so that all the legal precedents built up by the Food and Drug Administration under the existing law, which omits the word "material," will be set at naught and the administration will have to start over from scratch and under a law which makes it even more difficult than does the present one for the government to prove its case. The bill gives the Food and Drug Administration control over advertising, instead of vesting this control in the Federal Trade Commission, where Lea is prepared to place it with the aid of the commission's lobbyists. The current issue of Advertising and Selling offers an article by Edward R. Keyes which contains overwhelming proof that control of food-and-drug advertising must be taken away from the commission. Mr. Keyes shows, too, why the scum of the industry want to keep it there. He offers a series of cease-and-desist orders which the commission has handed down against fraudulent medicinal advertisements and then from the files of the Nashville Tennessean, a daily paper, he takes current advertisements in which the same companies against which the commission's orders were issued two and three years ago are making the same fraudulent claims. Mr. Keyes does not explain why he used the Nashville Tennessean. Could it be because it is owned by Paul M. Davis, who is not only a brother of Roosevelt's ambassador-at-large, Norman H. Davis, but also a brother of Ewin L. Davis, who as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission lobbied so vigorously last year to keep advertising control in the commission's hands?

J. Edgar Hoover

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, February 17

J. EDGAR HOOVER, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has become Public Hero Number One through no accident. He has been working purposely toward that goal for twenty years—ever since he went to work for the Department of Justice in 1917, equipped with a night-school law degree, brief experience as an employee of the Congressional Library, and an instinct for self-promotion. By skilful use of all the effective media of publicity, he has made himself a legendary figure. Children no longer play cowboy and Indian or even cops and robbers. The game is G-men and hoodlum, with the strongest kid impersonating Hoover. Adults with a taste for vicarious violence are prone to accept the legend at face value.

Making the most of his resulting prestige, Hoover has built up the F. B. I. from almost nothing to what the Hearst press, his most faithful glorifier, calls "the greatest detective agency in the world." There is nothing mythical about his equipment for violence. He now has 531 special agents, trained to use tear gas as well as machine guns and small arms, an annual appropriation of almost $6,000,000, and well stocked arsenals in Washington and thirty branch offices scattered over the country.

His hair-trigger methods have been salutary in wiping out, or almost wiping out, the kidnap racket. Grateful for this, Congress and the country have been inclined to overlook the dangers inherent in his disregard of the American traditions that every man is entitled to his day in court and to his own opinions. It is something less than reassuring that so much power has been handed over to a man brought up in the pettiness of bureaucracy and schooled by such master red-hunters as A. Mitchell Palmer and William J. Burns. There may be no reason to fear such a delegation of authority under the present Administration. But there is nothing in Hoover's record to indicate that he would not carry out with considerable satisfaction the orders of a reactionary President to repeat the Palmer performance.

Hoover's first training was in war-time counter-espionage. Then he became active in Palmer's post-war radical-baiting campaign. The detective's part in this campaign is now justified by one of his publicity agents on the ground that "we were all a little hysterical in those days." Hoover himself has told interviewers that the work was always distasteful to him. But take the little matter of the corruption case built up by the Justice Department against Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana shortly after his election in 1922. The government's star witness, to whom Wheeler was supposed to have offered to sell his influence as a Senator, was thoroughly discredited on the stand. Hoover was very active in that case.

Then there is the Sacco-Vanzetti affair. Liberal defenders of the two victims have always contended that it was Hoover's secret dossier on their radical activities, not evidence of the crime with which they were charged, that sent them to the chair. The dossier was never produced in court, but it provided the prosecution with its most telling arguments. Hoover was personally in command of the Justice Department's preparation for the trial.

Just how inclusive is the Hoover bureau's file of information on radicals and the conservatives Hoover thinks are radical, no one outside the department knows. There is no doubt here of its existence, or at least of its former existence. Some of the President's friends even suspect that Hoover went so far as to start a folder on the Roosevelt family and at least two of the candidate's advisers in the 1932 campaign. More astute as an investigator than as a politician, Hoover thought Herbert Hoover (no relation) would win in a walk, and that it might do no harm to turn up some information about the Democratic nominee.

Hoover was quiet enough for the first few years after he became director of the bureau. His agents were without authority to carry arms or make arrests. They merely pointed out culprits for local police or federal marshals to arrest. But in 1934 everything changed. The Lindbergh baby had been kidnapped, Congress got excited, and things began to happen.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation was voted power to carry arms, make arrests, and investigate all sorts of crimes. It now can arrest escaped federal prisoners, robbers of national banks, violators of the United States neutrality laws, perjurers, white slavers, interstate automobile thieves, kidnappers, racketeers, felons who cross state lines, and persons charged with espionage. This much authority could be stretched to cover almost anything. In particular, it could be used to harass labor organizers and suspected reds. The federal law against racketeers would lend itself admirably to the framing of "agitators." The espionage statute might be handy for use against Communists who happened to be working in factories making war materials. Almost anyone with a record could be caught in the meshes of federal laws which the Federal Bureau of Investigation is now authorized to enforce.

Furthermore, the huge collection of fingerprints which Hoover, with the assistance of police departments in every city in the country, has built up makes it easy for him to identify anyone with a police record. His identification files are the most extensive in the world, containing the fingerprints of more than 5,000,000 criminals. In addition, he is pounding the drums for voluntary submission to fingerprinting by non-criminals, and with his usual flair for publicity is doing well at it. He has enlisted some 200,000 volunteers.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Guy Lombardo, Walt Disney, and other notables have impressed their fingertips on Mr. Hoover's records. In their cases, no doubt, no harm will come of it. Plainer citizens who do the same thing will have no assurance that their prints will not be examined when the perpetrator of some crime or other is being hunted. Contrary to the general understanding, the so-called civil identification files as well as the criminal files have been checked under such circumstances.

Anyone accused of a crime and fingerprinted at the time of arrest has a legal right to demand destruction of the prints if he is exonerated. The F. B. I. has been known to photograph such prints before returning the original file—just in case the defendant might turn out to be a criminal after all. Also the files are searched at the request of private detective agencies as well as of the police.

Although Hoover has friends and former associates in the "fink" business and never has shown any disposition to frown on his labor-spying pals, no conclusive evidence has yet come to light to show that his agents have been pressed into service to help them. The La Follette civil-liberties committee has come close to Hoover with some of its shots, but up to now has registered no bull's-eye hits. The committee's investigators claim that Hoover, always fast on his feet, has given them valuable help. Two young confessed labor spies who testified voluntarily early in the investigation told the committee they had identified the man who hired them by a newspaper picture of him and J. Edgar Hoover at the Pittsburgh airport. They discovered from the caption that their employer was Charles F. Ruck, big shot of the steel industry's espionage system. Ruck is a former G-man with whom Hoover has maintained contact.

The committee's record also contains several communications signed by officials of private detective agencies stating that they had cooperated with the F. B. I. in various cases. One of the letters said that the National Metal Trades Association, a strike-breaking agency, worked with the F. B. I. on an espionage case. Hoover denied this.

A record taken from the Pinkerton files purported to show that the G-men collaborated with this agency in a St. Louis case. Recalling that a statute forbidding government agencies to hire private detectives has been on the books since the gory Homestead battle, in which Pinkerton men fought steel strikers, Senator La Follette asked for further details. The memories of Pinkerton officials failed them when they were questioned about the case. They did admit, however, that a system under which government officials could be billed personally for private detective services was worked to circumvent the law.

Hoover's attitude toward labor organization is best illustrated perhaps by the experience of Justice Lodge Number 21 of the American Federation of Government Employees. Members and former members of the organization have filed charges with Attorney General Cummings that eleven of their number have been forced out of the bureau, victims of Hoover's discrimination. They insist that he has violated the Wagner Labor Disputes Act. The men affected were fingerprint classifiers with civil-service status and had been rated "good" by their superiors shortly before they were asked to resign because of "inefficiency" or warned that their work was not satisfactory.

"The men firmly believe," Cummings was told in the brief filed with him last July, "that these dismissals were intended to weaken or break up the union." Whatever the reason for the dismissals, the union officials' premonitions of trouble were well founded. At the subsequent convention of the A. F. G. E. in Detroit, Justice Lodge Number 21 was thrown out of the international and as a consequence out of the American Federation of Labor.

Several other units of the government employees' union were expelled at the same time in a purge of radicals. The particular offense of the Justice Lodge was that it had distributed dodgers accusing the Department of Justice of discrimination. This was interpreted as a violation of the union's rule against unauthorized picketing. Before the convention the department had issued a release which in effect invited the expulsion. Later Cummings, in refusing to do anything about the protest, was able to observe that the F. B. I. unit was an outlaw. Its membership has dwindled, but some of its original organizers are still active and the Civil Liberties Union has taken up its case.

Among the grievances of the fingerprint classifiers, who get from $1,440 to $1,800 a year, is long overtime—13,000 hours of it between January 1 and July 1 last year. They further complain of the tyranny of petty regulations. Window shades must be drawn to a uniform level to make the bureau attractive to visitors. Suspenders must never show. There can be no smoking on the job. Time out for a smoke in the washroom has been checked and may not exceed seven minutes.

Hoover is a martinet in his own bureau. Most of his employees find jobs elsewhere in the government service at the first opportunity. The resulting turnover in some bureau units has been calculated at 70 per cent in one year.

[This is the first of two articles on J. Edgar Hoover. The second, which will appear next week, will deal with Mr. Hoover's methods and his attitude toward criminals.]

Paying Ransom to Hitler

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, February 9

THERE are encouraging signs both in England and in France that Hitler's speech of January 30 is being more and more recognized as what it was—one of the most sinister that he has yet made. As the Journal des Nations put it, "The hands held out by Eden, Neville Chamberlain, and Léon Blum remain suspended in the void." To all the questions implicitly put to him by Eden in his speech in the House of Commons on January 19 Hitler replied with a categorical no. He will have nothing to do with any general European settlement, he will accept no international control of armaments (without which any limitation or reduction of armaments is impossible), he will have nothing to do with the League of Nations or any similar system of settling disputes by arbitration or international mediation. Germany must be the sole judge of its own requirements in the matter of armaments and everything else. Yvon Delbos might well say, as he said on January 31 at Châteauroux, that in these conditions negotiations with Germany are extremely difficult. Indeed, they are impossible, and the sooner the fact is recognized by the British and French governments the better.

Those who listened to the speech here remarked the irritated tone of the latter part, in which Hitler dealt with foreign policy. Evidently he had been annoyed by Eden's speech of January 19, and his references to Eden were often ironical and barely polite. Perhaps Hitler thought, not without some reason, that what Eden said did not necessarily bind the British government as a whole. British policy has too often differed widely from Eden's speeches and even from those of his predecessor, Sir Samuel Hoare. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Eden is used as an instrument—no doubt unwittingly—for deceiving the public about the real nature of British policy. Hitler's omission even to mention Léon Blum's speech at Lyons on January 24 was no doubt a studied insult. It has been suggested that the omission was due to the fact that Blum is a "non-Aryan," but it seems to me much more likely that it was intended to show that, in Hitler's opinion, France no longer counts as a factor in European politics. Unhappily, there is too much reason for that opinion.

There have, however, been some recent manifestations of independence on the part of the French government. The first was the refusal to follow the English lead by stopping French volunteers from going to Spain without waiting for Germany and Italy to stop sending reinforcements to Franco. The German and Italian governments are repeating their dilatory tactics of last

August and meanwhile hurrying more men to Spain, but at least the French government has not been duped a second time. More significant was the vigorous action by which the French government prevented German troops from being sent to Spanish Morocco. On January 6 several French diplomatic and consular representatives abroad informed their government that German troops were on the point of starting for Morocco. One contingent had left Munich on December 31 and was being sent through Italy. On January 7 Viénot, who was in charge of the Foreign Ministry during the absence of Delbos, sent for the German ambassador and, without mentioning the information received, warned him that if any German troops were sent to Spanish Morocco, the French army would go in and turn them out. The next day Hitler held a sort of council of war at which the opposition of the German General Staff to taking any risk for the sake of Franco was so strong that he had to give way, and the troops did not go to Morocco. This was the first time that the present French government had taken any step of such importance without consulting London. Had the Sarraut Cabinet acted without consulting London on March 7, the German troops would have been withdrawn from the Rhineland. And had the British and French governments, or either of them, called Hitler's bluff in a similar way long ago, there would have been no war and Europe would not be in the state of chaos in which it is at present. It is a hard saying, but it is the fear of taking the risk of war in any circumstances that has brought us to this pass and increased the risk of war. To borrow a metaphor used by Gabriel Péri, Communist deputy for Versailles, in a remarkable speech that he made recently in the French Chamber, the British and French governments have gone on paying ransom to the gangsters without any guaranty that they would deliver peace alive.

Léon Blum's speech at Lyons on January 24—perhaps the best speech that he has ever made—also suggested that France may at last free itself from British domination and have a policy of its own. One of the most significant passages in that speech was the following: "We cannot remain indifferent spectators in Europe. We are members of the League of Nations, faithful to its principles, faithful to its Covenant. We have made friendships to which we remain entirely bound. We have contracted obligations to which we remain entirely faithful." I listened in to the speech, and no passage was more enthusiastically applauded than this except perhaps that in which Blum said that it had been proved that a "violently pacific" government was "not incapable of defending the interests, the dignity, and the security of France." The audience at Lyons understood, as everybody, including the Germans, has understood, that Blum was referring in particular to the French obligation to defend Czecho-Slovakia against unprovoked aggression. But Blum was also rejecting the British policy of leaving Hitler a free hand in Eastern Europe. The Foreign Office is now giving out through its accredited journalists, the "diplomatic correspondents" of the English daily papers, that the Western powers, and therefore the League of Nations, could do little or nothing to help the Eastern powers if the latter were attacked by Germany, because the western frontiers of Germany are now impregnable. It is clear from what Blum said at Lyons that this view is not shared by the French government, and, indeed, it is only an excuse for a policy of betrayal.

A great deal of nonsense has been talked about the division of Europe into two "ideological blocs," one fascist, the other communist. Such a division is impossible, for there is only one communist country in Europe. The fascist bloc already exists, but the rest of Europe is disunited, thanks to British policy acquiesced in by France. It is not a question of forming a communist, or even an anti-fascist, bloc but of forming a bloc or combination of the nations that desire peace to defend themselves against the aggressive and predatory nations—Germany and Italy and their satellites. The French government has recently taken an important step toward that desirable end by proposing a pact of mutual assistance to the three powers of the Little Entente. Unfortunately, when the Little Entente proposed such a pact to France last year, the present French government, under British pressure, refused it for fear of offending Mussolini. This was one of the disastrous consequences of the fatuous policy of trying to conciliate Mussolini and detach Italy from Germany by betraying Abyssinia—a policy which has completely failed. A further consequence was to drive Yugoslavia and Rumania into the arms of Germany, with the result that those two countries have up to the present refused to agree to the pact proposed by France. Moreover, under German influence, Yugoslavia has made what is practically an alliance with Bulgaria, and thus for all practical purposes both the Balkan Entente and the Little Entente have been dislocated. After the Montreux conference last year Turkey offered a pact of mutual assistance to France. That offer too was refused for fear of offending Mussolini. It has, I have reason to believe, been renewed, and perhaps it will now be accepted. In any case Franco-Turkish relations have been made thoroughly friendly by the agreement in regard to the Sanjak of Alexandretta.

On March 7, 1936, the Polish government informed the Sarraut Cabinet, then in office in France, that Poland would support any action taken by France to obtain the withdrawal of the German troops from the Rhineland, and would fulfil all the obligations of the Franco-Polish alliance if such action led Germany to make war on France. The Sarraut Cabinet, after consulting London, refrained from taking action, and the Polish opinion that France was too weak to be depended on was confirmed. Nevertheless, the present French government succeeded in improving Franco-Polish relations when Marshal Ridz-Smigly visited Paris. Later on, however, Colonel Beck, who had refused to accompany the Marshal and opposed the visit, went to Berlin and then to London, where he was encouraged by the British Foreign Office to continue his pro-German policy, masquerading as "neutrality." One result has been that the League of Nations has capitulated to the Nazis in Danzig and allowed the Polish government to come to an agreement with them to secure Polish interests. The French delegation to the recent session of the League Council rightly urged that if the League could not maintain its authority in Danzig and insist on the preservation of the constitution of the free city, it would be better for the League to wash its hands of the whole business and not appoint another high commissioner. This was also Eden's view, but Beck, terrified at the prospect of being left alone to face the Germans in Danzig, protested against such a violation of the Treaty of Versailles. The new high commissioner's only function will be that of acting as intermediary between the Danzig government and Poland. In spite of all this, it is clear that there is strong opposition in Poland to Beck's policy, and the French government may yet win back Poland—but only if the Poles are convinced that France will adopt a firm policy toward Germany and Italy.

In the West Belgium has been for all practical purposes detached from France with the approval, if not at the instigation, of the British government, and Hitler's offer to guarantee Belgian neutrality is intended to keep Belgium neutral in the event of a German attack on France. Thus the British attempt to separate France from its friends and allies and put it at the mercy of England has to a great extent succeeded. France, however, has in Léon Blum a man with the necessary courage and intelligence to save the situation even now if only he will take the initiative, without any further delay, in forming, with or without England, that combination of the pacific forces of Europe that alone can avert war. Such a combination can avert war if it is strong enough to discourage the aggressive powers from risking war. It is the only method by which Italy can be detached from Germany. Meanwhile the best way to deal with Mussolini is to leave him alone and make no concessions of any sort.

Kill the Conscription Bill!

BY STEPHEN RAUSHENBUSH

DEMOCRACIES don't like a bloody struggle to assume the shape of "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight." The contrast between the creation of some thousands of new millionaires and the creation of some scores of thousands of corpses dead from lead and gas has bitten deep. The veterans' groups have been demanding that capital as well as men be drafted in the next war. Other groups are worried by the prospect of a really first-class post-war depression, and join in demanding the heaviest taxation bearable in order to avoid inflation and a real collapse.

The gentlemen who run things have taken these feelings into consideration and assure us that the next war will not be marred by profiteering or any inequality of suffering. We now have their rough plans for the next war before us. The chairmen of the House and Senate Military Affairs Committees have introduced their bill (Hill-Sheppard H1954-S25). Such an introduction usually means that it is an Administration measure. American Legion officials have indorsed it. The Nebraska legislature, under the impression that "it provides for a draft of capital, industry, man-power . . . with equal service for all and special privilege for none . . ." has memorialized Congress in its behalf. Those who thought we were not again going to draft men to die overseas ought to look at it, as well as those who want to take the profit out of war and avert the danger of being led into a conflict because of our war trade.

The bill provides that immediately after Congress has declared war the President, without any further legislation by Congress, can draft the several millions of men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-one. He can control business by licenses, priorities of shipments, price-fixing, and by inducting managers into the service as civilians. He can appoint all the agencies he deems necessary to carry out his orders and rules, and the fine for disobedience of the rules is $100,000 or a year in jail. Lastly, there is a tax of 95 per cent "of all income above the previous three-year average."

In five short pages the President is given dictatorial powers which adequately meet Irenée du Pont's dictum, "An absolute monarch is needed in war time." Once we have entered a major war we must expect something like this whether we like it or not. It is our contribution to the "totalitarian war," and there is probably no valid technical objection to the military efficiency of this procedure. The objection comes to the claims made for the bill. Its stated purpose is "to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense and promote peace." But the claims made for it, unless they are promptly disproved, may sell to Congress and to the public a measure which actually drafts men in advance of any war, no matter how small, and which strangely "equalizes the burdens of war" by letting capital make a larger profit in war time than it does in peace time.

Capital was not drafted during the last war. It cannot and will not be drafted during the next one. The War Department is not equipped to do it, does not want to do it, and will not do it. Capital will be coaxed and flattered and given what it wants. It will be treated well behind closed doors because the War Department's duty is to win the war rather than save money. The powers to put a company out of business—licensing and priorities—will not be used because the government cannot afford to put a non-luxury company out of business. They will serve only to silence a hostile press.

The price-fixing powers are no threat to capital, either.

In the last war the steel companies, for example, refused to produce at certain prices, pointing out that a high-cost producer, Lukens Steel, was making no money. They got an increase. Years later the Senate Munitions Committee found out that Lukens Steel had made 90 per cent profit. The copper companies refused to produce for 23½ cents a pound, Anaconda taking the leadership. At the time its costs were 16½ cents.

Meanwhile the draft of men is not subject to behind-the-door evasion. It is to be taken out of the hands of Congress in 1937 and given to the President. A declaration of war against Mexico, for example, would automatically permit the President to call four million men to the colors. The draft is not something the boys can dodge. It is as real as death and far more real than taxes.

It is not stated specifically in the bill that wages will be fixed by the President for all labor, although the President can fix "compensation." However, Bernard Baruch, who has given his blessing to the bill, has recommended that a wage-fixing provision be added, and that probably will be made explicit. Under earlier bills drawn by the War Department a work-starve-or-fight rule was provided for labor. Mr. Baruch has pointed out that anyone refusing to work where he was told to work could be "cut off from rations, transportation, fuel, and supplies." And he may well have to work at wages fixed for him. The Munitions Committee held that under this principle, combined with a draft (to be used on strikers), "this country will have for all practical purposes a draft of labor." It is not called that. Spades are only garden implements.

Men are to give up their lives, labor its freedom. What does the rest of the nation give up? Capital need not fear control of production or price-fixing. The induction of managers into the military service as civilians protects them from the draft in a wholesale way rather than in the detailed way in which they secured protection before.

The only provision in the bill which gives any evidence of intent to prevent profiteering or to equalize the burdens of war is the proposal that once war is declared, a tax of 95 per cent shall be levied on all incomes above the previous three-year average. On its face, companies can keep all the profit they make in peace time, and in addition 5 per cent of the war-time profits. They can do even better. They can secure "proper adjustments for capital expenditure," a broad allowance for amortization which the dimmest wit among the company accountants will hardly pass by. This tax was proposed first by President Hoover's War Policies Commission. The Roosevelt Administration has taken it over almost word for word. There is little discouragement of war in that tax; there is actually great encouragement of war trade before we enter, with dangerous consequences to peace.

Some of the more realistic neutrality proposals try to limit pre-war trade to normal. They are based on the belief that once a boom in trade to belligerents starts, nothing can stand in its way. It is a dangerous boom in that it brings a depression as soon as the war stops. It makes our continued prosperity dependent on the continuation of warfare, gives us all a regular munitions salesman's interest in continued warfare. Any threat to the war boom means a panic. It was that fear of panic and depression which caused us to change our neutrality on loans in 1915. It was fear of panic which played a part in our heavy financing of the Allies after we entered the war and for years after the Armistice.

The Hill-Sheppard bill encourages a war boom by rewarding those companies which engage in it and by penalizing those companies which do not. To illustrate: Two companies each have a capacity of $13,000,000 in profits. A stays out of the present war-preparations boom and averages a profit in 1937-38-39 of $10,000,000. B goes into the war-preparations business, supplying England and, at first, Germany. In 1938 the war is actually declared. In 1940 we get in to prevent interference with our war trade with the belligerents (the freedom of the seas). By that time B has averaged its capacity in profits, $13,000,000. Both companies cancel other orders and take government business to capacity. When the 95 per cent tax on new profits is levied, B pays not a cent, while A is penalized 95 per cent of $3,000,000 or $2,850,000. By helping to kill the neutrality legislation holding trade with belligerents down to normal, B has secured its income during the years of our actual participation in the war. Under this tax the du Pont Company would not have paid a penny to the government in 1917 or 1918.

The 95 per cent tax would not induce any companies producing to capacity to throw their weight against our entry into war. And those companies which had not been producing to capacity would prefer normal profits to the depression which would come from the collapse of a pre-war boom. They are tied to the chariot wheels of the war traders. As Philip C. Jessup has put it: "The only way to take the profits out of war is to take the profits out of neutrality first."

There are ways by which even those companies which had not been running to capacity before our entry could make and retain huge profits. Under the bill we may expect a huge extension of War and Navy Department allowances to all war contractors and subcontractors in order to get production. During the last war the New York Shipbuilding Company received such a flat percentage allowance and got from the government as costs $2,153,000 more than it actually paid out. That company, incidentally, claimed its net income from 1917-21 was $8,445,000; the revenue agents found $24,297,000.

Mining companies will claim amazing depletion allowances, and get them. Texas Gulf Sulphur was purchased for $250,000 and was allowed by the government a value for depletion purposes of $38,920,000. Forty-seven copper companies claimed a valuation of $1,456,300,000, while revenue agents found their valuation to be $323,700,000.

Companies which had been producing to capacity before our entry would find an incentive to expand in amortization allowances. The Aluminum Company of America avoided $10,650,000 of its tax burden in 1917 by claiming that its new plant would be useless after the war. Later the company's production increased over 100,000,000 pounds.

After a war is over, and the depression is on, companies can and do plead poverty and avoid taxes in that way. Atolia Mining, producing tungsten, cost the stockholders $63,000. It paid out $4,715,000 in dividends from 1916 to 1918. Yet it claimed, in the depression, that it could pay only $165,000 in taxes on its war profits. Other companies will manage to take their profits in post-war years after the high war-time taxes have been reduced. And if the government wants to cancel war-time contracts it will be asked to pay through the nose. When the Iowa and two cruisers were to be scrapped, the president of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company told the owner that they were claiming $14,973,000 from the government but "would be willing to take" $6,616,000.

The crusade to "take the profits out of war" meets the cold resistance that profits cannot be taken out of war. Mr. Baruch himself cautions that "one must realize that it expresses an ideal rather than an actual goal." An economic system built on profits is not suddenly going to refuse to get all it can out of the government simply because a war is on. It isn't that kind of a system.

If there is to be even a faint echo of talk about equality, high taxes should be levied on all profits, not merely on new profits after our entry into war. Senator Connally has introduced S1248 and Senators Nye, Clark, Bone, Vandenberg, and Pope have introduced S1331, bills which move toward a high tax on all war profits. But such taxes will be evaded as they were before, and no Administration will dare collect high war-time taxes during the post-war depression if that means forcing half the nation's business into bankruptcy.

This is a plea for frankness. If a draft of men for service overseas is to be voted on in advance of war, or if a silencing of labor is to be voted on in advance of war, let those proposals stand on their merits, and let the country think a little about what a hard-boiled President could do with these powers in his hands. Nobody should, however, be allowed to believe with the gentlemen of the Nebraska legislature that the present proposal (S25-H1954) really "provides for a draft of capital . . . man-power . . . with equal service for all and special privilege for none." It does nothing of the kind. If we are to maintain our democracy with a minimum of class hatred, we should refuse, as a matter of elementary precaution, to let democratic slogans be used when they achieve undemocratic results. A war is still a war no matter how pleasant it has been made to look.

The draft provision of this bill should be cut out entirely and laid on the shelf until after we are actually in a war.

An irresponsible acquaintance of mine has suggested that the preamble of this bill, cited above, should be changed to read: "To establish a military dictatorship in the United States, to force companies to engage heavily in trade with foreign belligerents and thus decrease our chances of peace, to silence in advance all opposition to the draft of men for service overseas, to silence labor and destroy collective bargaining before labor is aware of what is happening to it, to put into the President's hands power to rule the nation completely on the pretext of a war with Ruritania, to kid the public about equality, and to hold out a real incentive to the Liberty League to put their President into office just once, because then he could stay there forever."

Espionage, Inc.

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

Washington, February 13

SENATOR THOMAS has a long, bony face and looks like a nice old country lawyer. Senator La Follette closely resembles a sophomore—pudgy, round boyish face, hair parted in the middle, horn-rim glasses. Flanked by rows of young men, they peer down over a lofty mahogany bar at the witnesses. The antagonists in the class struggle succeed each other in the witness chair—on the one side radicals and union leaders, on the other officials of strike-breaking agencies and their "clients." The hundred-odd chairs for spectators are usually well filled. It is a good show.

Senator La Follette and the National Labor Relations Board were chiefly responsible for the existence of this Senate Committee on Civil Liberties. Last spring the committee held preliminary hearings at which the Labor Board produced such a mass of evidence, documentary and verbal, of labor espionage that the Senate was constrained to vote an appropriation—of just $15,000. The money has been stretched far. It paid for hearings last fall which got into the record a vast amount of data about Pinkerton, Railway Audit, National Corporation Service, and other agencies. It is paying for the current hearings, which have gone into the Gelders flogging case in Birmingham—with a side glance at the Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company, the United States Steel subsidiary which carried on its pay roll the flogger-in-chief—the National Metal Trades Association, an open-shop crusader since 1900, and the intensely respectable Corporations Auxiliary Service, whose head men wear tweeds and look like women's-club lecturers.

A great deal has been brought to light, not through any fault of the spy-company witnesses but because the committee has done a fine job of under-cover work itself. When it sent out subpoenas to Pinkerton and the rest last summer asking for correspondence, files, and the like, it thoughtfully subpoenaed as well the waste paper from their offices. For several days after the subpoenas were served, the committee's field agents harvested the crop. Sacks of torn paper were brought to Washington, dumped on long tables, and reconstructed by a force of nimble-fingered girls into hundreds of highly interesting "exhibits." Already the testimony and exhibits fill 1,100 pages, with many more now on the press. Robert Wohlforth, a graduate of the munitions investigation, is the committee's secretary. John J. Abt is its able counsel. They have armed the Senators with the deadliest kind of ammunition. Day after day the strike-breaking gentry are butchered to make a Democratic holiday.

There is also the fascination of watching solid citizens walk into booby traps. The espionage experts seem to be fools as well as knaves. Considering that they know what the committee has taken from their files, they are surprisingly inept at defending themselves. The two Senators make a good team. Thomas handles the moral and theoretical end. His questions, in slow, genial accents, lead the witnesses to mire themselves deeper and deeper in a bog of idealism. It soon becomes evident that the boss spies on his employees entirely for their own good. In fact, it's costing him money, but the moral satisfaction is worth it. After Thomas has set them up, La Follette knocks them down. His tone is incisive, the words snapping out with awful clarity. One Homer D. Sayre, for example, the commissioner of the National Metal Trades Association, spent a happy morning expatiating to the sympathetic Thomas on the common, indeed practically identical, interests of employer and employee. "I get quite enthusiastic about it, Senator," he declared. It was a perfect set-up. In the afternoon La Follette took it apart, by the simple process of reading various documents taken from the association's files.

The labor witnesses present a sharp contrast to the bosses. They know what they want to say and they say it concisely, intelligently, convincingly. The difference is largely, of course, that one side wants to get at the truth and the other doesn't. But it goes beyond that. As human specimens the labor people seem superior—realistic, vigorous, tough-minded, distinctly more intelligent, and even more grammatical.

Last week the committee moved into the General Motors sector. Up to February 1, 1937, General Motors was Pinkerton's biggest customer. On that date, according to testimony given to the committee, the Pinkerton agency lost its customer, and with an abruptness which intrigued the investigators. All last week the Pinks were on the stand, doing their best not to shed light on this and other matters. Quite a lot came out nevertheless: that the Pinks had eavesdropped on Assistant Secretary of Labor McGrady when he was trying to settle a Chevrolet strike in 1935; that they evade state and federal laws in prosecuting their business; that a good strike shoots their income up three or four times.

Sometimes as many as nine of them—the entire general staff plus a few division heads—sit in a semi-circle to be questioned. In the center is President Robert A. Pinkerton, grandson of the founder. He is a vague-looking young man, Groton and Harvard, who speaks in the flattest and crispest of upper-class accents and who obviously knows very little about the enterprise of which he owns 70 per cent. He presents a strange figure in the midst of the tough boys who do the dirty work. In 1935 they rolled up dividends for him of $129,500.

If a sermon could be preached on young Mr. Pinkerton as an example of modern absentee ownership, there might also be some moralizing over the gentlemen who sit at his elbow. They are the Pinkerton lawyers, representing the great firm of Cravath, de Gersdorff, Swaine, and Wood. They are aggressive, sure of their "rights," and not at all impressed by the committee. The inarticulate Mr. Pinkerton, swallowing hard as he looks up at La Follette's grim visage, finds them a great comfort.

The hearings have spread on the record incomparably the richest array of data on labor espionage ever assembled, and for this reason alone are worth many times the $15,000 spent so far. But will they seriously damage the racket? There are good reasons for skepticism. For many years espionage has been one of the normal running expenses of our great corporations, as routine a bookkeeping item as reserves for depreciation. Much testimony at these hearings has indicated that even for employers labor espionage may not be such a good investment: the spy agencies have been known to provoke labor trouble; their spies have sold information to the unions as well as to the bosses, and so on. But such things are pin pricks compared to the solid achievements of the agencies in breaking up unions. Espionage will go on, it is safe to predict, until labor is strongly enough organized to make it useless.

But cannot the government step in and outlaw the whole dirty business? Past experience would indicate it can't, or at least won't. "Of one thing the laboring people of the world may be sure: you have dealt the Pinkerton system a death blow." The year was 1892, the speaker the Episcopal Bishop of Chicago, his audience the Homestead strikers. Frick had shipped in 300 armed Pinkertons to open up the steel mills. The resulting warfare had shocked the nation. Congress was conducting two investigations and was drafting legislation prohibiting interstate commerce in armed strike-breakers. That year Cleveland was elected President partly as a protest against Republican industrialism at Homestead. But the Bishop was wrong about the Pinkerton system. The legislation was never passed, the investigations were whitewashes, and the public forgot.

The roots of labor espionage go back to the Civil War, which gave Pinkerton its start. It will take more than an investigation, however ably conducted, to tear them up. A liberal witness at one of last spring's hearings attempted a distinction between labor and military espionage: "My understanding of the Army Intelligence is that it spies on the enemy and not on the personnel of the organization." The point, of course, is that in this case the personnel is the enemy. The American worker doesn't yet believe in the class struggle, but the American employer has been Marxist for generations. When the workers reach the same state of sophistication, and there are encouraging signs, something will at last be "done about" the espionage racket.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE European dance of death goes merrily on. In the past few weeks the press has reported the following developments in the armament race: The French Parliament has voted, 405 to 186, in favor of the government's vast new national-defense program, the Communists all voting aye. The outlay is to be 19,000,000,000 francs in the regular estimates and another 19,000,000,000 to be spread over the next four years, thus "heavily mortgaging the future," as the dispatches report. Of course, both the Defense Minister and the Air Minister reported that there was no cause for alarm. Yet the new appropriations were voted although the French Republic has no money to pay its international debts and cannot balance its budget.

From France's Polish ally comes this report: During the next four years Poland will spend one billion zlotys for defensive purposes, one-half of which will come from a recent French loan. Another bill, just introduced in the Parliament, calls for the expenditure of 264,000,000 zlotys for "general economic purposes," which sum, it is admitted, is in large part to be spent on defensive projects.

Berlin, next to Moscow, is setting the pace, and the news comes from there that Hitler's military expenditures for the year 1936-37 will reach the staggering figure of 12,600,000,000 marks. At the end of this first four-and-one-half-year period Hitler, so the London Banker estimates, will have spent no less than 31,100,000,000 marks upon armaments. This does not mean immediate economic disaster for the Reich, but it does mean that the scale of living of the masses is steadily sinking and that Germany is isolating itself economically. All of which, Hitler says, is necessary in order to revive the old Germanic virtues in his subjects and restore Germany to a position of equality in the family of nations—and in the race toward destruction.

From Moscow comes the almost incredible figure of an annual expenditure of $12,000,000,000 to make Russia safe from capitalist attack. Gone are all the old ideas of internationalism, of the solidarity of the workers of the world. Nothing more is heard of any refusal to slaughter the dupes of the capitalist countries. The whole national emphasis is as much on national defense as on anything else. France officially says that the Soviet air fleet is better than its own, and Stalin's standing army is admitted to be larger than that of any other country.

England still hopes to escape a capital levy to provide means for its new armament, on which, the government has announced, $7,500,000,000 will be spent in the next five years. Three new battleships will be laid down this year, and there will be a large increase of the air force.

And here's a dispatch saying that the French have decided to extend their "Maginot" line of fortifications to cover the Swiss and Belgian frontiers, although no one knows whether they will really avail in the next war. It is widely believed that the Germans are not in the least perturbed by the line and expect to jump over it with a huge airplane force and to go through it with tanks of high speed, or to pass the fortifications at night with small infiltrating squads which will then unite and attack the line from the rear.

If bankruptcy and/or war do not result from this mad race, then all precedents will fail. Meanwhile the costs, staggering as they are, are not the worst feature of this mad militarism. Everywhere the armies are becoming so powerful as literally to control the fate of nations. In Russia, if the Red Army decides to unhorse Stalin, he will go. Hitler will rule just as long as he holds the loyalty of his army. The horrible tragedy of Spain shows what can happen when the army turns traitor to the legally constituted government. In Japan the army seems about to have its way with country and people. Nearer home, the dictators in the Caribbean are intrenching themselves by making their armies more efficient. But they can be ousted on the day their troops decide that they want some other "leader" to rule them. So we have the astounding anomaly that the armies which were built up to safeguard countries from external attack have become the chief danger to the states they were to preserve. If it be objected that this has always been the case, I reply that the danger was slight when armies were small professional forces and not "nations in arms." Now that the whole life of nations is being made to center more and more about the military, and that those who control the military are controlling more and more the entire industrial machinery, it will be hardly surprising if soldiers arrogate to themselves the right to interfere in purely civilian affairs and to prescribe in peace time as well as in war time what form of government their countries shall have. Naturally they nowhere favor democracy. Democracy and militarism cannot mix—not even under the Stars and Stripes.

I wish the editors of The Nation would reprint from our daily press of 1914-17 some of the Wilsonian phrases against Prussian militarism and some of the editorial denunciations of the wickedness of that military spirit and its menace to the unhappy state that harbored it. I urge this not to show how mistaken the Wilsonians were but just to make people realize that if militarism was dangerous in 1914, it is much more so today; and that the new military technique is menacing democracy everywhere.

BROUN'S PAGE

Mr. Davis Comes in Second

I HAVE never been among the most passionate admirers of John W. Davis, and so I was pleased when a less well-known lawyer put his eye out before the United States Supreme Court in the Associated Press case. Of course I speak as a partisan, since the issue concerned the Newspaper Guild and the right of reporters to organize. But even wholly neutral commentators remarked the brilliant performance of Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., who spoke on the side of the government. Mr. Wyzanski presented his part of the case in forty-five minutes and reeled off citations without the aid of any notes or papers.

That was bravura stuff if you please, but for the first time I saw the nine remote men of the High Bench snap into attention. Even Justice McReynolds, who generally listens with his eyes closed, or maybe he doesn't listen, sat up and paid close attention. What impressed me was the fact that a legal argument was presented in a clear and concise manner without resort to feeble wisecracks or stock-company dramatics.

I know that John W. Davis holds an eminent position in his profession. Nor would I deny a desire for more color in Supreme Court cases. I think that very often vital facts are pushed aside by legal abstractions. But even if I want a somewhat more human bar of justice, that does not mean that I must fall for histrionics of a road-tour nature. I have in mind the long dramatic pause which Mr. Davis made as he gulped a glass of water and then exclaimed, "And now we come to the freedom of the press." As a matter of fact, Mr. Davis didn't even remotely approach it.

I wonder why busy men on the High Bench do not compel lawyers to stick a little closer to the point. I'm a layman, but if everything that John W. Davis said was relevant then I intend to put in a claim as an heir of Blackstone. For instance, the counsel for the A. P. discussed at some length the collective-bargaining features of the Wagner Act. Now I suppose the Supreme Court takes a lively interest in that moot constitutional point, but I fail to see how it touches the Watson case, which was brought solely on the complaint that a Guild member was fired for union activities in defiance of those sections which provide protection for the right to organize.

Moreover, Mr. Davis paid a high tribute to the novels of Dickens. I believe you can get them by clipping coupons from one of the metropolitan dailies. Aside from that circumstance I do not see what Dickens has to do with the Watson case or the conditions of newspaper work. I must also admit that the great barrister was generous in referring to reporters as artists and professional men. Those dear bohemians are so charmingly irresponsible that it does not, seemingly, make much difference to them or to anybody else when they get fired.

It was a blunderbuss defense which Davis put in for the A. P. He argued that the press association was not engaged in interstate commerce, but then he added that even if it were, Morris Watson was not one of the cogs in the flow of news. The reporter, whose lot had previously been identified with that of the creative artist, suddenly became a mere mechanical worker having nothing to do with the progress of news across the country.

A second string to the Davis bow was the assertion that the A. P. is not even engaged in commerce since it is an organization which takes no interest in money. As I have said, the First Amendment and the freedom of the press were called upon. But the chief reliance of John W. Davis was the due-process clause, and he could have cut the whole core of his argument down to five or six sentences. When he really got to talking turkey, the lawyer advanced the theory that an employer has a right to fire an employee for any reason at all, or for no reason.

I must say I was a little irritated when the silver-haired leading man made some crack touching on the retirement age of judges. If memory serves me right he said, "If there is any power of reasoning in this aged brain . . ." Unfortunately comments from the sidelines are not customary in the presence of the Supreme Court or I might have tried to gather a claque to shout, "No, no, no." After all, there is still very small objection to the retirement of newspapermen at an age much earlier than seventy—generally not at their own request.

Naturally, I have no notion whether Mr. Davis won or lost the case for his client. I gravely suspect that in most instances the arguments before the Supreme Court do not matter. The issues swing on other factors. But it did seem to me that here was a shoddy performance. The best compliment which one of the admirers of John W. Davis could muster after the argument was, "Well, you'll have to admit that he was smooth." I'll gladly admit that. To me Mr. Davis is not only smooth but glazed in the brilliancy of his surface. But when one scratches the varnish with so much as the point of a pin one finds a soft wood underneath. No one will ever catch a Tartar by piercing the cuticle of Mr. Davis.

He did bring up a very vital issue. If the Supreme Court upholds his contention, freedom of the press will be a very scorpion to beat the life out of all social legislation. If Mr. Davis has his way, the newspapers of the nation will become absolutely lawless, since no statute will be able to touch them. Neither fire nor building inspectors can make any complaint about a rattle-trap if only it houses a paper. To stress any kind of violation would be to attack the freedom of the press. The slogan of the publishers may well become, "It may touch the other fellow, but not us. We're different." And the way for any local Hitler to get a start will not be to hang paper but to buy one.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

FANATICS—AND HOW TO KNOW THEM

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

“WHAT’S stinginess in other folks is only thrift in us.” Thus, I seem to remember, some professionally homely philosopher proposed to solve in pleasantly simple fashion a difficult problem in discrimination, and the same technique has been employed to differentiate between various other troublesome twins. Superstition is said to be the religion of someone else, license a liberty which we do not approve, and sentimentality only the indulgence in an emotion we do not share. Indeed, some would doubtless go even far enough in this direction to add that definitions like these are realistic if one accepts them and cynical if one does not.

Possibly wisdom can get farther than this, and I am not at the moment very much concerned with stinginess and thrift or with superstition and religion. Like a great many other people I am, however, very much aware just now of something which some of us call fanaticism, and I have not, so far, been able to convince myself that a fanatic is merely a man whose convictions I do not share. It is plain that many with whom I disagree do not seem to me fanatical, and hence there must be something, not about opinions themselves but about the way in which they are held, which constitutes the essence of what I call fanaticism.

One sign of it is certainly the tendency to set up some one and all-sufficient test of salvation, some single opinion upon which all else must depend. A man is not a fanatic if he stresses the importance of diet to health, but if he is sure that raw carrots will cure everything from cancer to alopecia, then one begins to suspect an element of unreason in his conviction; and one may say the same in connection with doctrines more widely current. Thus to maintain that economic factors have had more influence than used to be recognized upon manners and morals, art and science, is to express an opinion both sound and important, but to regard as a kind of blasphemy any consideration of other factors is to pass over into a degree of fanaticism which compromises the value of the very truth proclaimed because it insists that we must discard what we already know and replace what we should only add to. No one can estimate what the controversy between believers in heredity and believers in environment has cost the sciences of biology and sociology alike, because of the time wasted by men who might have found out a great deal more about a complex interrelation if they had not been so passionately determined to set up alternative propositions neither one of which was tenable.

Faith is dangerous not so much because of what believers believe as because of what they do not believe;

because of the truths which they refuse to accept rather than because of those which they do. Your Communist is right to hate the abuses of the power of money. But it is too bad that he hates other evils so little that in attempting to abolish plutocracy he should not notice that he has handed a people over to the power of a bureaucratic dictatorship. One thing at a time is a dangerous motto. Too often it means that we are never right—only alternately wrong in opposite ways.

Perhaps no line can be drawn to indicate where rational conviction ends and fanaticism begins. Doubtless we tolerate more readily the beginnings of fanaticism when fanaticism points in the direction of our own beliefs. But no matter how broad the no man’s land between the two, rational convictions on the one hand and fanatical beliefs on the other do exist. Nor is this all. For if it is difficult to formulate abstract definitions which seem very satisfactory, it is easy to propose certain practical tests by which one may be discriminated from the other, and I shall be bold enough to propose one which works to my satisfaction so far as certain all but omnipresent controversies are concerned.

The fanatic is to be known by his all-or-nothing attitude, by his tendency to assume that every detail of his creed is as important as every other, by his inability to conceive that any distinction can be made between the most minute criticism and the most complete repudiation. How prevalent this sort of fanaticism is among professed Communists is plain enough from their tendency to break up into sects which hate one another rather more vehemently than they hate those who reject what to us outsiders seems the more fundamental tenets of their creed. That, doubtless, is their own affair and presents an exact parallel with the manifestations of the odium theologicum formerly exhibited by Christian sects, who saw no reason to believe the very Turks more hopelessly lost than those who differed with them over the question of infant baptism. But it is not, of course, only in their dealings with one another that Communists exhibit their fanaticism, as I personally have reason to know.

A month or two ago, in company with a long list of persons some of whom were men of considerable distinction and impeccable honesty, I signed a petition urging that Leon Trotsky be given an impartial hearing on the charges of conspiracy brought against him in an unfriendly country. I had not at the time and I have not now any sure conviction that he is innocent or that he is guilty of those same charges, and my interest was exclusively an interest in fair play. What was my amazement to hear us all denounced shortly after as defenders of Trotskyite assassins and fascists. I know that I had previously been denounced as a reactionary capitalist and that anyone who had cared to inquire was fully aware of the fact that, not being a Communist of any shade or variety, I could not possibly be a "Trotskyite." But it is the essence of fanaticism that the fanatic is incapable of conceiving not only that all his opponents are not exactly alike but that it is possible to be anything except an extremist. I am a believer in democracy, but it would never occur to me to feel that I could not criticize some act of a democratic government without ceasing thereby to be a believer in democracy, or to doubt that I could, in the interest of fairness, think a trial for Trotsky desirable without thereby being a Trotskyite. And therein, I believe, is exhibited one of the essential differences between those who are fanatics and those who are not. To a fanatic a thing is either all true or all false, and it is also either the only thing that is important or not important at all. All who are not for everything he is for are against everything he is for, and of course there exist only the alternatives which he chooses to recognize. If I say that I am a democrat, then I am actually only a hypocrite. To him, everyone who is not a blind worshiper of Stalin must be a blind worshiper of Trotsky.

West by the Rain

BY DAVID SCHUBERT

If the wind blows in the locust tree,
The city, upside down in the gutter,
Stirs and explodes in a pool of rain.
The towers, if a strong voice spoke,
Would sink past plummet line.
Slum and thug and heart of the town
Concentrating on lost sweet Adeline,
Even if a good breath were blown,
Their shadows hanging upside down.

Building the water the sound of a mad
Bird, bird, bird, bird, bird,
Singing unlistened to, unheard
On this last branch of sky gone red
With the aura from a trolley shed,
Here, in New York, when the bells are ringing
St. Frances into Convent Avenue—
City, dull or aflame, the sparrows sing.

Against the lesser darkness of the night
Injustice keeps a lantern lit
In the street straddled by rain.
The profile of the rain in the pool
Where the sidewalk sinks to grass in less than soil,
The wind blowing in the tree,
Accepts the water's city with a total infidelity.

City, city, city, city, city—
Talking transportation, a wind blew out of the sea.

BOOKS

Something of an Autobiography

SOMETHING OF MYSELF. By Rudyard Kipling. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

KIPLING was sometimes an awkward messiah. As the knight-errant of the British middle classes he was slightly uneasy; as the impresario of the Empire he grew pompous. But he was always a skilled and conscientious craftsman, an imaginative artist. This fact, often lost sight of in the tumult and the shouting of his career, is made clear in the opening pages of his autobiography.

Here is the account of a gifted young man who was bred by the nostalgia and disease of the Anglo-Indian tradition to ambition, hard work, and daring; who at the age of twenty-three, treading on the heels of "the late Mr. Oscar Wilde," confronted literary London with an array of virile talents. The decade before the Boer War gave to Kipling an unmatched influence. "That period was all, as I have said, a dream, in which it seemed that I could push down walls, walk through ramparts, and stride across rivers." It befell the chronicler of the hill tales to kindle, in a sense create, that odd worship of a moribund empire which marked the close of the century in England. The ageless "law" that the superior races must dominate the weak, the affirmation of rosy deed over pale thought, of faith over intellect, the sacrifice of individual happiness in behalf of national aggrandizement—these notions have for us a ring both intimate and ominous; and it was Kipling, one recalls, whose dazzling slogans spread these notions across the seven seas. It is true that, as Britain's apostle of action, Kipling lived an uneventful life of thought; that this believer in the individual's immolation passed his days in the pursuit of rather enjoyable occupations. Indeed, England's most fervent lover seemed unable to bear her shores and was usually to be found in Vermont, Australia, or South Africa; the staunch advocate of the white man's supremacy was most at ease among the "pore benighted 'eathen." It did not matter. The audience was delighted. The course of history is influenced by such understandable inconsistencies.

The more penetrating studies of Kipling, instead of attacking his "imperialistic iniquities," have preferred to deal with his basic portrait of man, for which this philosophy was the gilded frame. Nevertheless, Kipling's career, if no longer so promising a target for the arrows of the outraged intellectuals, seems at least a misapplication of valuable ability. For "Something of Myself" reveals clearly the dichotomy of Kipling's personality. From the start of his autobiography to the end the guardian of the Empire is never so appealing as when he discusses the sorrows of childhood, philosophic horses, or domestic intrigues. Children, animals, and the small doings of the day—these are Kipling's métier. One may question his educational theories but hardly the account of his school friends and teachers at Westward Ho. When he describes the fever, the recurrent heat, and the endless boredom of his youth in the India of the eighteen-eighties, he is eloquent, but when he mentions talking bears, Pylorus Jack who was the official shark of Wellington harbor, or the wild horses near Auckland, he is almost without equal. As Kipling grows older, tighter, smaller, losing the ingenuous and pungent manner of his apprenticeship, one feels unfortunately less respect for his point of view; yet in this chief gift he remains untouched by the judgment of time. His analysis of the American scene, though not without satiric insight, is at bottom more parochial than the society it describes. But who will ignore the "most mellow plumber" who comes driving up to Bliss Cottage with his sticks of dynamite rattling about under his buggy seat? The statement on the Boer War is possibly the most obtuse that has yet emanated from the mind of an intelligent man. But again there is the swift transition to the zebra père who carefully lifts the restraining fence for his family's exit, to marvelous spitting llamas and bull kudus, to M'Sliban, the ailing orphan lion, who feasted so deliciously on special mutton and Mrs. Kipling's fingertip.

It is in these interregnums of "Something of Myself"—just as it is in the "Jungle Books" or "Stalky and Co." rather than in the "Barrack Room Ballads" or "The Day's Work"—that one feels the happiest manifestations of a manifold talent. Yet in this case, fine as they are, are these episodes enough? Through conviction and design Kipling offers simply the extrinsic pattern of his life. What were his ultimate reflections about his friends and enemies, his achievements, himself? What doubts and conflicts lie buried beneath the calm polish of his art and the dogmatism of his preachings? Of such matters he barely hints. The life of a writer is, of course, seldom as interesting as the life he writes about. When the writer, as here, chooses to eliminate the pivotal experiences that must mark the development of even a Victorian favorite, the result can be only something of an autobiography.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Soda Parlor in Brooklyn

LOW COMPANY. By Daniel Fuchs. Vanguard Press. $2.50.

IN HIS three novels, "Summer in Williamsburg," "Homage to Blenheim," and "Low Company," Daniel Fuchs has been striving to write a fictional "dictionary" of the people of Williamsburg, Brooklyn, and nearby sections. His latest novel derives logically out of its predecessors. Most of its action takes place in a soda parlor at such a place as Brighton Beach or Coney Island. The protagonists are from the same stratum of society as were those who appeared in the earlier novels, and the action is confined to three days, during which time we observe the characters working out their separate destinies. There is Spitzbergen, the soda-fountain proprietor, worrying over business; Dorothy and Lillian, two succeeding cashiers; Shorty, the soda fountain man who is scheming to seduce Madame Pavlovna, a local corsetière; Shubunka, ugly, repulsive, and pathetic, who has been conducting a string of brothels and is being eased out by a gangster combination; Moe Karty, a former public accountant whose interest in the races has become a disease driving him down the steps of degradation; high-school boys and girls who come to the parlor for sodas and flirtations, and others. We gain a knowledge of these people, a conviction of them as human beings, and a vivid impression of the serio-comic procession of life that passes in and out of the soda fountain.

Fuchs views life essentially as a spectacle. At the conclusion of the story, just as in his first novel, we find a character who gives expression to the author's view: "The life of Neptune Beach was poor and empty, mean, without beauty or aspiration. . . . He had known all the people at Ann's [Spitzbergen's soda parlor] in their lowness and had been repelled by them, but now it seemed to him how their evil appeared in their impoverished, dingy lives and, further, how miserable their own evil rendered them. It was not enough to call them low and pass on." They must be "picked to pieces," understood, and contemplated with sympathy. Sympathy is a dominant note in Fuchs's writing. He has a keen eye, an excellent ear for the speech of his characters, a quick perception of the grotesque, the whimsical, the pathetic, the tragic in modern crowded urban life. And underlying these capacities is a genuine respect for his characters, for the human animal. No matter how repulsive his characters may be, as witness his Shubunka, he portrays them with sympathy.

The present novel, like its predecessors, is constructed almost like a drama. There is considerable dependence on dialogue, there is a fairly strict effort to obtain objectivity, and an ingenious sense of plot and construction is displayed. In fact, the author's gift for construction threatens to become a defect. The concluding pages of "Low Company" unite and complete the novel's many stories in such a fashion that one almost sees the seams and stitchings. Yet I know of few novelists in America today of Fuchs's age who possess his natural talent and energy or his sense of life. Further, his novels have their value as social documentation. They contain the data of experience which tell us concretely how Americans are made, how today's social structure impresses habits, ambitions, and patterns of speech and feeling upon the consciousness of people. And they are rich with the poetry of the city streets.

JAMES T. FARRELL

The English System

CABINET GOVERNMENT. By W. Ivor Jennings. The Macmillan Company. $5.50.

THIS is an indispensable book for every student of the British political system. No other volume exists which throws a light so clear and so revealing upon the operation of the Cabinet system. It is based not merely on a full survey of the printed sources; Dr. Jennings has obviously had access to new material, both written and verbal, which has had great influence upon his conclusions.

Dr. Jennings has not written a historical work—for the most part he confines himself to the experience of the last hundred years—nor has he sought to evaluate the system. Save for an occasional emphasis by adjective, he has been content to describe the system in being. He displays remarkable accuracy; except for an occasional error in date, a failure to realize that Cabinet minutes go back at least to the younger Pitt, the ascription of a speech to Mr. Lloyd George which is now known to have been written by General Smuts, it is difficult to see that he has misstated or missed anything of significance. He is not, indeed, a Bagehot; there is not in his pages the flashing phrase that made the "English Constitution" a timeless classic. But this is a work so revealing to the specialist and so interesting to the general reader that it will find a place beside those half-dozen books, Dicey and Redlich for example, which shape the thoughts of men about the institutions with which they deal.

Naturally enough, the most fascinating part today of Dr. Jennings's book is the section that deals with the relations of the Crown and the Cabinet. He has no difficulty in showing how far from the facts is Bagehot's famous theory of automatism. The Crown's influence is both wide and profound. It is not merely that the royal views must be treated with deference; the fact that they must be so treated acts as a preventive check, especially on the left, against the introduction of highly controversial legislation. Dr. Jennings is fully

NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS WEEK—MARCH 1-7

PRESIDENT'S FARM TENANCY PROGRAM IGNORES TERROR IN THE SOUTH

WASHINGTON—Sharp criticism of President Roosevelt's farm tenancy program was voiced here by representatives of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union because the President had ignored the entire question of civil liberties in the South. "No proposed solution to the sharecropper problem can be effective," they declared, "unless it protects the sharecroppers, both Negro and white, against the rampant terrorism of the planters and guarantees their right to organize, to meet publicly and to strike."

Federal legislation to aid the sharecropper will be meaningless unless the master-slave relationship between landlord and tenant is abolished. This can only be done through the medium of a strong union of tenants and sharecroppers, guaranteed the privileges and rights of workers and human beings.

IN NEW YORK—

ALL WEEK—March 1-6—Performances of John Wexley's new play "Steel" at the Labor Stage Theatre, 106 W. 39th St., for the benefit of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. Photograph exhibit in the lobby, sharecropper speakers and singers between the acts. Prices: 35c, 55c, 83c.

LUNCHEON Saturday afternoon, March 6, 1 p.m., at Rosoff's Restaurant, 147 W. 43rd St. Speakers will include J. R. Butler and H. L. Mitchell, president and secretary of the S.T.F.U., W. L. Blackstone, sharecropper member of the Special Committee on Farm Tenancy, Mrs. Frank Weems and other sharecropper visitors; also, Charles H. Houston, special counsel for the N.A.A.C.P. Reservations: 85c.

WIND-UP RALLY Sunday afternoon, March 7, 4 p.m., at the Harlem Labor Center, 312 W. 125th St. Speakers will include union officials, Walter White, secretary of the N.A.A.C.P. and Frank Crosswaith of the Negro Labor Committee.

FOR FURTHER INFORMATION call Sidney Hertzberg, National Sharecroppers Week, 112 East 19th St., ALgonquin 4-0346.

THE SOUTHERN TENANT FARMERS' UNION

"The Voice of the Disinherited"

Organized in 1933, the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union is today the dominant labor organization in the Southwest. Its 30,000 members, Negro and white, include sharecroppers, tenant farmers and day laborers in Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee and Missouri. It is the hope and inspiration of the farm workers of the South.

Its organizers have been kidnapped, beaten and murdered; its strikes have been met with unabating terror. But it has never asked for a truce in this battle—untiringly it has fought on in its war for the freedom of the cotton slaves. Despite the relentless opposition of the planters, its third annual convention, held in January at Muskogee, Oklahoma, welcomed 150 delegates from 125 local unions. Its efforts have been endorsed by the American Federation of Labor, the United Mine Workers of America and other important unions.

It was the fight of the Union that first awoke America to the plight of the sharecropper; it was the fight of the Union that made the sharecroppers "front-page copy" on every newspaper of the nation. To the Union must be given credit for the formation of the President's Special Committee on Farm Tenancy; to the Union must be given credit for the arrest and conviction of an Arkansas town marshal on the charge of slavery.

But the fight of the Union has just begun; safety and security for the sharecropper lies not with governmental agencies run by the landlord but with his own organization. The Southern Tenant Farmers' Union is this organization—but it can not finance this fight alone; the havoc of the tragic flood has added to the heavy burdens of an already penniless membership.

The volunteer organizers who travel the highways at night and spread the story of unionism by day must be clothed and fed; literature must be issued; planters' terrorism must be fought in the courts; jailed unionists must be defended. The Union's 1937 budget for this job is $18,000.

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

The week of March 1-7 has been designated as National Sharecroppers Week by the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union and the Workers Defense League. During the week, hundreds of meetings in every section of the country will publicize the plight of the sharecropper, describe the fight of the Union.

In order to function in an efficient manner, the Union must be freed from financial worries. We are appealing to the readers of The Nation to help raise the modest union budget of $18,000 for the year during National Sharecroppers Week.

Won't you help? Your check will be more than a gesture of sympathy and solidarity; it will mean that the Union can continue its fight for the emancipation of the sharecropper from a vicious and barbaric feudal slavery. MAIL THE COUPON TODAY! EVERY DOLLAR COUNTS!

Mr. HOWARD KESTER, Treasurer,
NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS WEEK,
112 East 19th Street, N. Y. C.

I enclose $..... as my share toward the financing of the 1937 budget of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union.

I pledge to donate $..... to the Union during 1937.

Name

Address

City State N

The authoritative history of American diplomacy

With the same authority and lucidity that won him the 1926 Pulitzer Prize in History, Professor Bemis presents the record of our diplomatic history from our earliest days as a nation up to the present. "The most comprehensive and scholarly history of American diplomacy that we have."

—N. Y. Times. Illustrated, $5

A DIPLOMATIC HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES

by Samuel Flagg Bemis

A brilliant record of an eventful era

This lively, and authoritative volume reviews recent American history. Written from the liberal point of view, its emphasis is on social history, with special attention to the adjustment of industrial enterprise and the Federal Government. It throws into proper perspective our present problems.

$3.50

ROOSEVELT TO ROOSEVELT

by Dwight Lowell Dumond

A survey of Europe's storm centre

A noted German writer presents a penetrating analysis of the political and economic problems facing Central Europe. He deals with the post-war groupings, the Hapsburg question, the "Anschluss"—, presents the facts, surveys the problems and indicates the solutions of these portentous questions.

$2.75

CENTRAL EUROPE AND THE WESTERN WORLD

by Gerhard Schacher

Must the state be tyrannical?

The Chief Editorial Writer of the Cincinnati Enquirer appraises our American state. He analyzes its shortcomings, and suggests steps which can be taken to increase its effectiveness. For every American who is concerned with avoiding both Communism and Fascism.

$2.50

OUR INEFFECTIVE STATE

by William H. Hessler

HENRY HOLT & CO., NEW YORK

aware that a British monarch might easily become an active source of political power in the state, and the main emphasis of his argument is on the inescapable necessity of accepting Bagehot's theory if difficulties are to be avoided in the future. From this angle, the abdication of Edward VIII may well prove a precedent as significant for the future as the Revolution of 1688.

Dr. Jennings makes less than I should myself make of the importance of the inner Cabinet; and I doubt whether he gives quite the required emphasis to the outstanding position the Prime Minister has come to have in the post-war years. I should have liked a rather fuller treatment of the relation of the Cabinet to the House of Commons. Subject to revolt on the rare occasions—like the Hoare-Laval incident—when the Cabinet has made a grave blunder, the House has become no more than its organ of registration. Its importance is, normally, as a place for the ventilation of grievances on the one hand and as a breeding-ground for ministers on the other. The selective function of the House is one of the things it does really well.

Americans will read with special interest Dr. Jennings's account of the relation between the minister and his civil servants. Roughly speaking it may be said of Great Britain that there are three types of Cabinet ministers. There are those, like Lord Haldane and Mr. Herbert Morrison, who know precisely what they want to do and are determined to get it done; they find the civil service a devoted instrument of incomparable power. There are those with some vague sense of direction but no special urgency of precision; their power to get things done will depend very largely on the coincidence of their ideas with the departmental tradition. There are Cabinet ministers, again, who arrive at the departments with no policy at all and look to the departments to find them one; they become the mouthpiece of the officials, and it is largely the accident of public policy whether they make an impact of any kind upon affairs. Granted, this is to say, a civil service as able and as efficient as the British, its own views will enormously shape the course of affairs unless it is under political direction that has charted its course with a clear and vigorous sense of all that is involved in the voyage.

HAROLD J. LASKI

The Lure of the Land

MORTGAGE YOUR HEART. By Sophus Keith Winther. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

STRAW IN THE WIND. By Ruth Lininger Dobson. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

THE INVADERS. By Stuart David Engstrand. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

NOVELS about the land are one crop which never fails. Flood and famine, lost farms, the burden of debt, and plagues of locusts do not interfere with the harvest. In fact, if anything, they increase the yield, for you cannot have a farm novel without a villain, and the weather and the banks serve in turn or jointly to provide an adversary. Most farm novels are likely to be above the average of the novels in any given season. They are serious, simple, natural; in novels as in life the weather is an unfailing topic of conversation. And descriptions of men working in the earth and under the sun until they are soaked with sweat inspires in the city reader at once a feeling of guilt and a deep sense of relief.

The land, then, is a good subject for a novelist to choose if he wants to get by with some credit. For the land itself is always interesting. But if he wants more than merely to get by, then he must work harder at farm novels than at certain other kinds. For a great book he must, let us say, write "The Peasants," in which the elementalness of the land was transferred to the characters and they became an aspect of the soil, the rain, and the sun. The three novels which head this notice are all in their various ways interesting. Mr. Engstrand writes of truck farmers in the Southwest defying for their little moment the cannery which overshadows them and sucks their sustenance. Miss Dobson's farmers are also religious bigots, members of the Amish sect in the Middle West. Mr. Winther's local is Nebraska, and his farmers are Danish peasants who must not only farm the American land but learn the American ways in order to understand their own children.

Of the three books perhaps Miss Dobson's is the most successful because she has not depended solely upon the land for her drama but has added the pressure exerted by a fanatical patriarch who dominates his family under regulations laid down by his God. In spite of his farm strike and the kerosene poured into the canning vats, Mr. Engstrand's persons are brittle and unreal. Mr. Winther's bewildered, honest, hard-working Danes are stock characters for farm novels. In each novel the mother is silent, burdened with children and labor, confined to the world of kitchen and field. The men occasionally get out, the sons to marry, the fathers to cope with the economic realities of disposing of the crops. The daughters are likely to rebel. The pattern, in short, is traditional and contains no surprises. Only the land is real, and for the purposes of first-rate fiction black earth, weeds, growth and decay are not enough.

It is perhaps impossible to invent a formula which would make farm novels better than merely good enough. But young and aspiring novelists should be warned. Because the background of land and weather is so interesting, because the battle between man and nature is in itself so dramatic, it is imperative to control the background and the battle, to manipulate them freshly and powerfully. The best novels are those in which the characters rise to some sort of greatness. Farmers are not in themselves important because they are close to the earth. They must be the significant protagonists in a drama for which the land must serve merely as backdrop. When kings talk about the weather, the weather is relegated to its proper place.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

American Novella

THE SEA OF GRASS. By Conrad Richter. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.25.

QUITE recently Whit Burnett, editor of Story, raised up his voice in defense of the term "novella," as used to describe a certain unity of impression in story-telling which otherwise might be critically ignored, or rather unhappily designated "novelette" or "long-short-story." Well, then, Mr. Richter has produced an excellent example of the novella. It is an interesting form, largely because it is a determinable form and therefore conducive to artistic ends. It makes a very definite and single aesthetic statement, whereas the novel makes many statements; though I confess the only way to mark it off from the short story would be to make clear that it is not a short story.

Mr. Richter hasn't, in our reviewers' language, written "an important book" or "a significant book" or even "a book of

VITALLY IMPORTANT TO EVERY PARENT

"EXPLAINS the typical behavior of young children in the light of their physical, intellectual and emotional development, and offers concrete advice on home management. Unusual for the sound but non-technical interpretation of the emotional life."

—CHILD STUDY ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA.

A MENTAL "CARE AND FEEDING" OF CHILDREN

JUST ■ Dr. Holt's book has become standard on the physical care of children, ■ Susan Isaacs' THE NURSERY YEARS will undoubtedly meet the widespread and long-felt need in this country for a volume that will supplement on the mental side this and the many other excellent works on the physical care of children. THE NURSERY YEARS will, in brief, become the handbook for understanding the emotional life of the child, for it gives, in simple and practical terms, specific and concrete advice for meeting day-by-day problems on the "mental and feeding of children" during what are psychologically the most important years of their lives.

THE

NURSERY YEARS

BY SUSAN ISAACS, M. A., D. Sc.

Former Principal of the Malting House School, Cambridge
Author of "An Introduction to Psychology," "Intellectual Growth in Young Children," "The Children We Teach," etc.

Some of the Many Subjects Covered:

What creates fears? How to dispel them.	Stammering
Why do children go into rages?	Thumb-sucking
Some reasons why children refuse to eat.	Jealousy
Children who lie.	Obedience—how is it to be inculcated without injury to the child?
Is it abnormal for a child to bite his parents or playmates?	Masturbation—how to meet and correct this problem
	Choice of playthings etc., etc.,

AND

SOME DON'T'S FOR PARENTS

A few typical comments from American authorities:

■ "I think you ■ making ■ real contribution by publishing an edition for American readers . . . Dr. Isaacs has a real gift in presenting scientific material in a form that is interesting, easy to read and at the same time accurate and clear-cut."—LOIS HAYDEN MEEK, Director, Child Development Institute, Teachers College, New York.

■ "A ■ excellent exposition on the subject and I shall really be glad to recommend it to my patients."—MURRAY H. BASS, M.D., well known pediatrician.

■ "A genuine contribution. Its simplicity should make it a part of every library, which the family with young, growing children could ■ as an introduction to mental hygiene. Her [the author's] practical experience takes this out of the realm of theory—she knows because she has applied what she recommends."—EDWARD LISS, M.D., Consultant Psychiatrist to the Durlach School, New York City, Hessian Hills School ■ Croton-on-Hudson, New York, and Winward School at White Plains, New York.

■ "We have for long looked upon the work of Dr. Isaacs ■ among the most stimulating in the field. It is good news that you are to publish an American edition."—GEORGE D. STODDARD, Director of The Iowa Welfare Research Station, The State University of Iowa.

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to:

N-2-37

THE VANGUARD PRESS

424 Madison Avenue, New York City

Gentlemen: Please send me copies of THE NURSERY YEARS, by Susan Isaacs, ■ $1.60 each ($1.50 plus 10 cents for postage and handling).
☐ I enclose check or money order. ☐ Please send C. O. D.

Name

Address

City

MARXISM is WRONG!

Marxism is now drawing a red line across a confused world by stressing private ownership of productive capital as the primary force which exploits labor.

Get free copy of pamphlet, "The Economic Problem," by sending postal card to Willett and Clark, 440 South Dearborn, Chicago, Illinois.

Also, more important, get from your bookseller, or direct from publishers as below, the little book "Safeguard Productive Capital," which more and more people are reading, and which you will have to read if you are to think straight on current economic and political issues.

Safeguard Productive Capital

by LOUIS WALLIS

Reading time one hour, 75 cents

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN AND CO.,

Garden City, Long Island,

New York

Do men prefer chastity?

Does Modern Man Suffer from a Virginity Complex?

The Meaning of Your Inhibitions

By Sigmund Freud

The Latest Article by the Founder of Psychoanalysis

You Hate Yourself—No Wonder

By Louis Bisch

Curing Self-Consciousness

By A. A. Roback

Premature Ejaculation

By Edwin W. Hirsch

Psychologic Approach to Pregnancy

By Samuel A. Sandler

—and many other psychological articles and case histories in the December issue of THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST

Single copies 25c on sale at all newsstands, or send $1.00 for 5 issues to

THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST, 152 West 42nd Street, New York, N. Y.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ 1 year for $5 ☐ 2 years for $8
☐ 3 years for $11. ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c

2-27-37

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

genius." Simply he gives you a first-rate yarn, exquisitely conceived and concisely and deftly told within 149 pages, in the form of a romantic novella. Here you can receive the maximum of sentimental excitement at a minimum of wasted time. You don't have to go like the wind to enjoy Mr. Richter: you can read the whole of "The Sea of Grass," and I recommend you to do so, at one sitting.

It is a tale of the historic Southwest, where all the gentility of the South met all the wildness of the West and combined in the heroic character of Colonel Brewton, gentleman rancher on the old prairie, decidedly a Mortal of the First Rank. As you might expect, when the Colonel's beautiful faithless wife returned to him, after an unexplained absence of twenty-odd years, he merely "bowed over her hand, asking with unfailing courtesy about her health"—though, it must be added, "his furrowed face was a mask and his voice granite." For Mr. Richter sees everything through the golden haze of his nostalgia for that vast, lost sea of grass, the South-western prairie. Everything is magnified in his vision to more than life-size: the cattle roaming like megatheria, the tents and wagons of the usurping homesteaders like some mephitic caravansary from the decadent East, the horses like snorting dragons, the prairie itself like a flood of great waters, and the men and women epical and colossal. It is a story that ought to be enormously popular, if only because it is so familiar: the glamorous tale of the proud he-man and the slender, jewel-eyed beauty, and their difference, and her infidelity; and then the tragic, wild, heroic bastard with the blonde hair and the quick temper and quicker trigger; and then the return of the erring beauty to the he-manly bosom after many silent years; all seen through the yearning eyes of a young man who grows mature in the telling. I would take the liberty here of suggesting to all aspiring romanticists that they cast their tales in the interesting form wisely chosen by Mr. Richter, and so bring about a revival of the romantic novella.

MICHAEL SAYERS

DRAMA

Strike Play

HAVING abandoned Fourteenth Street the Theater Union has come to life again at the Bayes, which old inhabitants will remember as the roomy playhouse built on top of the Forty-fourth Street Theater in the days when there wasn't any labor stage but the ground floors of Broadway and adjacent streets were not spacious enough to hold what we had not yet learned to call bourgeois drama. Moreover, the Union has built itself a very large and impressive set for its first play in the new home; but the program assures us that the policy will be the same, and one has not been long in the auditorium before the assurance has become unnecessary. John Howard Lawson's "Marching Song" is an occasionally effective but generally rather rambling and diffuse play about a general strike and why it must be won.

It is some fourteen years since I saw the first of Mr. Lawson's plays to be produced in New York. It was a yeasty, adolescent affair called "Roger Bloomer," and when the Guild did "Processional" two years later we all expected great things of a man who indubitably had much chaos within. For a long time the trouble seemed to be that Mr. Lawson did not know what he thought, but when at last he found out he seemed to know almost too well. Before he embraced communism he was too confused to write a really effective play; since his conversion he has been almost too clear. Knowing all the answers is, for a playwright, almost as bad as not knowing any. It is difficult to search convincingly for something throughout three acts when you know where it is all the time.

This, at least, is my guess as to the source of a certain languor which pervades what ought to be a rousing melodrama even if it could not be anything else. "Marching Song" has been given a topical significance by making the strike with which it is concerned a sitdown affair, and the ostensible purpose is to trace the course of events from the eviction of a blacklisted worker to the moment when the men in a power-house make it unanimous by throwing off a switch. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Lawson remembers too much of the technique he learned in the days when he was groping. Instead of sticking to the narrative and providing what his title seems to promise—namely, an inflammatory melodrama—he wanders about rather aimlessly from character to character, allows most of the action to take place off-stage, and only remembers in the last half hour that he isn't really looking for anything. If I may judge from the moments at which the Theater Union audience applauds, what it really wants is a revolutionary pep talk, and that Mr. Lawson provides only at odd moments.

No one is likely to expect high seriousness from a play called "Yes, My Darling Daughter" (Playhouse), but it actually turns out to be as engaging a polite comedy as the season has seen. I suppose that there is nothing new in the main situation, concerned with the furor created in a once unconventional family when daughter threatens to follow mother's footsteps down the primrose path of free love. What is delightful is, however, a certain urbanity very refreshing after the brittle smartness of the current Broadway fashion in humor. "Yes, My Darling Daughter" is never actually serious for a moment, but neither does it ever for a moment lapse into farce, and it proves again that laughter which grows out of an idea consistently developed lingers longer on the lips. Perhaps the expert playing of Lucile Watson makes the comedy seem better than it is, but it seems very good indeed.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"An Enemy of the People," which completes a two weeks' engagement at the Hudson Theater on Monday, March 1, incurs the twofold stigma of a period piece and a revival, since it reclaims a vehicle popularly supposed to be dated and commemorates the personal triumph of Walter Hampden as Dr. Stockmann. Yet Ibsen's medical officer of the baths is a conception far too high-spirited to submit to inspection from a distance, and certainly Mr. Hampden's enactment of the part is not of a sort which invites condescension. In his hands Stockmann is a force clearly seen at all points, both as the projection of a point of view and as an individual whose refusal to temper virtue with expediency leads him to commit the sin of complete ineffectualness. Mr. Hampden has staged the play with all the briskness possible to such an expository vehicle and has been uncommonly resourceful in his choice of a supporting cast. Mabel Moore as Mrs. Stockmann, C. Norman Hammond as Burgomaster Stockmann, Dodson Mitchell as the editor Hovstad, and Hannan Clark as the printer and apostle of moderation, all contribute individual portraits of merit and intelligence.

B. B.

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by
C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Western University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

including
charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M. D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

3-WAY
GUIDE: TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom
Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity
Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife
Effect upon Husband
Fear of Pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Sex Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship
Making Desires Known via the Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love
Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sex Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View • Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 827-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 14 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

FOOD FOR THE ACTIVE MIND

ONE SURE SIGN of the educated man or woman—of any age—is an intellectual curiosity about a wide range of subjects, and a free enjoyment of a variety of literary styles and flavors. This is one of the reasons why HARPERS MAGAZINE exerts such a powerful appeal for the intelligent reader.

Consider a single issue—the March number. The subject matter ranges from economics to flying; the scene changes from London to Shanghai to Arizona; the presentation varies from George Soule's cool orderly logic to E. M. Delafield's gaily entertaining confessions.

If you do not already know the brilliance and soundness of America's most distinguished periodical, will you not take advantage of our special introductory subscription to HARPERS MAGAZINE of six months for only one dollar? This is exactly half price. Return the coupon below at once to enjoy:

More than 90 brilliant features, including:

THIS RECOVERY: WILL IT LAST?, by George Soule

ARIZONA DESERT, by J. B. Priestley

OUR BACKWARD THINKERS, by Alice Beal Parsons

LAMBERT OF FIJI, by Webb Waldron

ENGLAND'S WEAK SPOT, by Elmer Davis

FLYERS ARE INARTICULATE, by Beirne Lay, Jr.

FREE SAMPLES IN CHINA, by Carl Crow

FACING THE FACTS ON HOUSING, Anonymous

TO SPEAK MY MIND ABOUT RUSSIA, by E. M. Delafield

SHORT STORIES and POETRY

Harpers MAGAZINE

6 MONTHS

for only

ONE DOLLAR

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY!

N-2

HARPERS MAGAZINE

49 East 33rd St., New York, N. Y.

Here is my dollar. Send me HARPERS MAGAZINE for the next six months in accordance with your special introductory offer.

Name _____

Address _____

FILMS

German Revival

MY REMARKS a fortnight ago concerning the inferiority of most films to the novels and plays from which they are derived were not of course directed against every film that is so derived; nor when I said that I preferred a "regular" movie to most of the "classics" did I mean the average movie. I was thinking only of the best, which may or may not be adapted from something else. Of three very successful movies that spring at once to mind out of the recent past, "The Informer," "Thirty-nine Steps," and "Four Hours to Kill," the first comes from a novel by Liam O'Flaherty, the second comes from a yarn by John Buchan, and the third comes from I know not where, if indeed from anywhere. The point is that their sources do not matter; a spectator in each case would be completely absorbed in what he saw, and completely satisfied in the sense that nothing he saw would occur to him as either foreign to the whole or imperfectly made over from something previously existing in another form.

We still need to know what the form of the movie is. Some directors know it by instinct, and perhaps every citizen knows it better than he could say; but the analysis has still to be put on paper. Meanwhile it is edifying to see now and then an older film which has achieved a position for itself in histories of the art, since such a film is pretty sure to have clear and formal virtues, and since with the passage of time these virtues will have become easier to dissociate from their accompanying subject matter. From G. W. Pabst's "The Love of Jeanne Ney," for instance, revived the other night for a special audience by the Museum of Modern Art, one could learn a great deal not merely about German "technique" ten years ago but about the importance, as well as the unimportance, of technique generally.

The ingenuity of Pabst was still impressive; one could remember with pleasure Harry Alan Potamkin's sentence about the camera going "velvet-like over the scene, veneering the picture, squaring the corners elegantly and rounding circles with grace"; and one could relish Iris Barry's program note about the forty cuts (talk about montage!) in a single sequence lasting only three minutes. But in a larger sense the technique—and Potamkin knew this too—was deficient. For there was a confusion of themes, and indeed a wavering between them; Pabst having been unable to make up his mind as to whether he was illuminating the history of revolutionary Europe or telling a story about two lovers stranded in Paris. The film was half documentary and half detective; which implies a formal failure in the long run more telling than any temporary success with the technique, as Potamkin says, "of tidbits." At the same time the tidbits were delicious. If we have fewer of them now it is partly because of the revolution worked by sound since 1927; we have something now that we lacked then, but we have lost a certain virtuosity of the seeing and interpreting eye. Movie audiences had grown skilful in piecing flashes of vision together; the films were rapid and often very brilliant, even when they had little to say except to a pair of eyes hung in the silent and now historic darkness.

MARK VAN DOREN

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with HENRY HULL MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thurs & Sat., 2:40. Eves. 8:40. seats $1.10

MARCHING SONG

THEATRE UNION
production

By John Howard Lawson

BAYES THEATRE, 44th St. W. of Bway., BR 9-3648
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Prices: 45c, 60c, 75c, $1, $1.50—No Tax
For Benefit Theatre Party Rates Call BR 9-2375

"A powerful and exciting social drama of inescapable interest."—Watts, Herald Trib.

"Brilliant scenes etched with savage humor."—Atkinson, Times.

MASS MEETING

PHILADELPHIA CHAPTER

MEDICAL AID FOR SPAIN

MASS MEETING AND DEDICATION OF
BENJAMIN FRANKLIN AMBULANCE

HEAR LOUIS FISCHER, Nation Correspondent
recently returned from the Madrid Front

OTHER SPEAKERS: Louis Ercolano de Zuleta, Former Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs; Congressman John T. Bernard, Farmer-Labor Congressman from Minnesota; Rev. Dr. John A. Mackay, President Princeton Theological Seminary; Dr. Frank T. Woodbury, Colonel, U. S. Army, Retired.

Chairman: Rev. J. A. MacCallum

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE

Broad and Poplar Streets

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH FIFTH, at 8 P. M.

Auspices: Medical Bureau, Philadelphia Chapter, American Friends of Spanish Democracy, 322 South 16th St., 538 Widener Building, 2015 Chestnut St., 1700 Pine St.

Tickets: 25c, 35c, 50c, $1. Telephone orders filed: Pen. 8067

Understand Europe

WITH ENGLAND'S LIBERAL WEEKLY

To form sound judgments on the crucial events in Europe, you require complete unbiased news from abroad and candid interpretation prepared by the best minds in England.

For more than a century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on a great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific.

In actual square inches devoted to editorial matter, each issue measures the equivalent of 66 pages of the ordinary American news weekly.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weekly indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of 26 weeks for $2—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home. Mail the coupon at once!

The Manchester Guardian

TO THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose two dollars for your 26 weeks' trial offer
of THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY.

Letters to the Editors

A German University Today

Dear Sirs: Any attentive person walking the cloistered precincts of our American universities during the last four years has heard kind words, from time to time, about the Nazi purging of the German universities. Without discussing the reason for these remarks, let us look at a picture of the once great University of Heidelberg that appeared recently in an English scientific weekly, Nature, and decide whether we want that kind of higher education here.

In the current catalogue of Heidelberg, Rector Groh is now entitled Führer Groh. The third most important officer is Ernst Kreuzer, a student and member of the senate, who is also the "officially designated undergraduate leader at Heidelberg of the Nazi Student Union of the Nazi Body." After his name come those of the deans and other officers. Whereas the university had 215 teachers in 1932, there are now 180, of which only 99 date back to the pre-Nazi regime. The security of university posts can be judged from the following figures: in the faculty of science, 31 per cent are new appointments, in theology 36 per cent, in law 38 per cent, in philosophy 49 per cent, and in medicine 56 per cent.

The Institute for Historical Jurisprudence has discarded its old name, "Rudolf Mosse Stiftung," as a painful reminder of the Jewish origin of the endowment, which the institute nevertheless retains. A list of some of the courses offered in various departments indicates the trend of thought in German university circles better than any propaganda:

Law: Recent Political History, Folk Elements in Law, Family Heredity, Folk and Race, German Military Law.

Philosophy: The Nature of the Folk Community, The Nature of Ancient German Religion.

History: Herr Minister Schmidthenner, Professor Ordinarius of History with special reference to the history of war and military knowledge, will give courses on the World War, Germany's Right to Colonies, Being and Action of the German Soldiery.

The Student-Faculty Discussion Group has the following topics on its program: Education of Nazi Youth, Labor Service and Military Law, Claims of the Germans in Czecho-Slovakia, Laws Concerning Race, Care for Healthy Inheritance, Eastward Expansion of Germany.

The university is now merely a branch of the propaganda department of the Nazi government. Those professors who wish to turn proved scholars from their positions because of race or creed had better look at the results which necessarily accompany such methods.

HUGH H. DARBY

New York, February 18

Harsh Words from a Friend

Dear Sirs: For nearly twenty years I have read The Nation and written for it. During that period I have always felt that no matter how sharply I differed with the opinions and attitudes of particular editors and with the editorial policy which they directed, I could always count on one thing: that The Nation, when confronted with a situation involving fundamental issues of truth, justice, and moral and intellectual integrity, would deal with it honestly and courageously.

The Nation faced a test of this kind during the last war and met it more creditably than most if not all of its contemporaries. The Nation faced such a test in connection with the Moscow trials, and in my opinion failed—patently, grossly, disgracefully.

It seems to me that when you printed Behind the Moscow Trials you made your debut in a way of thinking and writing that violates every standard that three generations of editors and writers have labored to establish for The Nation.

You admit, by implication at least, that the frame-up of Trotsky was a frame-up. Yet you condone this frame-up on the ground of political expediency. But can you condone one frame-up without condoning all frame-ups—without admitting the frame-up, the lie, the slander into the category of legitimate political tactics? In a hundred years, you say, we'll learn the truth about the trials. Nonsense. Where these obviously cooked-up confessions have involved persons and actions outside the Soviet Union they have been already shattered to bits by Trotsky and by the easily verifiable evidence he has produced. Holtzman and the Hotel Bristol! Piatakov and his mythical visit to Oslo! And now Romm and his mythical meeting with Trotsky in Paris!

Must we depend upon the conservative press, which The Nation so often condemns for its silence on injustice, to discharge the task that you obviously should be doing—the task of fitting these exposures together, weighing their dreadful significance, and coming to the conclusions toward which they point? Must we who have served The Nation, and trusted it, now think of it as just another magazine?

JAMES RORTY

New York, February 16

Tom Paine's Luck

Dear Sirs: Joseph Wood Krutch, in his admirable review of "Tom Paine," by Hesketh Pearson, in The Nation of February 6, remarks, "Drink, so often the vice of those who permit themselves no other, got him [Paine] at last."

I once did a lot of research into Paine's life for a short biography I wrote, and I don't think (gosh, I don't like to think) it was drink that got him. That's one of the cracks about Paine that were revived by the late Theodore Roosevelt, who called the clean, well-set-up, agnostic Thomas "a dirty little atheist."

Anyone who has ever been a press agent for radicals knows why Paine went to the bottle. After he had spent the best part of his life running himself ragged for all sorts of "cause committees" he tried, when the cause was won, to collect his meager pay, and Congress left him flat. He had one lucky break, however. If he had been a Founding Father in modern Russia he would probably have been shot. And then Duranty would have blamed it on Dostoevski.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

New York, February 9

We Apologize

Dear, Dear Sirs: It was the Walrus who wept!

LENORE PELHAM

Cambridge, Mass., February 2

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One Year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK . SATURDAY . MARCH 6, 1937

NUMBER 10

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

253

EDITORIALS:

IS IT TO BE BUCHANAN?

255

NEWSPAPER INTO THEATER

256

LET LA FOLLETTE GO ON!

256

A PROGRAM FOR FARM TENANCY

257

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

258

I ACCUSE THE HITLER REGIME

by Thomas Mann

259

J. EDGAR HOOVER—II by Kenneth G. Crawford

262

FORTY ACRES AND A MULE

by William R. Amberson

264

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

267

BROUN'S PAGE

269

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

INTERPRETING SHAKESPEARE

by Joseph Wood Krutch

270

LOVE POEM by Reuel Denney

271

THE TRAGEDY OF AN ABSOLUTIST

by Anita Marburg

272

THE NATURAL IN THE HUMAN by Philip Rahv

273

WRONG NUMBER by Mark Van Doren

275

A MAN AND AN ADMINISTRATION

by George Fort Milton

276

DRAMA: EXCUSE MY GLOVE

by Joseph Wood Krutch

276

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

278

The Shape of Things

★

WHEN STEELMASTERS TALK TURKEY WITH labor leaders, be sure a new era of trade unionism is here. There are several factors behind the decision of Mr. Fairless of Carnegie-Illinois to talk terms with Mr. Murray of the C. I. O. The steel drive has been effective. The automobile victory has had its effect. The steelmasters do not want to invite trouble from the La Follette committee. And, in Mr. Roosevelt's present mood, they cannot count on him in fighting a strike.

★

THE PEOPLE STAND BEFORE THE ORACLES still waiting for a decision on the Wagner Act cases. The court last Monday handed down another decision, upholding the abrogation of the gold clause in private contracts. The same five justices lined up against the same four as in the similar case two years ago. There are other cases more pressing. But with so much dynamite around, one can understand why the oracles are silent.

★

HARRISON WILLIAMS HAS EMERGED FROM his obscurity as husband of the world's best-dressed woman into a sudden limelight of his own as America's Public Utility Man Number 1. Testimony before the SEC disclosed his personal control of almost one-fifth of the entire public-utility business of the United States. By retaining 51 per cent of the stock of the Central States Electric Corporation, a holding company, he poised on the top of a pyramid whose base was seven separate utility companies, the assets of each of which were in the hundreds of millions of dollars. Beside the fantastic tale of Mr. Williams's manipulations, the construction of the Van Sweringen railroad empire seems like a corner-grocery-store transaction. In 1923 a share of Central States was selling at $10.50; in 1929 the same share cost $5,600, an appreciation of 53,000 per cent. Before the crash Mr. Williams had recovered his initial investment of $2,072,000; later he sold enough stock to escape the panic with $27,200,000 in cash while still retaining 51 per cent of the holding-company stock. Through this stock he now "influences the management" of public utilities worth $2,875,000,000. Counsel for the SEC several times asked, "That is not imaginary, is it?" to make sure he was not in a dream world. But it was a nightmare to the stockholders who, unlike Mr. Williams, when the crash came lost two-thirds of their investment in Central States.

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

ANDRE MALRAUX, THE AVIATOR, FRESH FROM Madrid's front line, has the artist's power to make real in words the present tragedy in Spain. His speech at The Nation's dinner last Friday evening, like that of Louis Fischer, made a profound impression on the 700 listeners. "There are many kinds of suffering in this world," Malraux said, "but there is one kind which it is a privilege to endure—the suffering of those who suffer because they are striving to make a world worthy of men. . . . Each of you may choose his own way of relieving this suffering. But relieve it you must!" The audience responded to M. Malraux's appeal by contributing the impressive sum of $9,138, in amounts ranging from $1 to $1,000, to The Nation's Food Ship Fund, which was formally inaugurated at the dinner. It was a good beginning, but only a beginning. There can be no question of the moral obligation of democratic peoples to sustain with food the lives and the spirits of the noncombatant women and children of republican Spain. The Nation's Food Ship must be filled to overflowing.

★

WE TAKE SAM D. McREYNOLDS OF TENNESSEE at his word. In explaining Section 5-a of his revised neutrality resolution, he made it clear that the ban on contributions to governments at war refers to loans and credits and not to donations. But we call upon him to make the text of the resolution clearer, so that no question may later arise. To do otherwise would be to travesty the whole American tradition of aiding the struggle for freedom. The loyalist fortunes in Spain continued to prosper last week. On the Jaramba River the government forces held. At Oviedo they pushed on steadily, with Franco's men contesting every street. This is what would undoubtedly happen also if the fascist troops entered Madrid: every inch of the way would have to be fought for. Meanwhile a serious loophole remains in the plans for an international patrol of Spain. The proposal for an air patrol did not go through, and there is nothing to prevent Italian and German airplanes from landing on Spanish soil. Clearly a coastal and border patrol is not enough. The first known American casualty of the war is Ben Leider, formerly a flying reporter for the New York Post, killed in action on February 19.

★

TO RATIFY THE CHILD-LABOR AMENDMENT the assent of eight more states is needed. In Massachusetts and New York the Catholic hierarchy is exerting its enormous influence against ratification. Cardinal O'Connell in Boston and Cardinal Hayes in New York in their control over the faithful have a very effective political instrument. As we go to press it looks as if the amendment would certainly be defeated in Boston and probably also in Albany, although it passed the Senate before the Catholics began applying pressure. It will not do for progressives to rage at the church or condemn it out of hand. Until we have more definite evidence that the cardinals are deliberately playing into the hands of the sweatshop employers, we must assume their sincerity. It is likely that their guiding motive is fear for the souls of the hordes of Catholic children who will be released from work and for whom the parochial schools, especially the high schools, have no adequate facilities. The poll of the American Institute of Public Opinion showed 76 per cent of the nation and majorities in all forty-eight states to be in favor of the amendment; we therefore call upon all progressive Catholics to make clear to their church that it cannot afford to take its present reactionary position.

★

SOMETHING IS HAPPENING TO THE TEACHERS of the nation. Ten years ago they constituted a peculiarly inert and submissive body of citizens, almost afraid of their own shadows and frightened by the slightest noise from the political roadside. Today, perhaps because of their experience with professional heresy-hunters, they are beginning to show courage and social intelligence. This observation is supported by the proceedings of the recent New Orleans meeting of the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association. The program as a whole reached the highest level of social and educational analysis in the history of the department. The convention was throughout dominated by the personality and the ideas of John Dewey, hitherto a bogey to school administrators, now made an honorary life member of the department. The superintendents also listened to and applauded realistic and honest analyses of the social situation by George S. Counts, Jesse Newlon, Harry E. Barnes, George Norlen, and John Studebaker. The unfortunate indorsement of the Sheppard-Hill conscription bill by the convention stemmed clearly from a lack of understanding of its real significance.

★

OUR NEWSPAPER COLUMNISTS ARE STAGING a pitched battle of their own over the President's proposal that makes the Senate fight seem pacific. In the forefront of the antagonists of the plan are the Three Invincibles of the Herald Tribune. Walter Lippmann, "sick at heart," calls it "the greatest crisis in seventy years"; Dorothy Thompson, hurling soprano thunderbolts, tells us we are "ripe for ruin"; and Mark Sullivan points a shaking finger down the road to fascism. Then we have David Lawrence, who with a sob in his throat apostrophizes the spirit of George Washington to save us from "the arch foes of our national welfare." In heavily documented arguments he is supported by Franklyn Waltman and Frank Kent. Passing to the fence-sitters, we have Arthur Krock, imperturbable on the Olympian heights of objective journalism, while Westbrook Pegler, a little out of his depth, adopts "an attitude of suspicion." The President's supporters number Jay Franklin, unexcited but cogent; Heywood Broun, half serious, half humorous, always nimble and persuasive; Raymond Clapper, who quietly, steadily, day after day, gives us some of the best arguments for the President's proposal; and finally the greatest phrase-maker of them all, General Johnson, still smarting from the Dred Schechter decision, and delighted to be in the thick of battle again.

GOVERNOR WILBUR CROSS OF CONNECTICUT is a gentleman and a scholar. Governor Harry Hoffman of New Jersey is made of commoner stuff. But they are brothers under the skin when the sit-down strike is the issue. For now Governor Cross too has announced that he will close Connecticut's doors to the C. I. O. In his case there is irony in the fact that he was carried into office on the wave of progressivism which is at present controlled by the Democratic Party but which may go forward under its own power any November now. Meanwhile the sitdown which evoked the Governor's outburst is interesting in its own right. The Electric Boat Company at Groton, which works exclusively on government contracts, announced early this year that the work week was to be increased from 36 to 40 hours and that this was not a bargaining issue with the company union. It based this high-handed procedure on Navy Department practice, ignoring the fact that wages for 40 hours in the navy yards are equivalent to those for 44 or 48 hours at Groton. The C. I. O., in the form of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, stepped in and is conducting the fight against an 11 per cent addition to the working week without extra pay.

*

IN THE DEADLOCK OVER THE WALSH-HEALEY Act, the Navy Department and the steel companies are still engaged in trying to out-sit each other. Meanwhile Senator Walsh has laid before the Senate evidence which makes it the more important for the government not to yield. He has shown that in six specific cases in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Illinois factories under government contract are working their labor under appalling conditions. Hours as long as ninety-nine a week and wages as low as $6 a week were reported. These were not isolated but typical cases of many violations of the Walsh-Healey Act. In connection with the La Follette committee's evidence showing how Governor Hoffman has played ball with strike-breaking agencies, these facts reveal that the South has no monopoly of sweatshop conditions.

*

EUGENE VIDAL'S RESIGNATION AS HEAD OF the Bureau of Air Commerce is part of a general shake-up among Dan Roper's sentinels of the air lines. The two assistant directors, J. Carroll Cone and Rex Martin, are being mercifully sent abroad to study foreign conditions. There is a danger that Mr. Vidal, whom the report of the Copeland Committee on Air Safety described as negligent and "too amiable" to be efficient, will be made a scapegoat for the sins of Secretary Roper, who, as Robert S. Horton pointed out in The Nation of January 23, bears the ultimate responsibility. The Interstate Commerce Commission celebrates its fiftieth anniversary this year. It would be a fitting birthday gift to transfer the control of aviation to the relatively efficient hands of the commission. A bill to this effect has been pushed in Congress by Senator McCarran, and hearings on it are scheduled to start soon. It remains to be seen whether the Roper shake-up comes too late to affect these hearings.

Is It to Be Buchanan?

THE President is having the fight of his life on the Supreme Court issue, and from all evidence the time of his life. The concerted tory barrage that has been trained on his proposal has brought out all his qualities of militancy and strategy. As a general in the midst of battle, he knows how and when to bring up the heavy battalions. First of all, the Sumners-McCarran bill, granting full-pay retirement pensions to Supreme Court judges over seventy, which both houses have now passed. Then, the marshaling of such hard-hitting radio warriors as Governor La Follette and Harry Hopkins. Then the scheduled fireside talk by the President himself on March 9, to be followed by the Senate committee hearings. Most important is the staccato effectiveness with which the President daily brings up measure after measure to underscore his argument that unless the Supreme Court intrenchments are blasted out, the whole future legislative program will suffer.

The strongest statement of the argument thus far is to be found in the masterly interview Mr. Roosevelt gave to Arthur Krock, published in the New York Times of February 28. The interview was more than a scoop for Mr. Krock; it was a triumph for the President. As if to set himself off against the hysteria of the Republicans and their new allies, Mr. Roosevelt talked with a deep and reasonable seriousness, far removed from the blood and sweat of the battlefield.

He brushed aside all talk of a third term or a dictatorship. "When I retire to private life on January 20, 1941," he said, "I do not want to leave the country in the condition Buchanan left it to Lincoln." The comparison sets one thinking. Mr. Roosevelt sees the country entangled in problems that need solving. He expects a civil war unless "the solving process begin[s] at once." And, to adopt an Edgar Hoover phrase, Public Problem Number 1 right now is the Supreme Court.

This interview, we take it, is the President's real second inaugural address, far more adroit and profound than the insipid rhetoric that mingled with the Washington rain on January 20. But in sharp contrast with the Krock interview we present Paul Ward's article in this issue showing how meager may be the President's legislative program, even after he has put through his judicial plan. The net result, says Mr. Ward, will be to make our unbalanced economy even more unbalanced, and prepare the next depression. And when that comes it will make fertile soil for a new civil war.

Here is a prospect that cannot be brushed aside with a phrase. Progressives must face it. They must distinguish, however, between the merit of Mr. Roosevelt's legislation and the immediate issue of the Supreme Court power. Even if, by combining the Roosevelt proposal with a movement for an amendment, the judicial hurdle could be overcome, the problem of really grappling with our economic difficulties would remain. Conversely, even if the progressives could contrive an adequate legislative program, they could do nothing with it as long as the judges blocked their path. The problem is a dual one. Progressives must support the President in his efforts to deal with the judicial power. And Mr. Roosevelt must understand, once he has a clear road, that if he does not smash the forces that are making for a new depression he may turn out to have been a Buchanan after all.

Newspaper into Theater

THE New York Newspaper Guild and the WPA Theater project have combined to produce in "Power"—the current offering of "The Living Newspaper"—a unique piece of art. Its theme is the search of Everyman (the consumer) for cheap electric power with which to make a better life. The play employs an extraordinary sequence of lighting, a screen on which charts, cartoons, and photographs are thrown, a loud speaker off stage, fast dialogue, quick shift of scene, and a mass of characters (which the Federal Theater Project was invented to make use of). Through these the consumer, a character humorously stylized and extremely well acted, is shown pursuing his perilous path, beset by holding companies, utility propaganda, the not so "fair rate base," and above all the overpowering visage of monopoly. Senator Norris, however, sees him through, and by a series of dramatic and highly informative stages—the bibliography of "Power" is heavily interspersed with the titles of government reports—the consumer reaches the promised land of TVA, while the audience cheers and the TVA song rings out. The first act is the longer and better of the two which make the play. The ending suffers, dramatically speaking, because there is no resolution—but to this criticism must be joined the observation that there can be no resolution until the Supreme Court hands down its decision on the decree of Judge Gore restraining the TVA from proceeding with its task.

Everything about "Power" is actual, including the TVA song, which is an authentic, contemporary Kentucky mountain ballad set down by Jean Thomas as sung to her by Jilson Setters. The unit of the piece is the fact; each fact is accurate (see the bibliography); and the author of the play, Arthur Arent, proves what journalists have always maintained—that an accurate fact carefully aimed may be as deadly as a bullet. As a result, "Power" makes an impact on the mind comparable to that of the best polemic. At the same time Mr. Arent and his colleagues have devised out of the cold facts a moving and dramatic entity, which has the qualities of newspaper and play and movie, yet is none of these but something new.

It is an old truth as well as an old saw that every newspaperman has a play in his system. Many a newspaperman has written a play, but "Power" is the play that has been in the newspaperman's system. It is indigenous and it brooks no condescension. The writing has been stripped of the stage sentimentality and the pompous poetics that might make a good reporter squirm—and cause many a conventional play to lag; the humor is sharp and fast; the production as a whole is excellent.

Let La Follette Go On!

FORCES behind the scenes are actively at work to bog down the labors of the La Follette committee investigating the state of civil liberties. Those labors were hard enough by their very nature. The genius of the Pinkertons and all the lesser members of their unsavory tribe is to conceal their tracks as they move. The committee at every turn met obstacles in the shape of destroyed records, blank denials, and general amnesia. But the spy system has allies even stronger than itself. The purchasers of its "services" and their lawyers and their fellow-travelers in the Senate have banded together to see to it that the investigation is further hamstrung through lack of funds, unfavorable publicity, court delays, and legislative interference.

A few details will help to show the outlines of the conspiracy. The committee began at the bottom, among spies, gunmen, gas bombs, vigilantes, and fake police. Presumably the direction of the probe was to be upward; but so far no industrial great gentleman has been called to account about his stool pigeons and machine-guns. The inquiry is still mired. The Pinkertons, for instance, on advice of counsel (Cravath, De Gersdorff, Swaine, and Wood, who slew the NRA) defied the committee to probe into their records. The Senators had been doing their best, wringing reluctant monosyllables from witnesses, tracing their tortuous machinations in behalf of General Motors. La Follette had even adjured a Pinkerton official by name, "Pugmire, come clean." An unreasonable request when you come to think of it. In the end the committee declared in effect: for half a year you have lied to us, spirited witnesses away, destroyed records, doctored your books; therefore we demand the names of your army of secret operatives that we may question them. Again, no, on advice of counsel; no, in the name of humanity, lest exposed spies be "jeopardized."

Then the investigation encountered new hurdles. A release was sent out to its 208 subscribing newspapers by the McClure syndicate hinting that strong ties exist between the La Follette committee and the C. I. O. and that the whole strategy of the committee was aimed at supporting Lewis in his negotiations at Detroit. In the House, appropriation bills suddenly sprouted riders designed to prohibit Congressional committees from borrowing trained investigators from government agencies. La Follette's helpers from the WPA and the Resettlement Administration were lopped off. Another rider attempted to cut off agencies such as the National Labor Relations Board. Despite Presidential advice, and despite the passionate interest of labor telegraphed from every quarter, Congress has helped the obstructive conspiracy of spy companies and big industries.

Only a public pressure in support of the committee stronger than the private pressure of the interests can enable La Follette and his colleagues to squeeze the facts out of the men who really control the whole system of spies and thugs and private armies—the Sloans, du Ponts, Schwabs, Girdlers, Graces, and Weirs.

A Program for Farm Tenancy

THE chances that something may be done for America's three million farm-tenant families have been increased in recent weeks by the report of the President's Farm Tenancy Committee and Mr. Roosevelt's subsequent recommendations to Congress. The need is appalling. A recent study by the Division of Social Research of the Works Progress Administration* showed that the average net income of wage hands, share-croppers, and other tenants in 1934 in eleven areas of the South was $309 per family, or $73 per person. Many families received much less. The average family income for wage labor was $180 a year, varying from $213 in the Arkansas River area to $70 in the interior plains. Share-croppers had an average family income of $312, but in the lower Mississippi Delta region the average was only $154, or $38 per capita. Some share-croppers reported incomes of less than $100 for the year.

If these incredibly low incomes were simply a matter of landlord exploitation, a solution could perhaps be devised, but the problem is inextricably linked with the sickness of the economy of the South as a whole, and with its political backwardness.

The recommendations of the President's Farm Tenancy Committee will be taken as a starting-point for at least the type of program which is needed. It is evident, for example, that the problem can only be solved through the generous use of government credit such as was granted to the banks, the railways, and owner-farmers in their hour of distress. The proposal to use this credit to establish a few of the more capable tenants and small owners is, however, as Mr. Amberson points out elsewhere in this issue, both dangerous and unrealistic. It leaves the basic problem of tenancy untouched, and places the new owner in a position where he cannot hope to compete on equal terms with the large landowner. The proposal to place the new Farm Security Administration under the Department of Agriculture is also open to serious criticism, in view of the fact that the department has consistently been dominated, as Secretary Wallace has admitted, by the wealthier farmers. A new agency should either be independent, like the Social Security Board, or be subordinated to the projected Department of Social Welfare, if the plan for departmental organization is adopted. In connection with the recommendation for state arbitration committees and for the repeal of the tenant-contract laws, it need only be pointed out that the state legislatures are completely dominated by plantation owners and the present status of the tenants is largely their handiwork.

We find the report of the committee extremely vague, moreover, regarding a program for education, medical care, and vocational training, which all agree must be carried out simultaneously with economic reorganization. The Resettlement Administration has done a good job in certain areas, but when one considers the widespread prevalence of disease, the sloth and ignorance of the croppers, and their lack of any experience in diversified agriculture, it is evident that its activities are but a sample of what needs to be done on a greatly expanded scale. Hence we find a growing conviction on the part of students of the problem that the only solution lies in cooperative enterprises. The one-crop system has been the bane of the South. Individual farmers with 30 or 40 acres can hardly be expected to develop a system of diversified agriculture such as the region requires. Farm cooperatives could not only do this but also make use of the latest mechanized aids and at the same time serve as ideal units for the project's educational activities.

Government paternalism may prove no more helpful than the plantation system, however, in developing the independence and initiative so seriously needed among these underprivileged families. In the long run they will find that they cannot depend on aid from the outside, but will have to fight for their rights as labor has done. To this end every aid and encouragement must be given to organizations such as the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. This may be done by amending the Wagner Labor Relations Act to cover farm-labor and tenant organizations and extending the conciliation service of the Department of Labor to include farm workers. Even with these advantages the lot of farm workers in the South will be difficult until there is a fundamental reorganization of the Southern economy along planned lines.

OUR TENANCY PROGRAM

1. An independent federal agency to be established to continue the educational, health, and advisory services of the Resettlement Administration on a greatly enlarged scale.
2. The basic land problem to be solved, as far as possible, by the use of federal credit to encourage the formation of farm cooperatives which would permit diversification of crops and the full use of mechanized aid.
3. The Wagner Labor Relations Act and the Social Security Act to be amended to cover farm labor as well as industrial labor.
4. The Department of Labor to be empowered to extend its conciliation services to include farm laborers and tenants.

* "Landlord and Tenant on the Cotton Plantation." By T. J. Wooster, Jr., Works Progress Administration.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Planning the Next Depression

Washington, March 1

WHAT comes next, after the Supreme Court has been reorganized? That question is giving greater concern to a little group of men here in Washington than the increasingly slight possibility that Mr. Roosevelt may be denied authority to pack the court. Those who worry about the answer are the select few in the Roosevelt Administration who take the long view and see things whole. They are the real Brain Trust, these dozen or so economists and lawyers; and I think I detect in them a fear that Roosevelt will not know what to do after his best excuse for puttering and inaction has been obliterated. I can report with certainty, however, nothing more than that the real Brain Trust is united in two beliefs.

Its members hold that the New Deal has wrought very little fundamental change in the nation's economic structure. They also hold that nearly all the old evils that brought about the depression of 1929 and the following years are now engaged in a wild, cancerous proliferation that promises another and worse crash in a few years. It is only in their forecasts of the date of the next recession that they differ. One group, to which belong such men as Mordecai Ezekiel and Louis Bean, has it scheduled for 1940. The other group, typified by Leon Henderson, thinks the blow-off likely to come next year unless drastic steps are taken to arrest present trends.

There isn't sufficient space here to set forth the elaborate logarithmic charts by which these schedules of doom are contrived. But Leon Henderson, formerly head of NRA Research and Planning, is one person who speaks your language and mine. He would tell you straight off that there is very real danger that any gains obtained from remolding the Supreme Court will be lost through poor legislation, and he would point to present prospects of a revival of the NRA along the lines of the Richberg-Draper and American Bar Association proposals. These treat labor standards—minimum wages and maximum hours—as unfair trade practices instead of prescribing such standards as socially desirable and economically necessary. Worse still, they treat competition as a series of relationships between nasty and nice business men, instead of as the mainspring of a system which must have elasticity if the imminent depression is to be handled.

The net result of such legislation—and it is the only type of legislation for which Roosevelt and his lieutenants are clearing the Supreme Court deck—can be nothing more or less than further rigidity in the price structure, further gypping of the wage-earner and consumer. The controls by which steel and other industrial giants were able to keep up their prices during the depression that began in 1929, while their production tumbled and they spewed men out into the army of unemployed, are now to be extended by legislative fiat to all the other trades and industries that can't manage their affairs like the big boys without the government's help. The drive is overwhelmingly in that direction. We already have the Robinson-Patman Act, which started out as a scheme for guaranteeing the wholesaler a permanent, profitable existence at the consumer's expense, missed the mark, but perpetrated other evils in kind. Now we have a dozen supplementary measures pending in Congress. There is the Tydings-Miller bill, waiving the anti-trust laws so that such organizations as the National Association of Retail Druggists may force reluctant manufacturers into resale price-maintenance contracts in those states which have blessed such contracts with "little NRA" laws. The Supreme Court recently validated the Illinois and California versions of these laws, which have been passed by fifteen states and have the effect in their price provisions of gearing distribution down to the level of the least efficient retailer. In the final analysis, these laws mean that if any man chooses to start a drugstore, grocery store, or notion shop, you and I must pay all the practitioners of his trade in the city, county, or state prices as high as those which he must charge to make a profit—no matter how little excuse there is for his existence.

That is at bottom the purpose of the new Patman bill, which would prevent manufacturers from having retail outlets and thus preserve the existence of the least efficient wholesaler; and to some extent it also is the purpose of Congressman Celler's anti-"loss-leader" bill and of the proposals for "trade-practice" legislation that have come out of George L. Berry's Council for Industrial Progress. Berry's outfit is beating the drum for legal prohibition of retail "loss leaders" and "sales below cost." On top of this we have pending in Congress the Guffey-Vinson coal bill and the Connally oil bill, both of which enjoy Administration support to some extent. The Guffey bill is little more than a scheme for assuring profitable prices to the least as well as to the most efficient coal mines, and the Connally bill, which has Secretary Ickes's backing, would do the same for the oil producers. In line with both is Congressman Lea's bill which ostensibly provides for regulation of interstate transportation of natural gas. Then comes the Bar Association proposal for legislation obligating the government to enforce "voluntary agreements" entered into by business men. Add to these bills the whole mass of agricultural price-control and production-control legislation that farm leaders are demanding, with Secretary Wallace cheering them on, and you begin to get at least the outline of the strait-jacket in preparation for the body politic. Instead of decent consumer legislation, fortification of the anti-trust laws, patent-law revision, housing legislation, and all the other instruments which might be applied to thawing out the price structure, we are compounding a formula for strangling capitalism in its own contradictions.

That is scarcely the sort of death to be desired for capitalism at such a time as this, with another depression hovering over the horizon. It is a prelude to fascism. Consider the plight in which we shall find ourselves when the crash comes. As Henderson points out, we shall still have on our hands some 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 unemployed, and we shall have only the beginnings of a social-security system and a reciprocal trade-agreements program. We shall have in addition the highest debt in history, all mixed up with public commitments of the "budget-balancing" and "no more taxes" variety, plus a real inflation threat resulting from a price level that at this very moment is soaring close to the danger mark. We shall still be in the grip of an unrelenting technological advance that, as will probably be shown by the WPA study of productivity changes that David Weintraub is directing, has an inexhaustible capacity for setting at naught any federal efforts to reduce unemployment through maximum-hour legislation. We shall be faced with an even greater concentration of ownership than that which confronted us in 1929, as the report of the Twentieth Century Fund indicates. We shall find the owners, as represented by the great corporations, better able to withstand pressure of the 1933 variety through their strengthened cash positions. We shall find that the "break-even" line on costs has moved down in the interim so that many concerns can cover their cash outlays when operating at less than 50 per cent of capacity. And we shall find the position of entrenched wealth further fortified by its control of business through monopolies, cartels, trade associations, mergers, and the like. These the New Deal has fostered to such a degree that it is possible now for such an organization as the Cotton Textile Institute to boast, without fear of prosecution under the Webb-Pomerene Act, that it has conspired with Japanese mill interests to restrict their shipments to the United States and jack up prices in exchange for a promise that the institute will see to it that this country's textile tariffs remain at their present levels. Finally, out of this will come a compulsion on the central government to prevent serious depression, a drive that will be stimulated by the Administration's claim that it halted the last decline, produced the current recovery, and has established fiscal controls over the economic tides. For an Administration that in such matters always has followed the course of least resistance there will be left only one way to turn, and that avenue bears no signpost "To the Public Good."

I Accuse the Hitler Regime

BY THOMAS MANN

[The Nation is proud to publish this exchange of letters* in which for the first time the greatest living German writer clarifies at some length his attitude toward the Nazi regime.]

Bonn, December 19, 1936

TO HERR THOMAS MANN, WRITER: By the request of the Rector of the University of Bonn I must inform you that as a consequence of your loss of citizenship the Philosophical Faculty finds itself obliged to strike your name off its roll of honorary doctors. Your right to use this title is canceled in accordance with Article VIII of the regulations concerning the conferring of degrees.

DEAN——(signature illegible)

The Philosophical Faculty of the Frederick-William University on the Rhine

TO THE DEAN OF THE PHILOSOPHICAL FACULTY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF BONN:

I have received the melancholy communication which you addressed to me on the nineteenth of December. Permit me to reply to it as follows:

* Translated by H. T. Lowe-Porter and printed through the courtesy of Alfred A. Knopf.

The German universities share a heavy responsibility for all the present distresses which they called down upon their heads when they tragically misunderstood their historic hour and allowed their soil to nourish the ruthless forces which have devastated Germany morally, politically, and economically. This responsibility of theirs long ago destroyed my pleasure in my academic honor and prevented me from making any use of it whatever. Moreover, I hold today an honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy conferred upon me more recently by Harvard University. I cannot refrain from explaining to you the grounds upon which it was conferred. My diploma contains a sentence which, translated from the Latin, runs as follows: "... we, the President and Fellows with the approval of the honorable Board of Overseers of the University in solemn session have designated and appointed as honorary Doctor of Philosophy Thomas Mann, famous author, who has interpreted life to many of our fellow-citizens and together with a very few contemporaries sustains the high dignity of German culture; and we have granted to him all the rights and privileges appertaining to this degree."

In such terms, so curiously contradictory to the current German view, do free and enlightened men across the ocean think of me—and, I may add, not only there. It would never have occurred to me to boast of the words I have quoted; but here and today I may, nay, I must repeat them. If you, Herr Dean (I am ignorant of the procedure involved), have posted a copy of your communication to me on the bulletin board of your university, it would gratify me to have this reply of mine receive the same honor. Perhaps some member of the university, some student or professor, may be visited by a sudden fear, a swiftly suppressed and dismaying presentiment, on reading a document which gives him in his disgracefully enforced isolation and ignorance a brief revealing glimpse of the free world of the intellect that still exists outside.

Here I might close. And yet at this moment certain further explanations seem to me desirable or at least permissible. I made no statement when my loss of civil rights was announced, though I was more than once asked to do so. But I regard the academic divestment as a suitable occasion for a brief personal declaration. I would beg you, Herr Dean (I have not even the honor of knowing your name), to regard yourself as merely the chance recipient of a communication not designed for you in a personal sense.

I have spent four years in an exile which it would be euphemistic to call voluntary since if I had remained in Germany or gone back there I should probably not be alive today. In these four years the odd blunder committed by fortune when she put me in this situation has never once ceased to trouble me. I could never have dreamed, it could never have been prophesied of me at my cradle, that I should spend my later years as an émigré, expropriated, outlawed, and committed to inevitable political protest. From the beginning of my intellectual life I had felt myself in happiest accord with the temper of my nation and at home in its intellectual traditions. I am better suited to represent those traditions than to become a martyr for them; far more fitted to add a little to the gaiety of the world than to foster conflict and hatred in it. Something very wrong must have happened to make my life take so false and unnatural a turn. I tried to check it, this very wrong thing, so far as my weak powers were able—and in so doing I called down on myself the fate which I must now learn to reconcile with a nature essentially foreign to it.

Certainly I challenged the wrath of these despots by remaining away and giving evidence of my irrepressible disgust. But it is not merely in the last four years that I have done so. I felt thus long before, and was driven to it because I saw—earlier than my now desperate fellow-countrymen—who and what would emerge from all this. But when Germany had actually fallen into those hands I thought to keep silent. I believed that by the sacrifice I had made I had earned the right to silence; that it would enable me to preserve something dear to my heart—the contact with my public within Germany. My books, I said to myself, are written for Germans, for them above all; the outside world and its sympathy have always been for me only a happy accident. They are—these books of mine—the product of a mutually nourishing bond between nation and author, and depend on conditions which I myself have helped to create in Germany. Such bonds as these are delicate and of high importance; they ought not to be rudely sundered by politics. Though there might be impatient ones at home who, muzzled themselves, would take ill the silence of a free man, I was still able to hope that the great majority of Germans would understand my reserve, perhaps even thank me for it.

These were my assumptions. They could not be carried out. I could not have lived or worked, I should have suffocated, had I not been able now and again to cleanse my heart, to give from time to time free vent to my abysmal disgust at what was happening at home—the contemptible words and still more contemptible deeds. Justly or not, my name had once and for all become connected for the world with the conception of a Germany which it loved and honored. The disquieting challenge rang in my ears: that I and no other must in clear terms contradict the ugly falsification which this conception of Germany was now suffering. That challenge disturbed all the free-flowing creative fancies to which I would so gladly have yielded. It was a challenge hard to resist for one to whom it had always been given to express and release himself through language, to whom experience had always been one with the purifying and preserving Word.

The mystery of the Word is great; the responsibility for it and its purity is of a symbolic and spiritual kind; it has not only an artistic but also a general ethical meaning; it is responsibility itself, human responsibility quite simply, also the responsibility for one's own people, the duty of keeping pure its image in the sight of humanity. In the Word is involved the unity of humanity, the wholeness of the human problem, which permits nobody, today less than ever, to separate the intellectual and artistic from the political and social, and to isolate himself within the ivory tower of the "cultural" proper. This true totality is equated with humanity itself, and anyone—whatever he be—is making a criminal attack upon humanity when he undertakes to "totalize" a segment of human life—by which I mean politics, I mean the state.

A German author accustomed to this responsibility of the Word—a German whose patriotism, perhaps naively, expresses itself in a belief in the infinite moral significance of whatever happens in Germany—should he be silent, wholly silent, in the face of the inexpiable evil that is done daily in his country to bodies, souls, and minds, to right and truth, to men and mankind? And should he be silent in the face of the frightful danger to the whole continent presented by this soul-destroying regime, which exists in abysmal ignorance of the hour that has struck today in the world? It was not possible for me to be silent. And so, contrary to my intentions, came the utterances, the unavoidably compromising gestures which have now resulted in the absurd and deplorable business of my national excommunication. The mere knowledge of who these men are who happen to possess the pitiful outward power to deprive me of my German birthright is enough to make the act appear in all its absurdity. I, forsooth, am supposed to have dishonored the Reich, Germany, in acknowledging that I am against them! They have the incredible effrontery to confuse themselves with Germany! When, after all, perhaps the moment is not far off when it will be of supreme importance to the German people not to be confused with them.

To what a pass, in less than four years, have they brought Germany! Ruined, sucked dry body and soul by armaments with which they threaten the whole world, holding up the whole world and hindering it in its real task of peace, loved by nobody, regarded with fear and cold aversion by all, it stands on the brink of economic disaster, while its "enemies" stretch out their hands in alarm to snatch back from the abyss so important a member of the future family of nations, to help it, if only it will come to its senses and try to understand the real needs of the world at this hour, instead of dreaming dreams about mythical "sacred necessities." Yes, after all, it must be helped by those whom it hinders and menaces, in order that it may not drag down the rest of the continent with it and unleash the war upon which as the ultima ratio it keeps its eyes ever fixed. The mature and cultural states—by which I mean those which understand the fundamental fact that war is no longer permissible—treat this endangered and endangering country, or rather the impossible leaders into whose hands it has fallen, as doctors treat a sick man—with the utmost tact and caution, with inexhaustible if not very flattering patience. But it thinks it must play politics—the politics of power and hegemony—with the doctors. That is an unequal game. If one side plays politics when the other no longer thinks of politics but of peace, then for a time the first side reaps certain advantages. Anachronistic ignorance of the fact that war is no longer permissible results for a while of course in "successes" against those who are aware of the truth. But woe to the people which, not knowing what way to turn, at last actually seeks its way out through the abomination of war, hated of God and man! Such a people will be lost. It will be so vanquished that it will never rise again.

The meaning and purpose of the National Socialist state is this alone and can be only this: to put the German people in readiness for the "coming war" by ruthless repression, elimination, extirpation of every stirring of opposition; to make of them an instrument of war, infinitely compliant, without a single critical thought, driven by a blind and fanatical ignorance. Any other meaning and purpose, any other excuse this system cannot have; all the sacrifices of freedom, justice, human happiness, including the secret and open crimes for which it has blithely been responsible, can be justified only by the end—absolute fitness for war. If the idea of war as an aim in itself disappeared, the system would mean nothing but the exploitation of the people; it would be utterly senseless and superfluous.

Truth to tell, it is both of these, senseless and superfluous, not only because war will not be permitted it but also because its leading idea, the absolute readiness for war, will result precisely in the opposite of what it is striving for. No other people on earth is today so utterly incapable of war, so little in condition to endure one. That Germany would have no allies, not a single one in the world, is the first consideration but the smallest. Germany would be forsaken—terrible of course even in her isolation—but the really frightful thing would be the fact that she had forsaken herself. Intellectually reduced and humbled, morally gutted, inwardly torn apart by her deep mistrust of her leaders and the mischief they have done her in these years, profoundly uneasy herself, ignorant of the future of course but full of forebodings of evil, she would go into war not in the condition of 1914 but, even physically, of 1917 or 1918. The 10 per cent of direct beneficiaries of the system—half even of them fallen away—would not be enough to win a war in which the majority of the rest would only see the opportunity of shaking off the shameful oppression that has weighed upon them so long—a war, that is, which after the first inevitable defeat would turn into a civil war.

No, this war is impossible; Germany cannot wage it; and if its dictators are in their senses, then their assurances of readiness for peace are not tactical lies repeated with a wink at their partisans; they spring from a faint-hearted perception of just this impossibility. But if war cannot and shall not be—then why these robbers and murderers? Why isolation, world hostility, lawlessness, intellectual interdict, cultural darkness, and every other evil? Why not rather Germany's voluntary return to the European system, her reconciliation with Europe, with all the inward accompaniments of freedom, justice, well-being, and human decency, and a jubilant welcome from the rest of the world? Why not? Only because a regime which, in word and deed, denies the rights of man, which wants above all else to remain in power, would stultify itself and be abolished if, since it cannot make war, it actually made peace! But is that a reason?

I had forgotten, Herr Dean, that I was still addressing you. Certainly I may console myself with the reflection that you long since ceased to read this letter, aghast at language which in Germany has long been unspoken, terrified because somebody dares use the German tongue with the ancient freedom. I have not spoken out of arrogant presumption, but out of a concern and a distress from which your usurpers did not release me when they decreed that I was no longer a German—a mental and spiritual distress from which for four years not an hour of my life has been free, and struggling with which I have had to accomplish my creative work day by day. The pressure was great. And a man who out of diffidence in religious matters will seldom either by tongue or pen let the name of the Deity escape him, yet in moments of deep emotion cannot refrain, let me—since after all one cannot say everything—close this letter with the brief and fervent prayer: God help our darkened and desecrated country and teach it to make its peace with the world and with itself!

THOMAS MANN

Kusnacht, Zurich, New Year's Day, 1937

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

J. Edgar Hoover

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

II

J. EDGAR HOOVER'S enormous success in building up the Federal Bureau of Investigation—and J. Edgar Hoover—with the seasoned methods of national publicity has not made him exactly popular with his colleagues in the subcabinet ranks of government service. Members of the older government detective agencies, particularly postal inspectors and Secret Service men, regard Hoover as an upstart, mulcting them of credit both for jobs they might have done and for work they actually have done.

These officers insist that Hoover's headline-stalking has delayed solution of some of the most spectacular of recent criminal cases and actually threatens to become a serious drag on law enforcement. They have words and music for their hymn of hate. They complain of the boss G-man's insistence upon announcing his achievements, and many of theirs, in Washington rather than on the scene, his tendency to talk too much while the chase is on, and his still more unfortunate propensity, once the capture has been made, for detailed description of the steps leading up to it. They even say that a smart criminal who wants to know how to avoid arrest need only follow Hoover's publicity trail.

Rival detectives may of course exaggerate the consequences of his garrulousness. They have been left at the post so often in the race to claim credit for a cooperative capture that they are embittered. There is no doubt that Hoover is faster on the draw—at least of the telephone. Moreover, it cannot be denied that he has surrounded himself with smart young men who often get results.

Hoover himself may not be a better cop than his competitors but he is certainly a better advertising man. Several comic strips portray the Sherlock Holmes cunning of the G-men. Semi-official sanction is claimed for the most popular of them, called "War on Crime," with continuity by a Washington newspaperman who has long been a friend of Hoover. At the top of each strip appears the legend, "True stories of G-men activities based on the records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation—modified in the public interest." It is exciting stuff about gun molls and their hoodlums, who are always outwitted by the Hoover boys.

Grisly radio programs with hair-raising sound effects are Hoover's second line of public offense. Their theme is that crime does not pay. They have a semi-official status and are likewise prepared by his journalistic friends. The vogue for G-men movies also had its day, but it seems to be passing. Courtney Ryley Cooper reaches the more literate segment of Hoover's public with his own books (the latest is "Here's to Crime") and with magazine articles, some of which are ghost-written for Hoover, some alleged to be the product of collaboration, and others frankly written by Cooper himself. Walter Winchell, another admirer, catches the not-so-literate with his frequent references to the G-men's exploits.

Thousands of tourists who visit Washington every year take in Hoover's chamber of horrors in the new building of the Department of Justice along with the cherry blossoms and the Smithsonian Institute. At the Hoover museum they may gaze with awe at the straw hat Dillinger wore on that last fateful day—it is preserved under glass—and at other significant trophies.

Hoover cultivates reporters and correspondents with nice discrimination. Those who play ball with him are rewarded with exclusive information when big news breaks. This appraisal, because it was destined for The Nation, had to be written without benefit of a personal interview. His attitude toward reporters, together with his practice of writing long letters of protest to newspaper editors who print articles uncomplimentary to the head of the F. B. I., has not contributed to Hoover's popularity with the bulk of the working press. Neither has the conviction of some newspapermen that Hoover has had them "tailed."

Hoover's flair for the dramatic shows itself in his shoot-to-kill orders. He has no sympathy for the "maudlin sentimentality" of those who would reform criminals or alter the conditions that produce them. He is a harsh critic of the parole system. The science of criminology, so far as Hoover is concerned, begins and ends in his F. B. I. laboratory, where blood stains and locks of hair can be analyzed. At a meeting of the International Association of Police Chiefs at Atlantic City in 1935, he spoke as follows:

Here at this meeting a criminal is understood to be a criminal, with a gun in his hand and murder in his heart. It is not necessary here, in discussing what shall be done with the human rat, to persuade some altruistic soul that he is not a victim of environment or circumstances or inhibitions or malformed consciousness, to be reformed by a few kind words, a pat on the cheek, and freedom at the earliest possible moment. . . .

Indeed, it would seem that such [criminal] enemies were numerous enough and deadly enough without the addition of an even vaster army of antagonists. But there are more, and they are the ones who today form the handicaps of all in the field of law enforcement. I refer to the sob-sisters, the intruders, the uninformed and misinformed know-it-alls, the sentimentalists, and the alleged criminologists who believe that the individual is greater than society, that if any criminal can display or simulate even the slightest evidence of ordinary conduct, then indeed he must be a persecuted being, entitled to be sent forth anew into the world to again rob and murder.

Hoover's speeches are revealing. In a more recent address before the Daughters of the American Revolution he betrayed his conviction that a large proportion of the people in the United States are criminals. The horrified Daughters, already a-twitter over the Communist who hides behind every lamp post, were solemnly assured that American criminals marching eight abreast could not get by their marble hall between sun-up and sun-down.

Hoover's attitude toward criminals should endear him to the police. Certainly it indicates that he leads no Boy Scout outfit even though his agents must be college graduates (most of them are lawyers) between twenty-five and thirty-five years of age. But there is a growing volume of evidence to the contrary. The reason is that he is constantly committing two sins which police cannot forgive: he talks too much; and he doesn't do right by stool pigeons.

Detective novels to the contrary, a stool pigeon is more valuable than a magnifying glass in the solution of crimes, particularly of crimes committed by gangs. The police, and Hoover is no exception, place principal reliance on squealers, not clues, when looking for an underworld character. Consequently the stool pigeon is carefully protected by city departments and most government agencies. But Hoover must let the world know after a crime has been solved how it was done. While he does not name the informer, he often comes close enough to cast suspicion on the right man, thus destroying the future usefulness of the talker.

The Dillinger affair is cited by Hoover's critics as a case in point. There can be little doubt that Mrs. Anna Sage, the woman in red who walked out of the Biograph Theater in Chicago at Dillinger's side but stepped back soon enough to get out of the line of fire, was the tipster responsible for his death, and that detective Marc Zarovich of East Chicago was the man who set the trap. Mrs. Sage has said that Melvin Purvis, head of the Chicago G-men bureau at the time of Dillinger's shooting, promised her immunity from deportation in exchange for her help in the biggest of F. B. I. coups. Whether he did or did not, she was deported.

Although Hoover made the announcement of Dillinger's execution and got full credit for it, one of the ablest crime reporters in the country, who covered the search and later the flamboyant obsequies, said in an article written for a newspaper chain in 1935 that the G-men were "more to be censured than praised." Even then, he wrote, there was a conspicuous lack of cooperation between the F. B. I. and other agencies hunting the outlaw. He recounted four instances of "poor police work" by Hoover's men in connection with Dillinger's many escapes. On one occasion, he reported, armed G-men and Indiana state police almost shot it out between themselves, each mistaking the other for the Dillinger mob because the G-men failed to notify state authorities of their presence in the area of operation.

The feud between the F. B. I. and the Secret Service was brought into the open last year, also in connection with the Dillinger hunt. The details have never been entirely clear, but it is known that Middle Western operatives of the Secret Service took it upon themselves, with or without prompting from Washington, to check up on circumstances surrounding the deaths of the Indiana desperado and Eddie Green, one of his less prominent henchmen, who was shot by G-men in a raid on his St. Paul apartment. The T-men—the Secret Service is under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department—believed that both bandits could easily have been captured alive had the G-men wanted to bring them in walking.

Getting wind of the investigation, Hoover ran to his favorite newspaper with the story and demanded punishment of the Secret Service men responsible. He was backed up by Cummings. Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, to whom Hoover is a source of constant annoyance, reluctantly set down Joseph Murphy, then second in command to William H. Moran, veteran chief of the Secret Service, and Grady L. Boatwright, agent in charge at St. Paul. A few months later Morgenthau restored Murphy to his old job.

Hoover's vindictiveness not only sent the two Secret Service men to exile in outlying precincts but cost them temporary salary reductions—which hurt more. Whereas Hoover draws $10,000 a year, the chief of the Secret Service gets only $8,000 and Kilroy P. Aldrich, able head of the Post Office inspectors, $7,000. There is a like disparity between the pay of rank-and-file G-men and operatives of the other agencies.

Both the Post Office inspectors' service and the Secret Service claim to have been undercut repeatedly by Hoover. In scores of cases, they say, their men have built up the evidence and located the criminals only to have the F. B. I. step in for the kill and the credit.

On at least one occasion the Treasury men, according to their story, ran the victim to the ground and captured him unassisted but still couldn't beat Hoover to the newspapers. Victor (the Count) Lustig, a notorious counterfeiter, was captured by the Secret Service and turned over to the Justice Department for incarceration in its New York detention quarters. Lustig escaped. Again he was trailed by the Treasury operatives, this time to a hide-out near Pittsburgh. T-men solicited help from G-men in making the raid, but the latter were slow in starting. On their way out they met the Secret Service party coming back. The Count was already in gyves. The G-men, following standing instructions, immediately re-reported the capture to their chief, who announced it to the press without mention of the Treasury.

City police, like the federal agencies, are thoroughly fed up with Hoover's telephonitis. When Harry Brunette, a small-time hoodlum charged with kidnapping a New Jersey state policeman, was cornered in an apartment in West 102d Street in New York City, G-men, with Hoover personally in command, literally smoked him out, setting fire to the building. The G-men also gave New York an exciting demonstration of machine-gunning, in which Brunette's girl friend was wounded. Police Commissioner Lewis J. Valentine, who up to that time had been tolerant of Hoover's theatricals despite several previous run-ins with the F. B. I., made public a letter accusing the federal forces of needless shooting. Hoover was further accused of violating an agreement by starting the raid without notifying the New York police. According to the police, arrangements had been made to keep the apartment under surveillance until Brunette's accomplice in the kidnapping could be trapped with him. It appears that the two city detectives assigned to the vigil were out getting a cup of coffee when Hoover ordered the raid. Hoover denied everything; and Cummings was "not interested in the matters about which small minds dispute."

Such conflicts, whoever is at fault, make for lack of cooperation between federal and local law-enforcement agencies. They are occurring with increasing frequency, and almost every big case of the last two years has brought on a postmortem quarrel. Hoover has accused Post Office inspectors of withholding information and getting in the way. The police forces of Chicago, St. Paul, Salt Lake City, New Orleans, and Seattle as well as New York have complained of Hoover.

Friction between Seattle officials and the F. B. I. over the Mattson case has generated so much heat that there remains only a thin pretense of collaboration. Ironically, the Lindbergh case, which started the ground swell of public revulsion that carried Hoover to his present peak, actually was solved by Treasury agents and local officials. It was Frank Wilson, new chief of the Secret Service, who devised the elaborate system of checking the numbers on ransom notes that finally tripped Bruno Richard Hauptmann. Lindbergh himself wanted the G-men taken off the case.

For the benefit of his more squeamish admirers Hoover professes to be shocked at the notion that he has ever designated a Public Enemy Number 1 or ordered his agents to bring a criminal in dead. But after Pretty Boy Floyd was shot down by G-men in 1934, Hoover remarked that he was "just a yellow rat who needed extermination" and announced that Baby Face Nelson was "next in line." "Of course we admit some sentiment in the matter," a Washington reporter quoted Hoover at the time. "When one of these yellow curs kills one of our men, we are going to get him and will never stop until we do. That was one of the things we had against Floyd, which caused him to be referred to as Public Enemy Number 1. By that standard, the title will pass to Baby Face Nelson . . . we hope to get him soon." Baby Face Nelson was shot to death some time later—at the cost of two G-men's lives.

[The first part of Mr. Crawford's article appeared last week.]

Forty Acres and a Mule

BY WILLIAM R. AMBERSON

WITH President Roosevelt's appointment of a Special Committee on Farm Tenancy* national interest in the plight of our agricultural laborers, particularly in the South, reached a climax. Three years of unprecedented publicity had lifted these humble workers to the center of the national stage. Yet at the very moment when concern about their plight appears to be at a maximum there is grave danger that the American people may fail again, as they failed once before, to understand the basic factors in the Southern agrarian problem and to find a fundamental solution.

If history teaches anything about the tenancy problem, it is that in our present economic system, with its business cycle and its rapacious middlemen, the small independent farmer cannot maintain himself and tends to disappear. The newer and richer the land the more rapid is this trend. The land passes into the control of fewer and fewer owners, with banks and insurance companies assuming an ever more important role as land operators. In each new farming community tenancy shortly engulfs a major fraction of the population. It soon becomes not only the most prominent economic and legal aspect of rural social structure but a most unwholesome psychological state, demoralizing both landlord and tenant.

There are many factors which contribute to this social disease. We will mention only one. Forty acres of good rich land are enough to maintain any family in normal years. But some years are not normal. And the mule, traditionally supposed to be attached to each sixteenth part of a section, is an uncertain quantity. Rain or drought, he must be fed. He sickens and dies. At his best he furnishes just one mule-power, and under the stress of modern competitive conditions this is not enough. The big planter across the road, with his tractor and four-row equipment and his superior credit facilities, cultivates his cotton for $5 an acre, while the mule, dragging a half-row plow, runs the bill up to over $14 (by actual experimental tests at the Stoneville Experiment Station). Sooner or later a crop failure sweeps away the little man's reserves, and the planter forecloses a mortgage on his land given two years before to raise money for the doctor who brought the last baby into the world. The next year the little man is a tenant on the big farm, which now includes his own former acres.

So tenants are made and so they will continue to be made, as surely as God makes little green apples and cotton bolls, unless we, as a nation, do some deep and serious thinking and some wise and careful planning. Yet with distressing frequency amateur theorists in this field miss the lesson of our fable and turn backward toward the frontier tradition. Once all men were little men, and the mule was a great improvement over hoeing by hand. In those days all men were free and equal. Therefore, runs the argument, let us return to that Golden Age of the Republic, and dole out little homesteads to all the needy people.

* The Committee's report and President Roosevelt's recommendations in regard to farm tenancy are discussed editorially on page 257 of this issue.

Such theorists neglect several stubborn facts. In the first place, the frontier is gone. It is gone not only horizontally but vertically. The days are over when it is cheaper to move than to control soil erosion. Even now men are retreating from much of our former tilled acreage, as wind and rain strip away the precious top soil of badly managed land. Rural poverty, on most soils, is reached in twelve vertical inches. A good half of our present farms are useless or in serious jeopardy. Good land is hard to get; no surplus remains.

In the second place, the big planter across the road is a stubborn fact. His trucks and tractors enable him to raise his crops much more efficiently than can the little man. He has his rights under the law, and if he is big enough he can modify and change the law, or even rewrite it closer to his heart's desire—and economic interest. He has no wish to sell out and move to town, at least not now when prices are on the up and up, and governmental benefits swell his more direct profits. He is sorry for the little man. But business is business, and the best—that is, the biggest—man wins. It is the law of the system.

On both counts the road back to the Golden Age becomes very steep and rocky indeed. Where is the country to which our distressed millions shall go for land? Submarginal lands, torn and gutted by a century of misuse, can of course be purchased by the square mile for a few dollars an acre. The government has recently purchased millions of such acres and is putting them back to forest and pasture, where they belong. Such country can support a sparse population—perhaps as many people as live there now. But rural rehabilitation cannot be accomplished in this manner.

We may as well face the fact that, by some device, tenants and croppers in order to become owners must, by and large, get possession of the good land which they now till. They cannot be moved from their present acreage en masse to hillside havens or fertile jungles, leaving the planter and his sons disconsolate behind to run all the tractors and pick all the cotton.

There is much pious talk now, even in landlord circles, about the plight of the share-cropper and the necessity for his redemption. Each landlord hopes that the other fellow's tenants will be given their chance in life. His own tenants, of course, are relatively well off, and no change in their status is necessary. He will try to allow his people an extra half-cent a pound on their cotton next year, and perhaps cut the commissary charge to fifteen cents on the dollar. But no union monkey business!

Listen to the Delta Chamber of Commerce:

The program of financial assistance should be carefully drawn with a view to helping the ambitious, thrifty, industrious individual to help himself, rather than a general bestowal of gratuities on persons who, although needy and deserving help, lack the above-mentioned qualities so necessary if they are successfully to manage and operate their own farm business.

It is as futile to expect the majority of our agricultural workers to own their own farms as to expect most of the clerks to own their own stores or industrial workers their factories.

The setting up of government-owned and operated farms for (the majority of) such workers, no matter whether the title to the land be vested in the government or the individual, is unsound and un-American, and is peonage of the worst sort.

It puts the government, in fact, directly and definitely into the private business of farming in direct competition with its own tax-paying farm citizens. It cannot be tolerated in a democratic government if that government is to survive.

Democracy thus receives a new definition, which unfortunately, most of America will unthinkingly accept. These statements are typical of the confusion of thought in which the present plans for new tenancy legislation are being drawn. The masters of America are in no mood for a vigorous attack upon this problem. At best they are only willing to operate around the edges, rescuing selected groups here and there. To date government has done no more than this, but it is already meeting stout resistance. What would be the outcry if it should move to cut out the cancer, retire the present landlords, take over the plantations, and present the people with convenient fragments of the great estates, or, alternatively, hold them intact and run them in the people's interest under staffs of socially minded experts?

Such an operation would outrage every conviction of our inherited individualism. Moreover, it would assume colossal financial dimensions. Good cotton land brings from $30 to $100 an acre. To give 1,000,000 tenant and cropper families their forty acres and a mule would cost the nation not less than $2,000,000,000, and an equal sum would have to go into new housing, equipment, and furnishings. The experience of the Resettlement Administration and the estimates of other experts agree that the average cost of such rehabilitation would run between $4,000 and $5,000 per family, on the present market. No figures are yet available showing the average cost for a completely cooperative project. It would almost certainly be considerably less. In the first year of operation the cost on the Delta Cooperative Farm has run about $1,000 per family, including full payment on the land. Its equipment, however, is far from complete, and its housing is purely temporary. Moreover, much of its land remains to be cleared.

To wipe out all tenancy in America on the individualistic basis would require at least $12,000,000,000, and more probably $15,000,000,000, that is, half of the total value of our present farms. It requires no gift of prophesy to assert that nothing like this is going to be done. The rulers of America are not prepared to pay any such price to recapture the vanished benefits of an alleged Golden Age. Even if the operation could be carried out, we should have no assurance that a final stability had been attained.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

The same forces which have made tenants in the past would continue to operate.

In one respect the gentlemen of the Delta Chamber of Commerce are entirely correct. The majority of Southern rural workers are not ready for land ownership. We have to do here with the human wreckage of an iniquitous century-old social system in a land which never knew the wholesome frontier life of other regions. For five generations these people have been habituated to the present economic mode. We are here dealing with a vast rural population of no fewer than five million whites and three million Negroes who are so thoroughly demoralized, so ignorant and irresponsible, so dirty, ragged, and diseased, that one may well doubt whether they can ever be reclaimed. Most of these people have never owned land, or they lost it three generations back.

Even when they try to get it they face almost certain defeat. I have been watching the pathetic efforts of some of these poor families to "donate" a small patch of state land. They pay a small fee and get a dubious title. Again and again they fall into debt for their food and see the land which they have painstakingly cleared go to another. I know one colored man who has started three times to win his own farm by this route. Each time he has lost out after years of labor. The last time his own lawyer connived with his exploiter to "sell him down the river." He has just been evicted from the last soil which he thought to call his own.

We are powerfully moved, therefore, to the conclusion that such fragmentation of the plantation as is now being widely proposed would be a blunder of the first magnitude. Whether we begin our argument with an emphasis on technical efficiency or start with an appreciation of the low culture of these laboring masses, we arrive at the same conclusion. Large-scale cooperative farming ventures are in this region the only hope for the majority. The efficiency of the large plantation must be retained and increased, not destroyed. These confused folk must be brought together into new types of village communities. The light of a vigorous educational program must illumine these darkened lives. Adequate medical services must rescue them from their chronic sickness. They must learn together to build a new hope and faith under socially minded leaders of their own region. This is the "middle way" for the agricultural South, steering between plantation exploitation on the one hand and the inefficiency of the small homestead on the other. Even the Chamber of Commerce gives guarded consideration to such a program. Its confusion of thought, however, persists. "The average large Delta farm is a privately owned and operated cooperative, with the tenants enjoying a sizable percentage of the returns." Shades of the Rochdale pioneers!

These people can rise again. The racial stocks are basically sound. Future hope for this great community shines out from the bright eyes of its children, not yet dimmed by the privations of adult life. Human material fit for a higher destiny lives in these shacks and hovels. But it is raw and untutored—an easy prey to the greed and prejudice which cannot soon be banished from this scene.

The Resettlement Administration has had much preliminary experience with these deep-rooted habits of the cotton belt. Administrative difficulties have embarrassed the program. High administrative costs at the top have not been matched by new efficiency at the bottom. The ghost of states' rights haunts the work, preventing strong federal control. The idealism of Washington is often highly diluted in the field. Local administrators are frequently plantation owners who run the government farms much as they have always run their own lands. The commissary racket may still flourish on the side. Government checks have been held up for months, forcing the people back upon the old credit system with its inflated charges. Families may still be evicted without settlement of their accounts, because of union affiliation or as part of a definite local scheme of exploitation. The people remain perplexed and distrustful, confused by frequent changes in policy and personnel. Here and there a socially minded director is making history.

Many students of this problem view with dismay any proposal to shift Resettlement activities back to the Department of Agriculture, directly or indirectly. The department has never shown any will to grapple with the problems of the rural under-dog. Its programs have been written by landlords for landlords. Its whole organization is tied in with the land-owning class. By and large it has no comprehension of, or sympathy for, the tenant and cropper. The department's contribution to technology has been superb, but it is not a sociological instrument, and it should not be asked to become one. A strengthened and reorganized Resettlement Administration, fully devoted to the interests of the present landless class, is the only answer.

Years must pass before any appreciable change in the situation can be effected. Let us not delude ourselves into thinking that by the present gestures we are solving the problem of tenancy. Tenants are being made faster than any program so far proposed can liquidate them. Let us recognize that the next few years are an experimental period in which we are hammering out new models for rural life. This time we must not fail.

More and more Resettlement and Rural Rehabilitation, its smaller twin, have embraced the cooperative ideal. They are issuing excellent material on cooperative technique. That technique, particularly on the production side, is difficult indeed. It is all the more difficult because America has so few precedents for it in its own economic history. Group ownership of land presents new legal, as well as new psychological, problems. For the various projects a corps of devoted and highly trained administrators must be found. By trial and error we must drive through to successful patterns valid for the American community. In the last analysis a cooperative farm will find its proper milieu only in a cooperative commonwealth.

In 1865 there was much talk about forty acres and a mule for the freedmen. No one meant it then. Few really mean it now. Even fewer realize its inadequacy, in this land and time. At best it was a poor slogan. Dixie's millions wait for a new plan and a new leadership which will really take them to their Promised Land.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Haiti, 1937

Port-au-Prince, February 7

IT WAS on August 7, 1934, that the usurping United States flag was finally hauled down and the Haitian hoisted in the city of Port-au-Prince. Three years previous the departments of public works, public health, agriculture, and industrial education had been turned over to their rightful managers, the Haitians. But this formal end of American rule, save for the financial control still exercised by the American fiscal representative in the interest of American bondholders, meant the beginning of a new epoch in Haitian history.

How are things going? Can the Haitians go it alone? Have they profited by the American occupation? Is it going to be the same old story of mismanagement, waste, corruption, and turbulence? These questions are of thrilling import when one recalls that this is the greatest experiment in self-government by colored men in all the world; that Haiti is the second oldest republic in this hemisphere; that the 3,000,000 men and women who live here are descendants of the black men who, unaided, threw off the yoke of slavery and defeated in succession the picked troops of England, France, and Spain.

Two and one-half years of walking alone are hardly a conclusive test, especially when the Haitians have not had control of their national finances. But the average American resident here believes that the country is off to a good material start and that the old conditions are not likely to recur. The American occupation did a poorer job here than in Santo Domingo. But the marines did accomplish certain things. They taught the Haitians the necessity of organization. They imbued them with a great concern for public hygiene and sanitation, though this work would be far more efficient today if the Haitians had been allowed a greater measure of collaboration in the days of American rule. They built some roads—not many—and demonstrated that good roads are the key to advancement in every phase of the national life. And they ordered well the public finances.

But there the list of American achievements just about ends. There was no vision, no building for the future. The usurpers were naval officers, not trained civilian administrators, and they knew that they were not there to stay. They built a material but not a moral order. As Dantès Bellegarde has put it: "Unfortunately they did not know how to establish moral order; that is to say, the peace assured by respect for law and its observance, imposed on all citizens alike. The American heads displayed an absolute contempt for lawful procedure. They overturned constitutions and laws which annoyed them and had constitutions and laws drawn up which could serve their own interests, without regard for public morality." If this was understandable in view of the American disrespect for law at home, it set an evil example abroad, one which, as we shall see, has already borne evil fruit.

When the American flag came down, Haiti was in the grip of the world depression, and even today it must meet all its expenses, including the debt service, from a revenue of only $6,500,000. As President Vincent put it to me: "In a hundred years our population has trebled and our national budget has remained the same." What is more, only a small proportion of the $8,000,000 debt which burdens the country was actually used for public works or public enterprises, and so Haiti, beginning its new career, prays that the world price of coffee—coffee constitutes 80 per cent of its exports—will rise, since Haiti lives on export and import duties. This is obviously a mistaken economic policy, but one that cannot be avoided when real-estate, personal, and income taxes cannot be imposed. Under the new treaty with the United States negotiated by Secretary Hull, Haiti has the assurance that no tariff duties will be levied on its principal exports in the United States market. But Haitian coffee has not a wide American market, and the government must make every effort to seek new outlets for its chief crop. Moreover, Haiti is the victim of a shipping conspiracy which actually makes it cost about 35 per cent more to ship an automobile from New York to Port-au-Prince than from San Francisco to Shanghai.

These touching, law-abiding, patient, and uncomplaining black people, who are bringing multitudes of babies into the world, need everything. No one starves to death in Haiti, for the rich soil produces enough fruit to keep body and soul together, but the laborers are often weak for lack of properly nourishing food. Beyond shelter, the simplest of garments, a mat or bed to sleep on, the bulk of the people have nothing whatever. Their densely populated soil (103 persons to the square kilometer, contrasted with 73 in France and 14 in the United States) is not studded by many villages or towns. Each family lives by itself, or with a couple of neighbors, in its banana or coffee patch, as remote from the culture and life of the modern world as are the tribes in the heart of Africa. As one sees these people in never-ending parade on their few roads, the great majority of the pilgrims being women walking with their burdens on their heads or riding on their little donkeys, one has the feeling that the scene is just about like Palestine in the Biblical ages. Certainly the wages go back that far, for the prevailing rate paid by the government on its public works is only 30 cents a day. The average servant in the towns earns from $4 to $10 a month.

But the desire for progress is here. The people want a modern state, and already there are signs of returning prosperity. Fully 1,000 houses have been built in and about Port-au-Prince in the last two years, charming flower-embowered homes perched on the hillsides, contrasting painfully with the hovels of the poor. The thirst for education is apparent too, for in almost every street there are schools, public and private, high schools and church schools, one after the other. There is a fine new orphanage, sponsored by the President; there is a reform school for boys, whose active director tells you that many of his wards are the offspring of members of the American occupation force. There is a new national museum building. But the Port-au-Prince hospital of which the authorities are so proud is starved for lack of funds, as is the health service everywhere. And if the capital has its dark spots, the other cities I saw were even more depressing. There are many ruins of houses at Cap Haitien; and Fort Liberté, once so thriving, is now, owing to earthquakes and other forces, a wreck that recalls the war-devastated French villages.

But after all it is the presiding head of a government which usually gives that government its direction and force and influences the observer's judgment of what the real promise of the immediate future is. The ruler of Haiti is Sténio Vincent. The name recalls a day in 1921 when he, Pauleus Sannon, Perceval Thoby, Pierre Hudicourt, and one other arrived at the offices of The Nation to ask for aid in freeing Haiti from American control. None of us imagined that within nine years one of that group would be the head of the Haitian Republic. President Vincent is a man of high education, genuine culture, great dignity, and quiet demeanor. He is a fine speaker with none of the volubility or excitability of the Latin. He is socially minded, public-spirited, and so genuinely eager to improve social conditions in Haiti that he gives freely out of his own pocket—as in constructing some model two-room houses in what Port-au-Prince calls the "Cité Vincent." His integrity is beyond question. Yet the fact remains that President Vincent is a dictator, however benign. For he has breached the constitution, overriding it by a plebiscite which everybody admits was fraudulent and thereby doing away with the Presidential election of 1936 and seating himself for a second term. He holds the press in the hollow of his hand; indeed, it is the general belief that the newspapers have another source of revenue than advertising, subscriptions, and sales. All newspapers are licensed, and licenses are not granted to those which the dictator does not wish to be published. No meeting, not even a religious one, can be held without a permit from the military authorities, and there are in prison in Cap Haitien some seventeen men arrested a year ago simply, so they insist, for criticizing some of the President's policies. They have never been brought into court, but there they are. Is it any wonder that the old liberal group with whom President Vincent was affiliated in the fight for Haitian independence looks upon him much as did American liberals upon Woodrow Wilson after he had changed from the progressive leader of 1912 into the reactionary and autocratic war-time President?

But if this Haitian group is dismayed and disheartened, it has not the slightest intention of opposing the President. They scoff at any talk of a revolt even if peaceable criticism and opposition are denied, and they are sincere in their desire to have their old friend become a successful, wise, and farsighted President. They would dread and oppose any revolution, for they wish beyond all else that there shall be no more foreign occupations. But they hold to their old democratic ideals and their faith in the ability of the Haitian people to govern themselves well, despite their backwardness, superstition, and illiteracy.

Those who speak for the President declare that pure democracy will be impossible until the people are educated—for years and years; that the President had to be made supreme over the national legislature because a minority blocked legislation which the Executive "had to have." They claim, like Hitler, that the plebiscite was a "legal" measure since the constitution came originally from the people and the people therefore had a right to amend it—they say nothing about the corruption which accompanied the vote. They defend the suppression of the press because, they say, "our journalists are not like yours," and they denounce their newspapermen as vindictive, libelous, utterly irresponsible, shameless in their personal attacks—just such language as I have heard applied to William Randolph Hearst and many another American journalist; could any Haitian journalist be worse than were the Bonfils brothers of Denver? The answer is, of course, neither licensing, nor suppression, nor purchase. There are libel laws in Haiti and doubtless laws against slander as well. The remedy is to turn to the courts for aid, not to destroy the profession. Haiti, like any other country, needs intelligent free discussion of its innumerable grave problems, and its present ruler ought to be just as ready to pay the price of personal abuse and misrepresentation as were George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. It was Sténio Vincent himself who on one occasion said: "Where are the keen intellectual frays of former times, the discussions—admittedly violent at times, but more interesting than the atrocious silence which has been imposed [by the American naval officers] on the citizenry?" Today it is the author of these words who enforces upon his countrymen an "atrocious silence."

The President's distrust of his people goes so far that he is the most heavily guarded ruler I have seen in all my travels. If he goes to the country club, the road leading out there has its sentries; at least fifty men guard the clubhouse, and he arrives surrounded by ten or twelve officers. Yet I am sure that he needs no more guards than does President Roosevelt. I certainly heard no criticism of him that would lead me to believe he need fear an attack upon his life or his government. At any rate there is not the slightest danger of revolution as long as the standing army of 2,800 men which he maintains to police the country is loyal to him.

[The second part of Mr. Villard's article on Haiti will appear next week. In succeeding issues he will describe conditions in the Dominican Republic and Puerto Rico.]

BROUN'S PAGE

Those Liberals Again

WALTER LIPPMANN, the columnist, has hit upon one device which is useful to the members of his craft. Quite often during the appropriate season he is called upon to deliver a baccalaureate sermon, and on such occasions he uses the speech as his newspaper piece for the next day. If it's good enough for Walter, it ought to be good enough for me.

I want to submit not a sermon but a short speech which I made before a dinner of the Lawyers' Guild in Washington. That is, if I can remember it. I have the excuse that none of it was printed and that by the time I got around to making it, midnight had already struck and most of the diners very sensibly had gone home. But here goes:

Mr. Toastmaster and fellow trade unionists: I want to do the finish of my speech first and then stop. I want to talk about the proposals of the President in regard to the Supreme Court. I'm in favor of them. I do not think they solve the fundamental issues. It is even possible that the approach was a mistake. But that is all water under the bridge by now. I'm not an idolater of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. At times, whether he knows it or not, I've disagreed with him violently. But I want to look at the problem as it lies before us here and now.

It has been said that the President is certain to win. I'm not so sure. In any case he has a tough fight on his hands. If he is defeated, it will be because of the liberals who oppose him. Those are the people who worry me. Naturally, I expected to hear that Bishop Manning was in opposition. A friend of mine who doesn't get time to keep up with the newspapers completely tells me that he has invented a very simple and effective system for himself. Whenever Bishop Manning comes out against anything, he is violently for it. He says that so far the system is 100 per cent perfect. It may be hard to put anything on top of that, but in the case of the President's proposals Bishop Manning and A. Lawrence Lowell came out against Roosevelt's plan on the same day. To me that ought to make the case for support 150 per cent.

But I am talking about liberals. That is a little difficult. I've never quite understood what a liberal is—or maybe was would be a better word. Of course, I know that Walter Lippmann is a liberal, but some very curious liberals are coming up out of the cracks just now. I'm always surprised when I read the statements of Amos Pinchot, who invariably refers to himself as a liberal. There ought to be a law. But there isn't. And yet I was still more startled to look at the editorial page of the Herald Tribune and find a communication under the caption "A Liberal's View of the Controversy" which was signed John Spargo. If John Spargo is a liberal, then I'm Pierce Butler.

But I want to be fair, within reason. There are true and honest liberals who have taken the rap and borne the heat of the day. And some of these same veterans are muddying the water right now by declaring that they are going to oppose the President's proposal because it doesn't go far enough. I say that it is absolutely necessary to get over the first hurdle before tackling the second. And it seems to me that it would be tragic if men who want no amendment at all and are determined to preserve the status quo manage to defeat Roosevelt by fooling liberals who want to go farther and faster. Of course, I admit the sincerity of the true liberals, but in the present situation I feel impelled to say, "To hell with their sincerity. Damn their stupidity."

I have no desire to be dogmatic about the present political situation. I'm not a political expert. I once ran for Congress on the Socialist ticket, and along about the middle of the campaign I actually got to believe that I might be elected. That turned out to be wrong by about 35,000 votes.

I am not an expert. But I come here to make a report based on what seems to me expert opinion. During the last few weeks I've been coming down to Washington every other day. And I've made it my business to talk to newspapermen in the bar of the National Press Club. I've talked to newspapermen wholly off the record. Almost all these conversations have been limited to the political, which is another word for realistic, aspects of the present situation. I was trying to find out just one thing. I put this question over and over again to men who have been on the "Hill" and around it for many years. I said, "If the proposals of the President are licked, what chance will any amendment have?" And without a dissenting voice, everybody answered, "If Roosevelt is licked in this fight, or if he is forced to compromise deeply, any man in politics who has an amendment can take it up an alley and whistle. Nobody would pay any attention. The political judgment of Washington and of the public will be that the court and the Constitution are dynamite. Nobody will dare to touch the issue for another ten years."

I think these men are right. The consensus of the Washington reporters has always been correct. And so there's your issue. Unless you are for the maintenance of the status quo, you ought to support Roosevelt whether you think his proposals go far enough or not. Armageddon is not just around the corner. We're standing there now. On which side are you going to fight? Are you going to fight standing beside Bishop Manning, A. Lawrence Lowell, the Herald Tribune, the Liberty League, and William Randolph Hearst? Make up your mind.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

INTERPRETING SHAKESPEARE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

OUR popular audience, it appears, is about to re-discover the plays of Shakespeare on the stage. That is one illustration of the fact that common-places about Shakespeare's "universality" are true in a wider sense than such sweeping statements usually are in connection with any other great writer. Homer, Dante, Milton, and the rest are not really "universal" to anything like the same extent. They are not capable of interesting one-quarter as many people, and one is tempted sometimes to believe that there was actually some truth in the contention of those romantic critics who held that Shakespeare was not merely the greatest of writers but in some superhuman way completely sui generis, or, as one of them put it, not a dramatist but a fact of nature.

Another indication of his supremacy may be found in the fact that no other man seems to have the power of inspiring so much genuinely fruitful scholarship and genuinely interesting criticism. All the great writers are the subject of more or less continuous study and investigation, particularly in universities, and much of it is routine and perfunctory. But Shakespeare criticism and technical Shakespeare scholarship continue somehow to be really fruitful. If some of the issues are dead, others seem always arising to take their places; and erudition becomes not dusty but living.

Illustration of this fact may be found in the 388 pages of an anthology called "Shakespeare Criticism, 1919-35,"* which has been edited by Ann Bradby. Except for the fact that it contains nothing from the books of Dover Wilson, it seems to be a very representative collection and at first sight to illustrate every conceivable approach. Methods range from the statistical in Caroline Spurgeon's "Leading Motives in the Imagery of Shakespeare's Tragedies" to the quasi-impressionistic in G. Wilson Knight's "The Othello Music." There are textual studies like W. W. Greg's "Principles of Emendation in Shakespeare," antiquarian notes like J. Isaacs's "Shakespeare as a Man of the Theater," and there are also more purely literary studies ranging in attitude all the way from that of E. E. Stoll, aggressive champion of those who find merely artifice and convention where others discover almost indescribable subtlety, to that of Granville-Barker, who makes the more usual assumption that though we may read wrong things into the text, we are not likely ever to be more subtle than Shakespeare himself.

Yet for all the heterogeneity of the collection there is a kind of unity. For one thing it is amazing how many of these widely divergent methods and attitudes can produce genuinely relevant results. For another there is the fact that at any given epoch the tendency is for critics and scholars to unite in making certain basic assumptions. Nineteenth-century critics revolted against the formalism of the eighteenth century, while critics of the twentieth are conspicuously less inclined than those of the preceding age to indulge in the merely rhapsodic. They are predominantly analytical even though both the subjects and the methods of analysis are extremely diverse. Broadly speaking, they may be divided into two groups—those who work from the outside in and those who work from the inside out. One group, that is to say, is concerned with history, with the methods of staging plays or printing books, with Elizabethan convictions and interests and fashions, attempting to illuminate Shakespeare by means of the light thrown from things outside him. The other group is more concerned with what he himself says, with significances and meanings which are absolute in the sense that they are independent of their local habitation and name. Yet the two groups are by no means working either at cross purposes or in isolation. They check and correct each other. They are, besides, alike in being, as I said before, rather analytic than rhapsodical. Even the critic least concerned with the antiquarian or the historical keeps his eye on his object—namely, the details of the plays themselves. No criticism could ever dare as little to be in any sense irresponsible because no other criticism was ever itself subject to criticism so watchful and informed.

One may wonder how, if this is true, it is still possible to say so many different things about Shakespeare, all of which seem possibly illuminating and possibly true. There are a dozen different Shakespeares in the minds of different men, and it may seem odd that where so much is known there should still be room for so much divergence of opinion. Indeed, in a biting and witty essay T. S. Eliot speaks sarcastically of the fact when he introduces a serious discussion of the influence of Seneca with the following remarks: "I propose it largely because I believe that after the Montaigne Shakespeare . . . and after the Machiavelli Shakespeare, a stoical or Senecan Shakespeare is almost certain to be produced. I merely wish to disinfect the Senecan Shakespeare before he appears."

The explanation lies, I think, in a fact which Mr. Eliot himself, not alone of course, stresses—the fact, namely, that of all great writers Shakespeare is probably the most completely dramatic in that he was more often and more exclusively than any other interested in realizing and presenting a character, an idea, or an emotion without offering any comment upon it from outside that character or from the vantage-point of any other idea or emotion. Very divergent interpretations of his work are tenable for much the same reason that very divergent interpretations of "life" are equally tenable, for the reason, that is to say, that none or any of them may be "true" because they are all alike based upon assumptions belonging in categories not recognized in either "life" or Shakespeare's plays. And if to say this seems to approach dangerously close to the conception of Shakespeare as a "fact of nature," I can only say that I think that exaggeration less far from the truth than the opposite exaggeration, which consists in thinking of him as a teacher or a philosopher, and which reaches its ultimate absurdity in the attempt to represent him by opinions and sentiments torn from the plays. Has it ever been pointed out that the two copy-book maxims most often cited were spoken, the first by a dotard and the second by a hypocrite? It was Polonius who said, "To thine own self be true," and Iago who declared, "Who steals my purse steals trash."

* The World's Classics, Oxford University Press. 80 cents.

Love Poem

BY REUEL DENNEY

Let's go and leave this argument
Now midnight says to put away
All bitching at our civic crimes
And what the politicians say.

It isn't that I'm careless of it;
Disgusted or in sweating terror
I too have waked in middle night
At what we sometimes live and die for.

I've thought about what men can make;
How some can roll a rustless steel
Or tell from wheat its native soil.
That power makes me also sing.

When all that's left of afternoon
Dies on a steep hill stone by stone
And summitward diminishes,
I have been sad as anyone

At what our children's sons may say
About our shabby dividend
Of wisdom in a formula
And wreck of states we cannot mend.

I too say that it's wonderful
How after a hundred violent springs
A man's endeavor still is known,
Returning, like that bird who sings

Each June upon the corner elm,
With notes identically new.
But here's a serious citizen
Who'll happily lie down with you.

NEW VICTOR
HIGHER FIDELITY RECORDING

Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Serge Koussevitzky

A RECORDING of special interest because of the popularity of the recent book on Tschaikowsky, "Beloved Friend." In this symphony, Tschaikowsky's greatest characteristics reach their peak... his deeply colored mood, his profound mastery of the orchestra, his deft command of intricate contrapuntal melodies. Of all Tschaikowsky's symphonies, this is the one in which light triumphs over darkness, joyousness and optimism over melancholy and despair.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducts this work with a deep emotional sympathy that sensitively defines every mood, every shift of emphasis and color. And the Victor Higher Fidelity process has perfectly captured it... to live again and again for you whenever this album is played. Price $10.00

RCA presents the Metropolitan Opera every Saturday afternoon. And "Magic Key of RCA" every Sunday 2 to 3 P. M., E. S. T. Both on NBC Blue Network.

VICTOR
RECORDS
HIGHER FIDELITY

A SERVICE OF THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

WITH THE SPEED OF LIGHT

BECAUSE Elias Howe could not tell enough people, quickly, about the benefits of his invention, the women of a whole generation were deprived of the sewing machine, and wearily continued their toil with thread and needle.

Today, with the speed of light, the story of new methods and new products is carried to a million homes. The time between invention and utilization is shortened amazingly.

Sometimes we say it with music—as in THE HOUR OF CHARM, which presents, at four o'clock every Monday afternoon, the unusual entertainment of Phil Spitalny's ALL-GIRL SINGING ORCHESTRA. We also tell how electric servants for the home can bring benefits not attainable in any other way.

Increased demand and new and better designs and manufacturing methods have both lowered costs and improved quality. More and better products, selling at lower prices, have been placed within the reach of more people. This means less drudgery in an increasing number of homes—more freedom, a richer chance for life.

G-E Research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

BOOKS

The Tragedy of an Absolutist

THE FINAL STRUGGLE: BEING COUNTESS TOLSTOY'S DIARY FROM 1910. Translated by Aylmer Maude. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

THE world has taken sides between Leo and Sofya Tolstoy. To those sympathetic with genius a demanding, hysterical wife is always at fault, although she may bear the burden of sixteen pregnancies, thirteen births, and nine living children. To defenders of the family a husband is to blame, however much a genius, if his moral scruples cut at the livelihood of wife and children. It may be that the conflict between the Tolstoyes, like all tragedy, is a matter less deserving of blame than of understanding. "The Final Struggle" covers the last year in a marital battle that extended over thirty years. Here are the trivia of each day rising to overwhelming tragedy: the little words of spite and blank despair in the 1910 diaries of wife and husband, supplemented by the accounts of eyewitnesses, relatives, friends, and doctors; a historical introduction by Tolstoy's biographer, Aylmer Maude; and an intimate picture by the son Sergius Tolstoy, who has managed like an artist to render an impartial accounting. From this book alone the reader cannot judge of a married life which endured nearly half a century; it crystallizes only the darker chapters, and the bulk of the story is told by partisans in a mood of passionate exaggeration.

The Tolstoy household at Yasnaya Polyana in the year 1910 was as tense as a Russian novel, divided as it was into two armed camps: on the one side Tolstoy, his literary executor Chertkov, and his daughter Alexandra; on the other side Sofya and her two sons Ilya and Andrey. Everyone kept diaries and held private meetings, a secret will was drawn up on a tree stump in the woods, there were attempts at suicide and threats to run away, there were illness and hysteria, and finally there was Tolstoy's escape in the black of night and his death at a railway station a few days later. The fight was waged for the soul of Tolstoy, for the egos of the others depended upon their relationship with him.

How had they come to this impasse? According to the accumulated legend, which Sergius Tolstoy accepts, the early married years of the Tolstoyes were happy, and it was not until Tolstoy became religious and sought to reconcile the deed with the word that the conflict arose. The supposition is that Tolstoy's religious search did not proceed inevitably from his character, and that he might have chosen never to branch off into this moral preoccupation and thus have continued in marital harmony until the end of the chapter.

I cannot agree with this surface view of their relationship. The tragedy of the Tolstoyes was inherent in their character. Marriage was a compromise to Leo, whereas to Sofya it was the organizing principle of her being. He came to it at the late age of thirty-four, suspicious of sensual pleasures; she came to it romantically, an ordinary young girl destined to marry a great and distinguished writer. Wrapped in his quest of the good, the beautiful, and the true, Tolstoy had to withdraw from private life. Sofya found her fulfilment in helping her husband, caring for the children, attending to the business of the estate.

Thus their division of labor: he, the artist doomed to live by absolutes, come what may; she, the family provider driven to press for security, whatever the cost. This battle between male and female, between genius and common sense, never let up. But it brought its gifts to Leo and through him to the world. Experiencing love, he created Natasha at the ball and proud Anna Karenina. He was a solemn, awkward man who was brought through marriage into contact with ordinary things, and celebrated for later generations children at play, sleigh rides, hunts, childbirth. Perhaps because of his devastating experiences he drew his heroes in his own likeness ■ troubled seekers for truth, and the women in the image of his wife—glorious, fierce, and trivial. His domestic philosophy, like that of Freud, was based upon the tragedy of the bedroom.

We must not believe that it was Sofya's badgering that made Tolstoy unhappy, or her petty reasoning that kept him from becoming a hermit or a peasant. His body's needs prevented celibacy, and a deep sense of realism (like that of Levin, who once thought of marrying ■ peasant girl) made it impossible for him to adopt the ways of the mujik. For better or worse he remained what he was created—sensual and an aristocrat. Long before Sofya married Leo Tolstoy, he tried in the true Russian spirit to deny himself and achieve perfection. But he could not find the good life among his fellows in battle, or in family obligations, or in nearness to God or peasant. His marriage with Sofya Behrs was in itself only an episode in his search for moral peace.

But there was no peace, for within him were the sources of his own contradictions. The phases of his development overlapped, causing inner tension. He was at once sensual lover and ascetic, he wanted the warmth of a family and the peace of a monastery; he was an egoist who believed in meekness, a stubborn opponent who preached non-resistance; he would not submit to authority and yet imposed his will on others; he believed in love for humanity but often could not love the individuals near him; he was comforted by the material world and continued to search for God. In short, he dug so deeply into his own nature that he discovered and embodied the dualities at the core of existence, and because of his greed for life he held on to them all.

Thus the book represents the tragedy of an absolutist whose absolutes came to grief in his private life. For in the daily round we live less by principles than by mutual tolerance, less by logic than by humor. Tolstoy, the absolutist, paid in pain for his insights into the universe. Out of this pain arose miraculous books—not only the long, impassioned novels but also the stories and essays on women, death, God, beauty, and poverty, wherein he dared to face the realities from which the weak must flee. Faustus-like, Tolstoy tried to encompass all experience, and found himself at last ■ magnificent failure.

ANITA MARBURG

The Natural in the Human

ANNA BECKER. By Max White. Stackpole Sons. $2.50.

IN MARRYING D. H. Lawrence to Gertrude Stein, the author of this novel has achieved ■ remarkable combination of elements. This vision of a woman's rebirth, of the fulfilment of her senses and instincts, seems directly derived from Lawrence, and the fine brevity of the prose, its idyllic notes, its simplicity at once tender and precise, are reminiscent of the early Stein. And lest a lineage so patently literary

ON YOUR GUARD! Will save the LIVES of MILLIONS!

ON YOUR GUARD!

The PREVENTION TREATMENT SEX DISEASES

By CARL WARREN, B.A., B.S., M.S.J.
Foreword by M. J. EXNER, M.D.
Consulting Physician to the American Social Hygiene Assn.

PART OF CONTENTS

ARE YOU THE ONE IN SEVEN?
Men First, but also Women—Youth, the Dangerous Age—Regarding Race and Rites—The Professional Prostitute—The Amateur Promiscuous Girl—Prevalence among Races—Venereal Diseases and Crime.

PREVENTIVE METHODS AT A GLANCE
Prophylaxis for Women—Doctors, Clinics and Hospitals—Disease, Dollars and Cents—The Innocent and the Indiscreet—Love Rites of Venus—Civilization and Syphilis—The Compound of Ehrlich—Syphilis, the Great Masquerader—The Other Maladies.

SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT OF SYPHILIS
How to Tell If You Are Infected and What the Doctor Will Do—How Syphilis May Be Caught—First Signs of Infection—The Second Stage—The Third Stage.

SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT OF GONORRHEA
How to Tell If You Are Infected and What the Doctor Will Do—The Causes of Infection—Dangers of Ill Disease—The Fallacy of "No Worse Than a Bad Cold"—First Signs of Infection—Complications in Men—Complications in Women—How the Doctor Can Tell—Modern Methods of Treatment—Advice to the Patient—Length of Treatment—Protecting the Baby—Gonorrhea in Children—Gonorrhea Fallacies.

SAFETY FIRST AND FIRST AID
First Army and Navy Experiments—Prophylaxis Proved a Success—The Swing to Pocket Tubes—Popularity of the Condom—How the Doctor Can Tell—Treatment with Drugs—Artificial Fever Therapy—Advice to the Patient—Length of Treatment—A Message to Women—Syphilis in Babies—Fallacies about Syphilis.

ARE DRUG STORE PROPHYLACTICS THE ANSWER?
The Rubber Prophylactic—How to Buy and Use It—Proper Ways to Obtain, Test and Handle Mechanical Preventive Devices—What Is the Sheath?—The Most Popular Prophylactic—Advantages and Disadvantages—Sales Outside of Drug Stores—The Chemical Tube—How to Buy and Use It—Proper Ways to Obtain, Test and Handle the Prophylactic Packet—What Is the Chemical Tube?—Prophylaxis for Gonorrhea—Tried and Found Effective—The Ointment Tube—Advantages and Disadvantages—The Danger of Delay—What Price Safety?—The Sheath or the Tube, Which?

THE HIGHWAY TO HEALTH

How to Avoid the Perils of Quacks and Nostrums—How to Protect Yourself—Tricks of the Trade—Doctors and Drug Stores—What's in the Bottle—Dangers of Self-Treatment—How to Find a Good Doctor—Paying the Doctor Bill—For Those Not Ill.

NOTE

To widest possible distribution for "On Your Guard," the price has been fixed at only one dollar.

Free Offer

RETURN COUPON

DO YOU REALIZE THAT

—one out of every SEVEN Americans is suffering from syphilis or gonorrhea, right now? The information in ON YOUR GUARD "will save the lives of millions."

DR. H. N. BUNDESEN, President, Board of Health, City of Chicago, says:

"A book of tremendous personal importance to every individual in the United States—should be placed in the hands of every young man and every young woman of college age."

DR. J. L. RICE, Commissioner of Health, New York, says:

"I am in favor of tactfully telling the public the truth about all communicable diseases, including syphilis and gonorrhea."

DR. MAX J. EXNER, Consulting Physician to the American Social Hygiene Association, says:

"If . . . the knowledge and means for the control of syphilis were fully applied . . . the disease could be stamped out in a short time. . . . Many people who have syphilis do not know it. . . ."

DR. WALTER CLARKE, Director, Bureau of Social Hygiene, New York, says:

"'On Your Guard' describes in simple, dignified language the prevention and the control of syphilis and gonorrhea."

LIBERALLY ILLUSTRATED
160 Pages • Cloth Bound

Mail This Coupon to Your Bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 856-N,
251 West 19th St., New York City.

Please send me . . . copies of "On Your Guard." I will pay postman $1.00 plus few cents postage on each book. If not entirely satisfied I may return book(s) within 5 days and purchase price WILL BE REFUNDED.

Name

Address

☐ Check here if you want to save postage charges. Enclose only $1.00 for each book and we will prepay postage. Same money-back guarantee, of course.

Two great books in one!

1 Portrait of Mexico, painted as only DIEGO RIVERA can! The volume contains 249 of the finest frescoes, oils and water colors the Mexican master has done—all of them depicting the Mexico he knows and loves. MIGUEL COVARRUBIAS says: "It is certainly the most exciting and comprehensive book of the best work of Diego Rivera."

2 Portrait of Mexico, an interpretative history of the land and its people by BERTRAM D. WOLFE, close student of Mexican affairs. Rivera's paintings and Wolfe's text are perfect complements—each can stand alone, but together they form the perfect book about Mexico of yesterday and today.

Portrait of Mexico BY DIEGO RIVERA and Bertram D. Wolfe. 460 pages, with 111 half-tone illustrations, $4.75. Just published.

COVICI • FRIEDE, 432 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

"Such explorative work as this is indispensable to awaken the conscience of the nation . . . a solid, informative book that is at once an illustration of method and a monument to perhaps the ablest group of social students in America. Their study will remain an impressive case history of American slums."

—Samuel Middlebrook, New York Times

THE TENEMENTS OF CHICAGO

1908-1935

By EDITH ABBOTT and Associates

The results of this twenty-five-year survey point to necessary local and federal legislation for adequate housing. Striking photographs, $5.00, Postpaid $5.15.

Can Health Insurance Solve the Problem of Sickness Costs?

SICKNESS AND INSURANCE

By HARRY ALVIN MILLIS

In the United States today, medical care represents a larger item of expense in the wage earner's budget than does the loss of income because of sickness. A seasoned economist here reviews the economic and social proportions of the sickness problem and suggests action to combat it. $2.00, Postpaid $2.10.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
5750 Ellis Avenue Chicago, Ill.

should appear artificial and thus prejudice us against its bearer, it should be observed that the particular way in which he has tempered and synthesized his two elements is creatively of the utmost interest. By using the first influence with the moderation of his own need he has cured it of those spasms of salvation-mongering we thought inherent in it, and by pruning the verbal fetishes off the second he has presented it normatively, minus that quality commonly considered objectionable as well as organic to the attitude and intention behind it. Where the fruitfulness of Mr. White's method comes in is that by freeing these elements from the strictly individual stamp of their creators, he has emphasized their objective meanings and thus made a more balanced judgment of them so much easier.

At first sight Anna Becker, proprietress of a tea-shop in a conservative college town in New Hampshire, appears to be a woman whose conventions make up her character. Some things, however, tend to give her away. A beautiful woman, she finds no pleasure in looking at herself in the mirror, for she sees there a stranger who does not at all look like the person both the town and she herself think she is. The arrival of the quarryman, Steve Larsen, upsets the weight of her maidenly years, for Larsen, a man as natural as the homely syllables of his name, lets nothing impede him from getting to "the core of what he likes" and, desiring Anna, he takes her against her will. This "primitive" workingman blackmails her into submission, and though the circumstances of her life in the town amply explain her fear of forcibly ejecting him from her house, there is yet more than a hint of ambiguity in her inability to resist him. Time passes, and against the background of the seasons vivified through a superb use of nature symbolism, we witness the gradual destruction of Anna's conventions by the secret efforts of her "woman's nature" and Larsen's sure and "inevitable" behavior. She finds the strength to defy her neighbors, who isolate her socially, and finally she emerges as a woman "new and alive," sharing the abundance and movement of natural things.

The question that must be asked is why the two elements interwoven in this novel work so well together. To my mind, the reply is to be sought in the fact that both elements, from different angles and with unequal pressure, offer simplified solutions, whose secret is salvation from within, to modern problems. What is Lawrence's mysticism of the body if not the obverse side of the older mysticism of the soul? And being a simplification, this mystical doctrine cannot but take its toll, of course, in the creation of character. Whatever credibility Larsen has is due more to our memories of his type in other novels than to our recognition of him as a part of living experience. He is too messianic to serve as a real and lasting image of release, though he appeals to our sensibility as a modern version of the romantic Noble Savage of a bygone age.

This book is blurbed as a "Madame Bovary" of New England—a comparison that strikes me as particularly inept. Emma's passion brings her to her death, while Anna's brings her life: one finds in love only a surcease from boredom, the other a joyous identification with the real world. Moreover, in Mr. White's prose there is not a whiff of those emanations of M. Homais's pharmacy, that is to say, of that obsession with the commonplace, the local, and the flavor of the purely human so peculiar to French realism. Flaubert stressed the human in the natural, Lawrence the natural in the human.

PHILIP RAHV

Wrong Number

OF MICE AND MEN. By John Steinbeck. Covici-Friede. $2.

ALL but one of the persons in Mr. Steinbeck's extremely brief novel are subhuman if the range of the word human is understood to coincide with the range thus far established by fiction. Two of them are evil, one of them is dangerous without meaning to be, and all of them are ignorant—all of them, that is, except the one who shall be named hereafter. Far from knowing the grammar of conduct, they do not even know its orthography. No two of their thoughts are consecutive, nor for that matter do they think; it is rather that each of them follows some instinct as a bull follows the chain which runs through a hole in his nose, or as a crab moves toward its prey. The scene is a ranch in California, and the bunk-house talk is terrific—God damn, Jesus Christ, what the hell, you crazy bastard, I gotta gut ache, and things like that. The dialect never varies, just as the story never runs uphill.

George and Lennie, the itinerant workers who come to the ranch one day with a dream of the little farm they will own as soon as they get the jack together, seem to think their new job will last at least that long; but the reader knows from the beginning that it will not last, for Lennie is a half-witted giant with a passion for petting mice—or rabbits, or pups, or girls—and for killing them when they don't like it. He is doomed in this book to kill Curley's wife; that is obvious; and then—. Lennie, you see, cannot help shaking small helpless creatures until their necks are broken, just as George cannot relinquish his dream, and just as Curley cannot ever stop being a beast of jealousy. They are wound up to act that way, and the best they can do is run down; which is what happens when Mr. Steinbeck comes to his last mechanical page.

What, however, of the one exception? Ah, he is Slim the jerkline skinner, the tall man with the "God-like eyes" that get fastened on you so that you can't think of anything else for a while. "There was a gravity in his manner and a quiet so profound that all talk stopped when he spoke. . . . His hatchet face was ageless. He might have been thirty-five or fifty. His ear heard more than was said to him, and his slow speech had overtones not of thought, but of understanding beyond thought. His hands, large and lean, were as delicate in their action as those of a temple dancer." He looks through people and beyond them—a feat never accomplished save in mechanical novels. And he understands—why, he understands everything that Mr. Steinbeck understands. It is the merest accident of education that he talks like the rest; "Jesus, he's jes' like a kid, ain't he," he says. If he had his creator's refinement of tongue he could write such sentences as this one which introduces Lennie: "His arms did not swing at his sides, but hung loosely and only moved because the heavy hands were pendula." It wouldn't have done to write pendulums. That would have given the real sound and look of Lennie, and besides it is a real word.

Mr. Steinbeck, I take it, has not been interested in reality of any kind. His jerkline skinner (mule driver) is as hopelessly above the human range as Lennie or Candy or Curley's painted wife is below it. All is extreme here; everybody is a doll; and if there is a kick in the story it is given us from some source which we cannot see, as when a goose walks over our grave, or as when in the middle of the night the telephone rings sharply and it is the wrong number. We shall remember it about that long.

MARK VAN DOREN

MOSCOW MAY DAY

and the Soviet Theatre

in

LENINGRAD, KHARKOV,

MOSCOW, KIEV,

under leadership of

NORRIS HOUGHTON

author of "Moscow Rehearsals"

See the Soviet Union in the festival month of May when theatres and other activities are in full swing.

Sailing April 14, back in New York May 23.

PRICE INCLUDING
THEATRE TICKETS

$387

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor
8 West 40th Street
New York

Cooperating with Intourist

Other Tours
from $394

Startling • Concise • Clear

THE END OF SOCIALISM IN RUSSIA

"Should be read by all who hope to achieve democracy through reforming the private property system instead of through abolishing it. Mr. Eastman's book gives strength to everyone who wants to make the American experiment work, for it suggests that if we fail there is no tolerable alternative."

—Herbert Agar.

By MAX EASTMAN

75 cents

LITTLE, BROWN

& CO., BOSTON

1837

1937

A Man and an Administration

HAMILTON FISH: THE INNER HISTORY OF THE GRANT ADMINISTRATION. By Allan Nevins. Dodd, Mead and Company. $5.

WHICH of our Presidential administrations the worst is still a matter of dispute among American historians, but after reading Dr. Nevins's excellent volume I am persuaded that General Grant's deserves the palm. While this is a long book, it escapes being tedious. The author has carefully concealed most of the scaffolding of scholarship. His narrative often steers a tortuous course through the shoals of obscure diplomatic minutiae, such as the minor Santo Dominican skulduggeries or the final passages at arms over the Alabama arbitration. Still, it has movement, occasionally exhibits pleasing irony, and often ascends to heights of moving prose. Dr. Nevins has added to his already well-established reputation by producing another enduring book.

In this task the fact that Hamilton Fish kept a copious diary was of the greatest aid to him. This diary bids fair to alter fundamentally Fish's own historical position, and it likewise throws a painfully bright light on certain obscurities in Grant's Presidential career. Historians of our own times are sure to be vastly disadvantaged by the dearth of diarists today, but during the Civil War and Reconstruction diaries were still being kept by important men. The opinionated, irascible, crabbed, self-righteous, and still highly revealing record of Gideon Welles is an example. Hamilton Fish's diary bids fair to be as useful for the years of Grant. It has not yet been published in its entirety, but the copious excerpts in this present volume whet one's appetite for the full text.

Fish himself deserved well of his country. A New Yorker of patron stock, born in the Federalist tradition, he had a distinguished pre-war career, including a Senate term. Then came a decade of quasi-retirement, after which, to his own surprise as much as that of the country, he was inducted into Grant's Cabinet as Secretary of State. Again and again planning to resign, he stayed the whole eight years, and managed to keep the State Department free from the stupidities and scandals that afflicted nearly every other administrative branch under Grant.

To do this was no easy job. While Nevins acquits the General of personal dishonesty, he agrees with other historians that there were infirmities in his character which made him a most inappropriate choice for the White House. In the first place, it was General and not President Grant: his Cabinet ministers were subordinates to be ordered. The pattern of his appointments was very bad: to a shameful nepotism was added a partiality to names suggested by his shabby "kitchen cabinet." To this was added a stubborn defense of revealed blunderers or corruptionists which indicated a moral obtuseness of Grant's part. And finally there was a complete casualness about the functional efficiency of governmental operation; Grant's slipshod mode of handling the Presidential duties often brought Fish to the resignation point.

Dr. Nevins adds few new scandals to the familiar record, but he does supply corroborating details which further deepen the black of official turpitude. During these dark years, however, no breath of scandal ever touched Fish, and he left office in 1877 with the general confidence and esteem of the country. And with reason, for he had brought to solution the two thorniest controversies with foreign nations which the United States had had since Commodore Wilkes stopped the British steamer Trent: he had successfully liquidated our Civil War grievances against Great Britain; and in spite of the exacerbations of Cuba in revolt, he had kept us out of war with Spain. In both instances there had been almost as many obstacles at home as abroad. Yet with a patience and vision extraordinary for the epoch, he kept the helm steady and steered the bark successfully to port.

GEORGE FORT MILTON

JULES ROMAINS'

Gay,
Rabelaisian Tale
of Seven Bibulous Souls

THE BOYS IN THE BACK ROOM

Just as Balzac turned aside from the Human Comedy to enliven life with his Droll Stories, so the distinguished author of Men of Good Will includes in his brilliant and versatile writings a masterpiece of robust hilarity—THE BOYS IN THE BACK ROOM. Here is a side-splitting, Rabelaisian account of how seven garrulous Gauls raise havoc with the forces of organized stupidity, upset the armed forces of the French Republic, raise merry hell with the strongholds of piety, and make this earth a cheerier place to live in. If you want to chuckle for the rest of the year, read this book. $2.00

ROBERT M. MCBRIDE & COMPANY

116 E. 16th St., NEW YORK

DRAMA

Excuse My Glove

MOST readers of the New Yorker remember the adventures of Arthur Kober's Bella, who frequently attended "formals" and was "not the type girl accustomed to talk to young men I haven't been properly introduced to." Bella herself does not appear in Mr. Kober's new play, "Having Wonderful Time" (Lyceum Theater), but a dozen or more of her friends do, and despite one reference to The Nation not intended to be too complimentary I must confess that they furnish a very amusing evening. The scene is Kamp Karefree somewhere in the Berkshires, and the plot concerns those vacation romances which must bloom rapidly if they are to bloom at all. The important thing, however, is neither plot nor setting but a study of the folk ways current among Jewish stenographers and their struggling boy friends.

Mr. Kober is not, of course, the first to exploit this milieu. His world is roughly the same as that of writers as wildly unlike as Milt Gross and Clifford Odets. Yet Mr. Kober has a manner completely his own, and his material seems delightfully fresh, partly because he centers his attention upon the young men and women pathetically reaching out toward a culture and a tradition of manners not theirs by inheritance, even more because the temper of his compassionate satire is unmistakably individual. What could so easily be burlesque is actually comedy, and what might be offensively condescending is almost tender. His lovers who do not forget to beg pardon for pointing when they wish to call attention to the moon are not merely funny. They are, as a matter of fact, singularly engaging as well.

I do not know why the common assumption is made that there is some peculiar virtue in "folk plays" dealing with the remoter rural minorities in the United States or elsewhere. Mr. Kober's characters may not be close to the soil but they are certainly close to the concrete, and that is, for us, quite as important. From this little play the visitor from Mars could easily deduce the entire culture of a social group at least a million strong, and the piece is as much a folk play as if it dealt with Georgia crackers or Cape Cod fishermen.

Perhaps I should add that considered purely as a piece of playwriting "Having Wonderful Time" is not as good as the material out of which it is made. Even though much of it is not taken directly from Mr. Kober's original sketches, it is obvious that he has had some difficulty in making the transition from one form to another, and that he has had recourse to conventional dramatic devices which occasionally produce an effect of artificiality not at all in keeping with dialogue or characterization. The play was twice postponed, and one may assume that a good deal of tinkering has been done in an effort to remove just these faults; but that effort has not been wholly successful, for there are still moments when the machinery creaks. Nevertheless, the piece will be, I believe, extremely popular, and it deserves to be. There are excellent performances by Katherine Lock, Janet Fox, Jules Garfield, and a number of minor players.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

ISSUING vocal and organ works of Bach in the form of piano transcriptions by Alexander Kelberine (four ten-inch and two twelve-inch records, $10) is what Victor calls bringing Bach "down to simple terms that we all can understand." In fact, however, the piano lends itself least to clear presentation of Bach's polyphony; all that Mr. Kelberine and Jeanne Behrend can do is to separate out one melodic line from the texture by thumping it out note by note; and I cannot imagine any method of presentation that would make the beauty of the works more obscure. If Victor really wants to make this beauty accessible, all it has to do is to have the music sung or played in its original form. And I must add that some of the recording in this set is poor.

Victor has assembled in a single album called "Stars of the Metropolitan" (five records, $10) a number of recordings of

A brilliant record of an eventful era

This lively, authoritative volume reviews recent American history. Written with emphasis on social history, it pays special attention to the adjustment of industrial enterprise and the Federal Government.

$3.50

ROOSEVELT TO ROOSEVELT by Dwight Lowell Dumond

A survey of Europe's storm centre

A noted German writer presents a penetrating analysis of the political and economic problems facing Central Europe. "An able exposition of the most burning Central European problems."—N. Y. Times. $2.75

CENTRAL EUROPE AND THE WESTERN WORLD by Gerhard Schacher

HENRY HOLT & CO., 247 4th AVE., NEW YORK

Give

A Meal for a Child
A Bag of Flour
Milk for an Old Man

Spanish women and children, as well as their husbands and fathers, are in the front line of defense against world fascism. Do not let them go hungry.

Help Load THE NATION'S Food Ship
for Non-Combatants in Spain

I enclose $..... Or I pledge $.....

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Make checks payable to The Nation's Food Ship Fund,
HELEN WOODWARD, Chairman, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with
HENRY HULL MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK

SHUBERT THEATRE, 1111 Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thurs & Sat., 2:40. Eves. 8:40. 300 seats $1.10

MARCHING SONG

THEATRE UNION production
By John Howard Lawson

BAYES THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way., BR 9-3648
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Prices: 45c, 60c, 75c, $1, $1.50—No Tax
For Benefit Theatre Party Rates Call BR 9-2375

"A powerful and exciting social drama of inescapable interest."—Watts, Herald Trib.
"Brilliant scenes etched with savage humor."—Atkinson, Times.

A Noteworthy Theatrical Event!

HELEN HOWE

IN HER "CHARACTERS & CARICATURES" offering for the First Time
HER TWO NEW MONO-DRAMAS
"MAÑANA" (Acclaimed last Summer in London) and "THE LESSER BREED" (Entirely new)

SUNDAY EVE., Mar. 7
at 8:45
LITTLE Theatre
44th St. W. of B'way
Prices 55c to $2.20

INTERNATIONAL PEACE DANCE

FRIDAY, ENTERTAINMENT
MARCH 12, 1937 by courtesy of
HOTEL EDISON JOE MOSS of the 228 West 47th Street HOLLYWOOD RESTAURANT
and
OUTSTANDING STARS
MEYER DAVIS' ORCHESTRA
Admission $1.00
Auspices of the
AMERICAN LEAGUE AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM
CITY OFFICE: 45 EAST 17th STREET
Tickets for sale at League and all Workers Bookshops

What They Say About

MUSICRAFT RECORDS

Excerpts from reviews of our recent recording of BACH'S ITALIAN CONCERTO:
"... Kirkpatrick plays with the impeccable taste those familiar with his work will immediately recognize."—Times.
"... harpsichord recording of amazing and unprecedented fidelity."—The Nation.
"... the style of the playing is splendidly elevated."—The Sun.
"... preserves tonal values and balances in a gratifying way."—St. Paul Pioneer Press.
"... you cannot afford to overlook these Musicraft records."—Scribner's.

Just released:
BACH: PARTITA No. 1 in G Major.
Ralph Kirkpatrick at the harpsichord. Two 12-inch records..... $3.00
Musicraft records are sold by all leading dealers.

MUSICRAFT RECORDS, Inc.
45 West 45th Street New York City

ANDRÉ MALRAUX

Author of Man's Fate
Leader of the International Air Squadron of the Loyalist Government
AND
LOUIS FISCHER
Foreign Correspondent of The Nation will discuss "Spain's Battle for Democracy"
at
Mecca Temple
130 West 56th Street, New York on Thursday evening, March 11, at 8 o'clock
Admission: $.55, $.35, and $.25
Tickets at North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City. MURRAY HILL 5-0477

favorite operatic excerpts by singers of the Metropolitan. Tibbett is represented by two items: the Toreador's Song from "Carmen" and "Largo al factotum" from the "Barber of Seville"; and if I were asked what I meant by the expression "ham singing," I should say, "Listen to Tibbett's record of 'Largo al factotum.'" Excellent are Pons's singing of "Caro Nome" from "Rigoletto," John Charles Thomas's of "Di Provenza" from "La Traviata," and Richard Crooks's of "The Dream" from "Manon." Helen Jepson, raised to stardom in this album, exhibits a lovely voice in "Depuis le jour" from "Louise"; Bori is excessively coy in "Mi Chiamano Mimi" from "La Bohème"; Martinelli sings "Celeste Aïda" in his loud and constricted fashion; and there are two sides from Victor's fine set of Act I of "Die Walküre," one side featuring Melchior, the other Lotte Lehmann, who emerges as the greatest star in this collection.

Except for a few details of overemphasis and wilfulness in tempos, Koussevitzky's performance of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony with the Boston Symphony (Victor: five records, $10) is refreshingly and effectively straightforward. The recording is excellent in fidelity and sonority, but I am disturbed by the reverberations in the empty hall in which it was made, and by the fact that when instruments play softly they seem to recede into the distance. And what it is that will lead a recording manager and a conductor, in the year 1936, to destroy the formal balance of the third movement by cutting out seventy-five measures in order to get the movement all on one side and the entire work all on nine sides, and this in order to use for a Tchaikovsky waltz the tenth side that might have been used for the third movement—this, with some other mental processes manifested in recording, is beyond my comprehension.

The musical style of Heifetz's playing rarely satisfies me, but his performance of Fauré's Sonata in A, Opus 13, is one of the rare instances; and it is superbly recorded (Victor: three records, $6.50). The work itself, however, is characteristic in its empty fluency.

The first record to give the full measure of Flagstad's voice, musical feeling, and taste is a Victor single ($1.50) on which she sings in German Grieg's "I Love You" and "A Dream." All one asks now is music more worthy of her artistic resources. And the same point is to be made concerning Marian Anderson, who is heard on a Victor single ($1.50) in two more arrangements of Negro spirituals: "Go Down Moses" and "My Soul's Been Anchored in the Lord." On another Victor single ($2) Helen Jepson sings two excerpts from Hageman's "Caponsacchi," which have as little value as music can have. Villa Lobo's "Choro No. 7," which the composer conducts on a Victor record ($1.50) you can afford to neglect.

On Columbia single records Beecham's performance of Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" Suite No. 1 with the London Philharmonic is excellent, but the recording is poor in spots (two records, $3); Molajoli gives a fine performance, well recorded, of Cherubini's Overture to "Medea" with the Milan Symphony (one record, $1.50).

Musicraft has issued Bach's Partita No. 5, performed on the harpsichord by Ralph Kirkpatrick (two records, $3). Ordinarily surface noise is covered by the recorded sound; but on the first side of these records the music, which seems under-recorded, is obscured by the noise. On the other three sides one hears more of the harpsichord, but still too much of the surface, on which there are blemishes that indicate poor pressing. With the records so bad there is almost no point in adding that the music is dull.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Violence in Indiana

Dear Sirs: On February 12, at Anderson, Indiana, ten persons were hurt in what the newspapers described as a "new strike clash"—presumably an aftermath of the automobile strike—involving union men from Flint and Detroit. As a result of the melee, which occurred at an obscure tavern, thirteen men were arrested, and martial law was declared. Two of those arrested—union sympathizers—were taken to a hospital seriously wounded. According to the account of the New York Times, the police of Anderson "blamed union sympathizers for the outbreak which led to martial law. Police Chief Joseph Carney said that . . . two cars containing about a dozen men drove up to a tavern operated by Emory Shipley . . . and demanded that a non-union worker at the General Motors Delco-Remy plant be sent out to them."

"Shipley informed them," continued the account, "that the person they sought was not in the tavern, and afterward several shots were fired and rocks were thrown at his place, he told the police. He obtained a shotgun and fired both barrels at the two cars, which were then driving away."

One of the wounded men, however, tells a different story. Heaton Vorse was one of the "union sympathizers" who had come to Anderson from Flint (it should be borne in mind that this is not a crime). The accompanying letter was written by Mr. Vorse, who is still in the hospital in Anderson, to his wife. Along with others, he is under arrest on serious charges of inciting to riot. His letter throws a different light on an incident which may give rise to another unjust and long-drawn-out persecution of working-class victims. The authorities of Anderson have made no secret of their anti-union attitude. The La Follette committee would do well to investigate the Anderson affair with all possible speed.

M. M.

New York, March 1

Dear—: All was quiet in Anderson. Too quiet. The vigilantes had evidently been tipped off. Went up into union hall. A big sign, "Thank you, Flint" hung in the assembly room. Units from Detroit, Toledo, and even Cleveland started to drift in. Since it was obvious that there would be no trouble, plans were being formed for a big labor parade.

Many of the Flint contingent, myself included, found their way to the bar-room downstairs, for the sheer joy of ordering beer. Flint and Genesee County were made dry by Murphy, remember. No one drank heavily. An Anderson boy called me to his table and introduced me to his pretty wife and sister. Other Flint and Anderson boys joined us from time to time. It was all gay and social.

I was called upstairs to do my turn on the door. (Note: Union halls here aren't free to the world. You have to have damned satisfactory credentials to enter, as a guard against stools, finks, etc.) Anderson's hall had four on duty that evening, Anderson, Flint, Toledo, Cleveland. A steady stream of men were flowing in and out. It kept us busy checking. As the moments passed, the tension eased. If any bloodthirsty souls were disappointed, they didn't show it.

A sudden commotion at the foot of the stairs. A young fellow somewhat bruised about the face is hustled up the stairs. I understand that he has been beaten up by vigilantes at the "Gold Band" tavern. There are other union men out there who are in danger.

"Flint upstairs!" I check the boys through and follow the last one into a conference room. There is some question as to where the place is, but off we go.

Our car was the first out. We discovered the tavern to be a shanty in shanty town, varying only from the other scattered ugly boxes in that it had a glass front. Another carload drew up. We walked toward the tavern. At which point, the bartender drew a shotgun from beneath the bar and fired through the window. I ducked in time to miss the shot, but the flying glass burned my forehead.

At this point I decided that I didn't want any, and started moving. The decision was fairly unanimous. The bartender fired twice more through the broken window and then came out the door. Another man scooted out of a side door and took up an observation post about ten yards away. He shouted directions to the bartender. It seemed so well planned.

As I ran I saw that the barkeeper had cornered three boys who had taken refuge behind a parked sedan. He hounded them, ducking back and forth till he got one of them—in the back—Rose (the other badly wounded boy, now in the hospital with me). I heard the man on observation shout, "Get that one running!" I got it. The newspapers carried that he was protecting his property.

Men can be so amazingly gentle. The kindness and care given me by the boys who carried me to the hospital made the nurse and doctor in charge seem almost brutal. All of them are under arrest for their kindness.

HEATON VORSE

Gala CAMP UNITY Reunion Dance!

MODELS OF NEW SOCIAL HALL TO BE EXHIBITED AT WEBSTER HALL.

Friday, March 5
WEBSTER HALL
119 EAST 11th STREET

Admission 85c including tax.
TICKETS on sale at all Bookshops.

Prizes! 2 Bands! Continuous Dancing!

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY
PUBLICATION . . .

Charles R. Walker on the Farmer-Labor Party

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota has functioned actively for more than fifteen years. Today it is the first party of its state, having won lately every state office save one. How did the Farmer-Labor Party attain political control of Minnesota, how does it maintain its position of leadership, what has it accomplished, and what is its significance within and beyond state lines? Charles R. Walker, whose new book, "American City," a study of class conflict in Minneapolis, will be published this month, answers these questions in two factual articles which evaluate the importance of the Farmer-Labor Party as a progressive political force of today and tomorrow.

Louis Adamic on Cleveland's Leading Citizen

For decades discontented young men have left their jobs on newspapers west of the Hudson to break into journalism in New York City. Yet one of the most significant figures in the American newspaper world today is a Cleveland columnist. Louis Adamic presents a portrait of John W. Raper, whom he calls "Cleveland's most effective, active, important, and successful citizen."

Oswald Garrison Villard Begins a Series

The Nation began its career as the outstanding champion of the rights of the oppressed small neighbors of the United States under Mr. Villard's editorship. In this issue Mr. Villard, who has been making a tour of the Caribbean, begins a series of articles on the present state of affairs in Haiti, Puerto Rico, Santo Domingo, and the Virgin Islands.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c

3-6-37

The Newspaper with the Fighting Heart

The SUNDAY WORKER

gives you the chance every Sunday morning to laugh, to grow warm with anger or fire up about another labor victory with Mike Gold, passionate and beloved writer of the workers. Or you can experience the thrill and sting accompanying your chuckles as you read, say, Joe North on "A Little Chat with Sloan" (recently published), in which he says: "When Mr. Sloan finished telling G.M.'s workingmen what they should do for their own good, he woke up several days later to discover they did exactly what was to their own good. That didn't jibe with Mr. Sloan's own notions. . . . How was he to know beforehand what a sit-down is? Nobody said anything to him before and there is nothing about it in Dun and Bradstreet's."

A CHANGING WORLD

is reflected in the challenging news, articles and cartoons in the SUNDAY WORKER. The Supreme Court issue, the march of labor on ever-widening industrial fronts, the struggle against fascism and war are vividly reported and clarified in the SUNDAY WORKER. Fearless exposes, the truth from Madrid, Moscow and Paris so often obscured by other papers, appear regularly. Such regular brilliant contributors as Josephine Herbst, William Rollins, Art Shields, Myra Page, Dell, Ellis, Gropper, Burck, Anna Louise Strong, tell of developments on the progressive labor, dramatic and literary fields. A Review of the Week's News, sports, comics, are weekly features of the news and magazine sections of the SUNDAY WORKER.

Coming Soon:

LEAVES FROM A WORKER'S LIFE

by Wm. Z. Foster

chairman of the Communist Party, U.S.A., who was the leading strategist of the great 1919 steel strike. These hitherto unpublished sketches are based on his experiences when he served 4 years before the mast on a windjammer and reveal dramatically the lives of seamen.

Special Introductory Offer!

25 Weeks of SUNDAY WORKER and this set of 8 fascinating booklets, forming a library containing a wealth of information on timely controversial topics

$1

FREE!

- | | |
|---------------------------------------|---|
| 1. Supreme Court's Challenge to Labor | 5. Dangerous Jobs |
| 2. Speeding Up the Workers | 6. Profits and Wages |
| 3. Women Who Work | 7. An Open Letter from Mauritz Hallgren |
| 4. Company Unions Today | 8. Hearst's "Secret" Documents |

SUNDAY WORKER

50 East 13th Street, New York, N. Y.

N

I enclose $1 for 25 weeks' subscription to the SUNDAY WORKER and send me FREE the set of 8 booklets as per your special offer

Name _____

Address _____

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 13, 1937

NUMBER 11

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	281
EDITORIALS:
EUROPE'S ECONOMIC WAR	283
ROOSEVELT ON THE RADIO	284
IS THE STATE DEPARTMENT FAVORING FRANCO?	285
STEEL VICTORY—AND AFTER	286
A NEW WPA SET-UP by Paul W. Ward	287
A UNITED FRONT ON THE COURT by K. N. Llewellyn	288
NEW WAYS OF KILLING by H. C. Engelbrecht	290
THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY OF MINNESOTA by Charles R. Walker	292
WOMEN WORKERS IN NAZI GERMANY by Judith Grunfeld	295
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	297
JOHN L. LEWIS & CO. by Heywood Broun	298
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
AS IT WERE BEYOND THE WORLD by Mark Van Doren	299
GIRL AT THE PLAY by Muriel Rukeyser	300
THREE OF A KIND by James T. Farrell	300
BANKRUPT REALISM by Eliseo Vivas	301
THE PROBLEM OF THE ARTIST by Leo Katz	301
THE FIRST PURITANS by Mary McCarthy	302
SHORTER NOTICES	303
DRAMA: GENTLEMAN CROOK by Joseph Wood Krutch	304
FILMS: ALFRED HITCHCOCK by Mark Van Doren	305
DRAWINGS by Georges Schreiber

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

THE SINKING OF THE MAR CANTABRICO WAS an ironic event. The report, as we go to press, that it was loaded with airplanes and munitions is probably untrue. We have good authority for believing that it had landed the arms cargo in Spain a week before, and was carrying a shipload of Basque refugees (Franco supporters) to France. This was in accordance with an agreement reached by the loyalist Basque Catholic government for an exchange of prisoners with Franco. If our information proves true, it shows the confusion among the rebel forces.

★

THE INTERNATIONAL SEA AND LAND PATROL of Spain, intended to keep foreign arms and soldiers out of the country, waits on the settlement of details. The delay looks like sabotage. The Germans and Italians, not yet sure that Franco will win, wish to send no more supplies; while England is sure of nothing, not even its own mind. This postponement operates to the disadvantage of the legitimate government of Spain. The Italians and Germans enjoy an overwhelming preponderance in the air and have approximately 70,000 troops on the ground. Nevertheless, while the government is making headway at Toledo and Talavera de la Reina, the rebels are registering no advances anywhere; they are hard-pressed at Oviedo and at Malaga have been prevented altogether from making the threatened drive on Valencia. But the most encouraging development is the projected fusion of the National Anarchist trade unions (C. N. T.) with the Socialist-Communist trade unions (U. G. T.), which reflects a readiness on the part of the Anarchists to accept more rigid discipline at the front and in the rear. The Caballero government is reinforced, and progress toward a united military command is accelerated by these changes. The loyal soldiers have been fighting better because they feel that the political parties are squabbling less, and because the autonomy of various party regiments, which allowed them to decide whether or not they would accept military orders, is vanishing.

★

A SITDOWN IN THE CHRYSLER AND HUDSON plants, reported as we go to press, is the logical outcome of the General Motors victory. It means merely that General Motors is not the whole automobile industry. Since the C. I. O. is determined but reasonable we are certain that the struggle will not be protracted.

YOU MAY BE A NONCOMBATANT IN THE next war. Not a hero dying gloriously in the trenches, but a hungry civilian standing in line before a bakery shop or a grocery store hoping against hope that the supply of bread holds out or that there will still be milk for the children and the old people at home, who are also noncombatants. Americans may never have to live through the misery of a city under fire from the air. But international fascism plays no favorites. Bombs are falling in Madrid today. If Madrid succumbs to fascism, bombs will fall in other democratic cities tomorrow. The committee for The Nation's Food Ship does not ask you to help send guns to Spain. It does ask every American who hates fascism to help send food to Spanish women and children. They must be fed. The response so far to our appeal has been generous. We have had some large contributions and many, many small ones. It is these latter, we suspect, from average Americans who hate fascism, that will seem most reassuring to average Spaniards who are fighting off fascism almost with bare hands. We should like to have on the list of donors to the Food Ship Fund the name of every Nation subscriber and reader. It would constitute a manifesto of human sympathy that the whole world could read. Help us write it.

★

MAYOR LAGUARDIA'S NOW HISTORIC WORDS suggesting a "chamber of horrors" niche for the "brown-shirted fanatic," whatever their motivation, undoubtedly reflect the consensus of American public opinion. But however heartily we may wish to applaud the Mayor's spirit, we must recognize the unwisdom of his remarks. As part of his program Hitler itches to stir up anti-Semitism in this country. Conscious and articulate anti-Semitism is not indigenous in America, but a statement like the Mayor's offers Hitler a handle that he is more than ready to grasp. Just how ready he is the Angriff's specific threat shows: "We could take an interest in America that would not be pleasant. LaGuardia's racial comrades had better be on the watch against us." Fortunately in this instance the outburst of what Hugh Johnson calls the "push-button press" in Germany was so epileptic as to defeat its own ends. Attacks on LaGuardia—and for good measure on Governor Lehman and Secretary Morgenthau—couched in terms so disgusting that the New York Times correspondent said that if literally translated they would be unfit to print; wholesale abuse of American institutions and customs; above all, advice to our government to abolish the traditional American right of free speech have simply had the effect of turning this country more against Hitler than it was before.

★

MUSSOLINI'S TRIUMPHAL MARCH THROUGH his North African possessions will be capped, as this is read, by the dedication of a victory arch in the Libyan desert. The taste of triumph is now no doubt sweetened in his mouth by the Italian reprisals in Addis Ababa after the wounding of Marshal Graziani. They constitute perhaps the most insane brutality of our lifetime. According to the New York Times the Italian troops engaged in an orgy of slaughter and destruction in which 6,000 Ethiopians were massacred and their homes burned. The rampage lasted for three days, with officers exhorting the men to murder every native man, woman, or child they could find. The progress through Libya is an example of Il Duce's avid aping of Julius Caesar. But it alters Roman tradition in one respect. Whereas Caesar used to drag captured slaves, chained to his chariot wheels, through the streets of Rome, Mussolini considers that method antiquated. He simply wipes them all out ahead of time.

★

DOCTORS ARE WORRIED FOR FEAR THE DRIVE against venereal disease being conducted by Surgeon General Parran may not only wipe out the disease but incidentally the medical profession along with it. They fear that the advocacy by Dr. Parran and other public health officers of free clinics to report and treat the estimated 19,000,000 cases of syphilis in this country is a deliberate threat to private practice. In an article in Medical Economics it is stated that Dr. Parran and "certain unofficial groups" want public control over venereal diseases as a step toward socialized medicine. Admitting that less than 10 per cent of infected cases are under treatment by licensed physicians, the article nevertheless insists that free clinics should be limited to finding and reporting cases while treatment should be left to private physicians. This reminds us strongly of a letter made public by the La Follette investigating committee wherein one tear-gas manufacturer suggested to another that the President be enjoined from "stopping all of these strikes" because "his actions are absolutely in restraint of trade—that is, as far as we are concerned." If the article in Medical Economics actually represents the attitude of the American medical profession, it is the surest way we know of hastening the advent of state medicine.

★

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE RHINELAND COUP by the Hitler regime finds the world increasingly anxious with regard to the next Nazi putsch. The latest scare has occurred in Hungary, where an official investigation has discovered a powerful underground Nazi movement, well supplied with funds and receiving substantial support from high government officials. Although the disclosure of the facts appears to have warded off any danger of an immediate coup, the presence of many close friends of the late Premier Gömbös within the ranks of the conspirators has prevented Premier Daranyi from taking effective steps to suppress the movement. Elsewhere the situation is not so immediately threatening. In Austria the over-enthusiastic welcome given Baron von Neurath appears to have reacted, temporarily at least, against the local Nazis, and in Rumania the demonstrations of the fascist Iron Guards in favor of General Franco seem also to have backfired. Left to itself, it is doubtful whether the pro-Nazi movement in any of these three countries would be important. But it is evident that help is being received. Reports from each country tell of huge expenditures of money in support of anti-Semitic, pro-Nazi activities. Only constant alertness on the part of the democratic countries can prevent Hitler from launching on his next adventure in this unhappy region.

★

A STIR HAS BEEN CAUSED IN FINANCIAL circles by the action of the SEC in listing the refunding bond issue of the German government with a statement calling attention to the unrecorded German debt. The commission's estimate of this hidden debt as five billion marks on June 30, 1935, seems over-conservative. The Banker, a conservative British publication, recently devoted an entire issue to a comprehensive survey of present-day Germany. It calculated the total expenditures for armaments in the past four years—an item previously of little importance in the budget—at thirty-one billion marks. The debt was listed at sixteen billion. Other estimates of it run from twenty to twenty-five billion. It would be a mistake, however, to assume from these figures that Germany is on the verge of inflation or collapse. A totalitarian state has the power to check inflation whenever it chooses to do so. Nor need it fear a panic on the financial markets. Finance is capable of almost unlimited manipulation. Germany's economic weakness is far more fundamental in character. The country lacks grain of all kinds, fats, and raw materials, and no amount of juggling can replace the human and natural resources that have been drained away in armaments.

★

PASSAGE OF THE NAVAL-SUPPLY BILL OF $526,555,000 by the House of Representatives calls attention to our utter lack of a sensible naval policy. The navy's spokesmen say we must adopt a naval building program on a "second-to-none" basis. Even if there were any reason for such a policy, it is obvious, in the light of the British Admiralty's announcement of a program involving twenty-five capital ships by 1942, that the appropriation passed by the House does not meet it. And even if it did, what possible eventuality could warrant a second-to-none navy? The only two countries which could conceivably muster the means to attack our shores—Great Britain and Japan—could not conceivably want anything from us that would be worth attacking us to get. As pointed out in the first issue of Amerasia, the new monthly review of America and the Far East, our naval policy has been one long contradiction of our political foreign policy. Politically we do not even contemplate the possibility of war with Great Britain; yet we insist on naval parity with it. Politically we raise the cry "freedom of the seas"; yet we should have to have a navy not equal to but bigger than anyone else's to guarantee us that. Politically the issues between us and Japan are the Open Door and, by virtue of the Nine Power Treaty, the integrity of China. In spite of ample opportunity we have never used our navy in defense of either. When the naval-supply bill comes up in the Senate, its members should demand some clarification of these absurd and costly contradictions.

THE METHODS A HEARST NEWSPAPER USES came home last week to the Nation staff. Max Lerner, one of the editors, spoke in Washington on the Supreme Court before a group of the diplomatic corps. He took the position that, viewed by itself, the President's plan did not go far enough, but that along with an eventual constitutional amendment it would solve the problems of the judicial power. The Washington Herald, a Hearst paper, headed its account of the speech, "Editor Hits Court Plan," tore remarks out of their context, reshuffled them to its heart's content, and twisted what was left beyond recognition. This is freedom of the press.

★

MOST OF THE DRAMATIC CRITICS, AMONG them our own, praised Arthur Kober's "Having Wonderful Time" for its "tenderness." Their unanimity made us aware that "tenderness" seems to be coming in again. Ten years ago it was a fighting word so far as self-respecting playwrights were concerned. They all aspired to earn the epithet "brutal," and anyone who was called less than "stark" was foredoomed to disgrace and failure. Today terms like "amiable," "engaging," and even "pleasant" actually get into blurbs, so there is no telling where it all will end. Maxwell Anderson's "High Tor" is positively playful, even if his other two plays are not. And among the other big successes of the moment not one is "grim," if you leave out of account those two classics of a past age, "Richard II" and "Tobacco Road." Only Mr. Benchley seems to be holding out against sweetness and light. He told his readers in the New Yorker that he walked out on a certain play about the keeper of a bawdy house who had a heart of gold, "not because I don't like plays about keepers of bawdy houses but because I don't like plays about hearts of gold."

Europe's Economic War

THE possibility that a military conflict may be postponed for a year, or even longer, has led Europe to turn its attention to the basic economic struggle which ultimately must decide its destiny. All the great powers have taken steps to prepare for the final showdown, but the measures have been most dramatic in Germany and France. After following a more or less consistent policy in the direction of self-sufficiency for years, the Hitler government has suddenly reversed itself, restricted its imports of raw materials for armaments and Ersatz, increased its imports of foodstuffs and industrial raw materials, and launched a drive to regain its neglected export markets. It is hoped that a revival of export trade may make possible a larger inflow of necessary foodstuffs, and that ultimately the country will thus be able to purchase a larger amount of strategic raw materials, of which it is desperately short.

Simultaneously with its efforts to strengthen its own economy, Germany has embarked on a desperate attempt to weaken the French economic structure. The Blum government is admittedly facing a difficult budgetary situation. Armament and social expenditures have risen to a much greater extent than revenues. The huge gold reserves of a few years ago have largely been dissipated by the many crises of the franc. Hitler's contempt for social democracy has apparently led him to believe that France is bound to pass through an acute financial crisis such as Germany faced in 1931, which will ultimately prepare the ground for fascism. Consequently, he is reported to be using a portion of Germany's slim foreign exchange to depress French credit in the hope of precipitating the crisis.

Actually, the recent measures taken by the Blum government indicate that the French economic situation is not nearly so unfavorable as the reactionaries, both in France and abroad, have tried to picture it. The restoration of gold payments and the promise to redeem the new defense bonds in gold indicate a strength not equaled by many countries today. France is second only to the United States in gold reserves. The economic revival promises to balance the budget. Industrial production was 4 per cent higher in December than in the corresponding month a year ago. The engineering trades were running 10 per cent above the previous year, and railway receipts and carloadings showed a marked increase. Unemployment has dropped by more than 15 per cent. The revaluation of the franc makes it possible to wipe out the budgetary deficit and frustrate the efforts of reactionaries to deprive the government of credit.

Meanwhile, Neville Chamberlain's plan for financing Britain's vast armament program has created for that country a situation potentially similar to that from which the Nazis are trying to escape. A huge loan of £400,000,000 is to be floated on the basis of an expansion of credit which will be undeniably inflationary in its consequences. As the pound sinks and commodity prices rise, the raw materials which are needed for England's moribund export industries will become unobtainable. The cost of living will rise more rapidly than wages until the country finds itself with an abundance of cannon but with little bread and a seriously damaged national economy.

By and large, France and England still have a tremendous advantage in the economic struggle which is developing. They are superior to Germany in natural resources; they have not as yet squandered their wealth in a suicidal attempt to create an impossible national self-sufficiency; they have ample gold; and they have been able thus far to maintain a much higher standard of living for the masses. Germany's only hope, economically, would lie in a complete abandonment of Nazi economics and an attempt—with British and French aid—to regain its former place in the markets of the world. But this can only be achieved through cooperation. In attempting to weaken France, Hitler is playing a desperate game. If he wins and France is thrown into confusion, Germany will almost certainly be carried down in the economic maelstrom. For even enemy nations cannot isolate themselves from each other economically. And if he loses, as seems almost certain in view of his lack of resources, he will have played his last card.

Roosevelt on the Radio

IN terms of sheer skill, Mr. Roosevelt's radio speech on March 4 at the Democratic victory dinner ranks high even among the Roosevelt speeches. It was great oratory—which means that it made use of every resource of speaker and occasion, and there was even in it a persuasiveness which sometimes went beyond its material. We know several persons who refused to listen to it on the radio, lest by its amenities they be seduced into agreement with it. They preferred to see it in sober cold newsprint the next morning, where they could meet it behind the fortifications of their favorite columnists. Mr. Roosevelt on the radio is a political force to be reckoned with—especially when he is fighting for the common people, to whom the radio alone can furnish him access.

We said last week, commenting on the interview Mr. Roosevelt gave Arthur Krock, that much of its strength lay in its deep and reasonable seriousness. We wish Mr. Roosevelt had couched his radio speech in the same strain. It was a great "fighting speech." But its very militancy lent fuel to the charges that Mr. Roosevelt could brook no interference. The President spoke like a man with his back against the wall—like one of those incredible cavaliers out of Dumas who is never at his best as a swordsman until he is trapped and surrounded by the mercenaries of his enemies. One thing, however, may be said. It needed a fighting speech to put an end to the talk of the President's craftiness, and his intent to establish a dictatorship by indirection. Here, finally, was hard and straight hitting.

There will still be many to question the President's sincerity. We are not among them. There can be no doubt that Mr. Roosevelt now has the habit of perspective, and sees himself as a historian twenty-five years from now will see him. He sees his historic function as that of stabilizing capitalist democracy by reforming it. We believe he is right in this view of himself; right also in his belief that the continued power of the Supreme Court is the surest way to capitalist collapse and civil war. We agree moreover that the action taken must be taken now, and not postponed until the incredibly slow wheels of the amending process have ground out permission to go forward. As Professor Llewellyn points out on another page, whatever may have been the alternatives once, Mr. Roosevelt has now set the issue. If his proposal is lost, all chance of an amendment will also be lost.

But, once the road ahead is clear, what sort of conveyance will the nation use? It is significant that four years after his first inaugural speech the President returns to the identical phrase he used on that day—"what we must have is action and action now." It is a good pragmatic formula that may lead almost anywhere. Four years ago it led to the NRA. There is no assurance that in the next four years it will lead much farther.

There is, however, a chance. Surveying the past four years Mr. Roosevelt may see them as having projected a legislative program adequate in itself, but which it is now his business to consolidate. Or he may see a sequence of trial and error, only partly successful, with the next four years offering a chance to push farther with a deepened experience and maturity. If the latter is the more accurate picture of the President's mind, there may be a significance in the fact that he made his speech at a Democratic victory dinner. Here was a warning to his party that if it could not move along with the people's needs, it would die as the Ice Age animals died when they could not adapt themselves to the new world climate. In the long run we doubt whether his party will heed Mr. Roosevelt's warning. The party of the future is being forged today in the mills and factories of the nation.

Is the State Department Favoring Franco?

VERY convincing evidence is available that President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull are opposed to fascism. At Buenos Aires the President made a ringing plea for democracy. He has made other speeches which have stung the fascist powers. But the Administration's deeds do violence to the President's convictions.

The State Department permitted oil, an instrument of war, to be exported to Italy, thus allowing Mussolini to add Abyssinia to his empire. Yet it will not permit humanitarian doctors and nurses to help the Spanish democrats. Not by the widest stretch of the imagination could the professional activities of a medical unit be conceived of as likely to involve us in war or even in diplomatic trouble. The members of such a unit go at their own risk. If they are killed or captured, that is their bad luck. Doctors and nurses have always gone to foreign battlefields to minister to the wounded. For our State Department, with the President's knowledge, to discard this tradition is evidence that it has bowed to the American reactionaries who sympathize with General Franco.

A letter to the Spanish Medical Committee from the State Department urged Americans to give their money for medical aid to the International Red Cross so that it could send medical men to Spain. It is all right, then, for Swedes or Frenchmen or Britishers to go with ambulances to Spain, but not for Americans. If the International Red Cross invited an American blood-transfusion expert or a head-wound specialist to cooperate with it in Spain, the State Department would refuse him a passport. We suspect strongly that the State Department made this ruling because the International Red Cross presumably functions impartially in both camps. It wants American trade unionists, liberals, and anti-fascists to contribute medical aid for Franco.

As far as we know, the International Red Cross has not done any medical work in loyalist Spain, and the civil war is in its eighth month. Its activity has been limited to negotiations for the release of the Spanish fascists, nobles, landowners, and other reactionaries who took refuge in the foreign missions of Madrid to wait for Franco's triumphal entry. Since this event has been postponed too long for their comfort, they would like to go to France, whence they might join the rebel forces. The Red Cross is ready to assist them in this endeavor.

The continuous bombing of civilian Madrid is the worst atrocity in modern times, and it pursues no military objective. Americans who are shocked by this ruthlessness want to aid Madrid. The State Department thinks it can stop them. It thereby displays its true political colors. Any assistance to loyalist Spain, be it in the form of medicine or food, strengthens the legal government in its struggle with the fascists. The State Department dislikes that.

If the American government simply wants to restrain its citizens from going into the war theater, newspaper correspondents should be kept out too. They can also be killed or captured. We ought to depend solely on foreign sources of information. We should recall all diplomatic representatives and close the embassy in Madrid. Instead, only a fortnight ago we sent a consul into Malaga after its occupation by Franco, with whom we have no official relations. Does the White House approve of that?

Many nations dispatched field hospitals to Abyssinia during the late war. An American was close adviser to Haile Selassie. American journalists worked in Addis Ababa. The State Department allowed Mussolini openly to recruit Italians in the United States for fighting in Ethiopia. But God forbid that anything of value should go to the people of Spain, who are stemming a foreign fascist invasion! Franco might resent it. The Catholic church might think it sinful.

The Catholic church is the key. Because he must overcome Catholic hostility to his Supreme Court proposal, the President yields to the church on Spain. The Supreme Court issue is important. But in the long run, Spain is also important. You cannot combat reaction at home and encourage it to gobble up all Europe. If as a result of the prolongation of the Spanish struggle Europe is involved in war, we may be able to keep out for a while, but the war scare and the war atmosphere will enable American reactionaries to put an end to civil liberties and to insist on more militarism and preparedness. The battle for liberalism in the United States is bound up with the anti-fascist cause in Europe. To make concessions to the Catholic church's hostile stand toward the Spanish people in order to win it over to acceptance of the Supreme Court shake-up is a vain effort and mistaken strategy.

Democracy in the version of it supported by the Catholic church and Hearst should have died with the President's smashing victory at the polls last November. The hamstringing of democracy by the bureaucracy of the State Department runs counter to the recent national election, to the will of the working class as revealed in the C. I. O. victories, and to the vast, expressed and unexpressed American sympathy for the Spanish republic and its democratically elected government. President Roosevelt wishes to prevent the Supreme Court from interfering with his efforts to adapt American economy to modern needs. In this endeavor we support him. But it would be wise for him to eject from the State Department and our consular service the fascist-minded reactionaries who are obstructing his foreign policy.

Steel Victory—and After

THE capitulation of United States Steel to the Committee for Industrial Organization is an event spectacular in itself and highly significant in the national picture. The question of how it came about is still uppermost in the minds of most people. The answer is complex. The C. I. O. forces have been the shock troops in the broad movement that has opened up the fortresses of steel and automobiles and is now sweeping across the whole industrial landscape; but it could not have been so successful if it had not had the support of a great section of the middle class, which in a period of returning prosperity following upon severe depression has joined its strength with that of labor. In November labor and its allies voted overwhelmingly and consciously for a broad program of social legislation which would increase security and earning power. Collective bargaining is an efficient instrument, as well as a democratic method, for achieving these ends. As for the element of suddenness, first in the automobile and now in the steel development, it is directly related to the political backwardness of a country ripe for social change. The organization of the basic industries and the setting up of extensive social legislation, both of which are old history in other democratic countries, have been held back here as by a dam because of peculiar American historical factors. Once the dam was breached by the greatest (so far) of all crises, both were bound to come with a rush.

The Roosevelt Administration has of late been giving vigorous expression to the desires of the labor and middle-class groups that reelected it. It is, for one thing, easier to be antagonistic to big business in a period of growing prosperity than in any other capitalist season. The most important present manifestation is the fight on the Supreme Court—which is designed to save the whole network of social legislation upheld or authorized by the November landslide. This network of legislation was a crucial background element in the steel and automobile victories, especially when joined with the circumstance that labor without question elected Governor Murphy of Michigan and Governor Earle of Pennsylvania. Today the union can rent a hall in any steel town, and Governor Earle proclaims his solidarity with labor at every opportunity. Meanwhile the La Follette committee has relentlessly exposed the labor spy and told who hires him, while the National Labor Relations Board has gone thoroughly into the delicate structure of the company union. Steel has lost both its first line of defense against trade unions, the state police apparatus, and its second, the federal government's indifference. United States Steel's last serious attempt to stem the tide came just after the election when it granted, through its company union, a rise in pay tied to the cost-of-living index. The attempt was a dismal failure, and it was then that the corporation resigned itself to the C. I. O. and began negotiations.

Aside from the general political climate which has literally turned night into day in many a steel town there was another pressure which was probably the determining one in the whole matter. We refer to the desire for great profit. The Administration used the pressure of the Walsh-Healey Act. United States Steel wants government contracts. In addition there was the pressure of a whole world just beginning an armament race. Great Britain particularly is working against time. The General Motors strike showed United States Steel how tightly an industry can be closed down with this new-fangled industrial unionism—and after it was all over the union won anyway. Customers who are feverishly preparing for the next war do not want to run the risk of not having orders filled on schedule, and the local business community thinks the corporation will have to give in some time. United States Steel scratched its head. With the Administration so set on it, and the S. W. O. C. so obviously bent on seeing it through, collective bargaining looked inevitable. Why retard recovery and lose British orders by allowing a strike, especially when the added labor cost can be passed on to the consumer and labor can be blamed for the higher prices? The great irony of the labor victory is that it was made possible, in part, by the next war.

So much for the reasons why United States Steel signed up. The settlement signifies no change of heart toward labor and labor organization. It merely means that the fight will be conducted henceforth on a different plane. We shall probably see now the fostering of the "yellow" or "independent" union which has been much used in Europe. There will be a rising movement for the incorporation of unions and for other legal restraints, with the British trades-disputes act serving as a model. The most insidious campaign will consist in the attempt to buy off the leaders of labor with lucrative jobs or political favors. It has worked here and in Europe.

This danger is a long-range one which will become a problem in a time of crisis. The immediate weapon against labor is the rise in prices. Labor's middle-class allies will be first to feel the pinch. In an article on the settlement a New York Times reporter wrote: "It is said that Mr. Lewis [in his talks with Myron C. Taylor] showed a broad point of view in discussing problems faced by the two men and was fully aware that the higher wages which he asked for labor could only be obtained through higher prices" for steel. Assuming that Mr. Lewis has been correctly represented, this broad view in favor of a monopoly whose margin of profit has never been small is disquieting, especially since the Administration seems to share it. In the present instance it may not be a serious factor, but the tendency to raise prices every time labor wins higher pay will increase neither genuine purchasing power nor the prestige of trade unions. We must distribute the wealth, not inflate it.

We may now expect the rapid unionization of textiles, aluminum, oil, and other major industries. We may also expect a new spurt in social legislation. For a time the Administration will continue to give scope to the desires of labor and the middle class. Eventually, however, it will seem necessary to rein in. At that moment labor, to hold its gains, will be forced to strike out for itself politically. Will labor be ready for the test?

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

A New WPA Set-up

Washington, March 7

A WHOLLY new type of unemployment relief program is being cooked up here. Harry L. Hopkins is bossing the job as chief cook. He has as active assistants a number of important mayors, such as LaGuardia, and several equally important governors, such as Lehman of New York and La Follette of Wisconsin. In addition, he has recruited more than 125 members of Congress, including Representatives Maverick, Pierce, Voorhis, O'Day, Hill, and Coffee, who today issued a statement outlining the new plan without identifying its sources or the fact that it is part of a grand design. It remains to be seen whether Roosevelt will stand for it and whether the opposition to it of his fiscal advisers can be overcome. Heretofore the Administration's relief forces have worked out their programs only to find them chopped up by the fiscal boys to fit an over-all budgetary pattern. Those plotting the new program intend that the fiscal boys shall share responsibility for its making at least until their education in relief problems has progressed to the point where they see those problems in relation to the whole national economy.

The new program is based on the assumptions that we are going to keep our capitalist system without material change; that under any such system, with profits as sole determinants, private industry is never again going to provide jobs for all those able and willing to work; that, as a result, we are going to have on our hands a permanent body of several million unemployed; and that it is the duty of the federal government to provide work for those millions. It is proposed, therefore, that permanent machinery be set up for fulfilling that duty. The central point of departure from current and past experiments in the field of unemployment relief, however, is not in the permanency factor of the new program under consideration but in its proposal to abolish the means test and approach the problem from a straight job-making angle. Under the new program the federal government would set out to employ all the able-bodied unemployed in the country, irrespective of need. The WPA no longer would look to the relief agencies to certify persons from their rolls for WPA jobs. Destitution would cease to be a prerequisite to WPA employment. Instead, the WPA would draw its workers from the rolls of the United States Employment Service, and any able-bodied person could qualify, including the possessor of a job in private industry who preferred WPA conditions.

The program in its entirety is much larger than that. It envisages a broadening of the Social Security Act to extend the benefits of unemployment insurance and old-age pensions to millions not covered at present. It also encompasses an expansion and refinement of the Administration's agricultural policies to reduce to a minimum that huge percentage of our farm and rural population which under present circumstances can never be self-supporting. Finally, it presupposes the establishment of a broad and flexible program of public works geared to regional and national fluctuations in private employment, to the work capacities of the men and women who never again will get private jobs because of age and prolonged unemployment, and to the needs of the nation in conservation and improvement of its natural resources. It is a vast program, and its vastness perhaps can be gathered best from the fact that the men behind it are talking in terms of an annual outlay topping $4,000,000,000 in contrast to the hope expressed by Roosevelt that the federal relief outlay for the year beginning July 1 could be kept in the neighborhood of $1,500,000,000.

Although undoubtedly appalled by the expense involved, Roosevelt is said to be attracted by the program's promise to act as a support and lever under the nation's wage structure and give force to his ambition to see the nation's standard of living definitely pegged to higher levels when he quits the White House in 1941. There can be no doubt that past and present activities of the Administration in the field of unemployment relief have accounted for much of the current recovery and for almost all of the upward trend in wages. They also have given immeasurable support to the unionization drive.

Details of the program can be worked out only after Congress gives the signal and fixes the program's limits. It is proposed to make it a completely federalized program. The theory behind this phase of the program is strongly supported by statistics showing that if matching contributions from local sources are required, the program can never be tailored to fit the unemployment problem, for those communities where the unemployment problem is most serious cannot pay their share of the bill; they are—like Chicago—broke. Direct federal supervision, it is argued, would also simplify administration and reduce costs, in addition to reducing political interference. The reports of the National Resources Committee would be drawn upon heavily for the designing of projects, and the program's sponsors swear that from this source alone they can contrive a sufficient number of projects to provide genuine employment for all the permanently unemployed for years to come. They also vow that all the projects would be useful and necessary ones, yielding the nation a return on its investment in them. The statement by Maverick makes this point: "Government projects to be definitely planned to stimulate all industry and open new opportunities for Americans.

Conserving soils and developing new fertile lands will do this. Low-cost housing will do it. Cheaper power will do it. So will other projects." The statement adds as another point: "The recreation, theater, and fine-arts projects to be continued and improved with a view to developing the hidden creative talents of all groups of citizens in America and giving the benefits of these talents to all society."

Here are some of the factors that are shaping the program. Many of the 2,200,000 now employed on WPA projects are only partially employable. Private industry won't absorb them because of their age or because they have been too long away from their usual occupations. At the end of past depressions most of the men and women who were then of comparable age got their jobs back. But the length of the latest depression and the inexorable march of technological advance in industry have changed all that. By the end of 1937, the WPA estimates, approximately 1,000,000 of the men and women now employed on WPA projects will have been away from their usual, or pre-depression, occupations for five years or more. The WPA's statistics also show a definite relation between age and length of unemployment, just as the United States Employment Service's files contain data on the relationship between age and employability in private industry. A survey made of the heads of former relief families who had obtained private jobs in the spring of 1936 showed that only 27 per cent were forty-five years old or more.

Age is the greatest handicap for the unskilled in seeking to regain private employment. It decreases in importance as a handicap as skill increases, but even among the skilled workers, according to the WPA's studies, the age of fifty is the stopping point. In 1930 only 29.9 per cent of the persons gainfully occupied in this country were over forty-five. Today the proportion probably is much smaller. As of June, 1936, 38.8 per cent of the 2,256,000 men and women then working on WPA projects were over forty-five years old and 49.9 per cent were over forty. Taken together these figures do more than point the fact that a majority of those now employed under the WPA are not going to get back into private industry. They show that the remaining army of unemployed in dwindling to irreducible proportions is becoming a body of men and women made up chiefly of the unskilled and of persons who are declining in their capacity for work while still far short of pension age. They present a serious problem to the engineers in devising projects. By obliterating the means test the proposed new program would permit the engineers to fill in the gaps with younger and more skilled workers who for one reason or another have not qualified for the relief rolls or have qualified too late for WPA jobs under the present program. It is estimated that of the 1,200,000 persons on local, non-federal relief rolls, between 40 and 60 per cent are employables, and the number is being increased as families which thus far have managed to stay off relief exhaust their last resources.

A United Front on the Court

BY K. N. LLEWELLYN

THE Supreme Court issue has reached the stage where an anti-tory united front becomes necessary, moving along the only line which is immediately practicable, to wit, the President's program. It is lamentable that this should have become necessary. The President's program is unfortunate from every angle but one; it is much as if a man who needed transportation should mortgage his future for four times the price of a good car, to buy a buggy and an elephant. The choice has become, however, one between the elephant-and-buggy or no transportation at all.

The underlying issue is clear. It is not age or pressure of business. It is the attitude of justices toward allowing the government to attempt desperately needed social and economic readjustments, partly known, in greater part as yet unforeseen.

Now the Supreme Court has become, and is, the embodiment and oracle of the Constitution. What seems to escape many liberals, especially liberal constitutional lawyers, is that the court will continue to be such embodiment and oracle despite most considerable overhauling. The court's position is not dependent upon matters which —like this one—are tiny in relation to its great tradition and function. Let us not lose perspective. The idea and ideal of the Constitution are of tremendous value to our national life. An idea and an ideal need embodiment to remain effective; but the embodiment takes on much of the sanctity of the ideal. Moreover, the court has, over the long haul, given great and statesmanlike service. Even in the more recent unfortunate decisions, its veto has forced the drafting of better and more adequate legislation.

But the court has persistently and continuously overstepped that reasonable leeway to go wrong which any oracle requires if it is to be wise. The present is again a time of need and crisis. We need action. But the majority of the court have given sign that they do not propose to let us have the action which we need, or even a reasonable part of it, or even to experiment toward salvation. Primitive peoples, in such conditions, get rid of the priest or the oracle. When rain fails persistently, they act.

The President proposes nothing so drastic. He proposes only putting enough new blood into our college of priests to overcome the inertia of the more frozen members. It is fairly to be expected that this will, for the moment, get results. Such results will come at an embarrassing cost. I do not indeed feel that the move will really shake the authority of the court among any persons who would not have had their respect shaken equally by a mere shift in the present alignment of the justices. For the Supreme Court is hardy as a mountain cedar; it has maintained its high position through worse storms than this, despite the prophets of calamity then and now.

Justice McReynolds

What is unfortunate is the fact that as a bench increases in size, its capacity to do the work of a bench—really to consult and advise together, instead of making speeches at one another—rapidly decreases. Seven would today be a more effective working team than nine. It is not to be forgotten that the court carries a huge load of business, business worth doing well, which never gets into the public prints at all. That load will be worse handled, much worse, by fifteen. Nor is it to be forgotten that mere approval of legislation is not the task even of a liberal majority. They have before them a necessary and terrific labor, of overhauling our whole theory of constitutional law. Leave that task undone or badly done, and our children will inherit trouble. It is a task which calls for sustained and coherent group-thinking hard to work out in any bench of many members.

It troubles me less that the President's proposed action amounts to "meddling with the court." This court and others have been meddled with again and again, without losing their independence. Life tenure alone gives a fair assurance on that point; let alone the well-known mis-guesses of recent Presidents about their appointees; or, say, the history of New York's successive remodeling of its highest court. The most troublesome thought is that, this one measure accomplished, the reform movement may die down. We need, beyond the President's proposal, provision for a two-thirds' vote, at least, to wipe out an act of the two constitutionally coordinate powers. We need also an amendment expressly and unequivocally enlarging the powers of Congress—preferably under the general-welfare clause. To have such more permanent measures as these choked off by the President's proposed poulticing of the existent evil would be tragic.

But the issue has been drawn. It has been inescapably drawn. Lose the President's proposal (or some substantial analogue) and all chance for any amendment will be lost. All men and women of any political persuasion who believe that some reform of the court is needed must rally behind this, or else get nothing. That lies plain on the face of events. I honor any who sincerely believe that the remedy proposed is worse than the disease. I honor any who see so clearly the "more" which they want that the present proposal shrinks for them into significance. I think both, however, not long-headed in the matter, but short-sighted, however great-hearted. If this proposal goes through, an amendment may follow. There is a chance that success may gather momentum, and go on really to cure the situation, instead of merely helping us out over the next six or eight years with a fresh-baked but perhaps stale-growing majority on the court.

It is not pleasant for one interested in adequate legal engineering to be forced into "Yes" or "No" on such a costly, inept, and equivocal line of engineering as the President has proposed. But issues are drawn by the powers that be. We cannot redraw them. If need be, we must accept even the absurd proposals for enlarging the federal judicial personnel—instead of providing existing judges with qualified legal secretaries—as an unwelcome part of the price for the one most-needed renovation of our governmental structure. The lesser evil, and so much of the needed good as can immediately be attained, lies unmistakably in supporting the President in this proposal. In supporting him—and actively. In setting up a counter-barrage of opinion and of pressure. In keeping up and increasing that counter-barrage. To be inert is to be over-ridden—and ridden over. We need a united front.

If we can get it, we need a better reform bill, carrying less waste and extra baggage. Until it comes out of committee, lawyers should work on the committee, to that end. But that is not the major issue. Whatever bill comes out of committee backed by the President needs fighting support.

Justice Stone

New Ways of Killing

BY H. C. ENGELBRECHT

IN THE next war will our young men be burned to ashes by a "death ray," shocked to fragments by sound-wave oscillations, or annihilated by the "death centrifuge"? Will there be rays to reach into the skies and destroy aircraft? Will there be flying submarines, flying tanks, aerial torpedoes, and stratosphere bombers? Will there be available an "invisible smoke" to choke aircraft engines and send them gliding down to earth? Will the soldiers wear clothes made out of glass or perhaps carry along iron cages as protection against "death rays"? And which of these methods are ready for use? Which are still in the experimental stage?

These important questions are answered by two German émigrés in an ominous volume.* The authors, one a student of politics, the other an engineer, point out that in Germany the people are being told that a number of new and frightfully destructive war engines will decide any war in Germany's favor a few days after its outbreak. These inventions are dark secrets, unknown to any other country; therefore the Germans can sleep peacefully in the certain knowledge that war holds for them neither terror nor danger of defeat. This propaganda campaign is aided by sensational notices in the world press about mysterious new armaments.

Most of this talk is nonsense. All nations are pretty well informed about new armament developments in other countries. The international arms industry is not interested in military secrets. Technical journals in all countries describe the latest scientific discoveries, patent offices record new inventions, and international patent pools make new machines available to all who will pay the royalties. Finally it must be remembered that failure to try out new war engines in maneuvers involves serious risks, and that experimentation on a large scale can never be completely secret. It is unlikely, therefore, that any nation will long be in exclusive possession of a new war machine. The various spy services make doubly sure that there is little lag between the invention and the world-wide distribution of a new killing device.

It is very unlikely, then, that Nazi Germany will pull any surprises out of its sleeve in the next war. But that is not necessary, for the known instruments, especially those developed since 1930, are terrifying enough. The only question that remains unanswered is whether the old weapons—the "improved" machine-guns, artillery, shrapnel, bombs, and such—will not prove as effective as the new ones, and much cheaper.

Great efforts have been made to adapt various kinds of rays for use in war. In the mind of the public all have been lumped together under the term "death ray." The scientific principles involved, however, and the rays employed differ widely; a dozen different rays may be used for a dozen different purposes. The most widely hailed of the rays is the one that is supposed to stop airplanes in their tracks by ruining their motors. It has been suggested that a country could surround itself with an invisible wall of these rays and make it impossible for a plane to cross this "deadline." Unfortunately, this is largely imagination. The rays can reach some low-flying planes and automobiles, where contact with the ground can be established, but their range is still very limited. Also it is simple to shield an engine against them as radio sets are now shielded. In spite of press notices that connect Marconi and Tesla with this defensive weapon, it is not yet a practical reality.

Other rays are to be used for destroying the brain, dissolving the blood, or burning up the body of enemy troops. In each case a different ray would be used. At short distances these have proved disastrous even to oxen, but they do not reach far and they can be stopped by an iron or copper cage which catches them and makes them harmless.

A lead ray which travels almost with the speed of light is also under experimentation. This "ray bullet" is still weak, and absolute protection against it is afforded by glass clothes. This does not mean that the soldiers will be inclosed in glass cages, but implies rather the use of a new textile into which glass is woven. This material is durable and washable and is already widely manufactured by the Czecho-Slovak glass industry for scarfs and mufflers of brilliant hues designed for its South American trade.

Much more practical is the direction by radio of distant craft. This technique has been fully developed for some time, and by its use aircraft, ships, and tanks can be maneuvered from a distance without the presence of a human being on board. The first attempts to experiment at sea with this method of warfare go back to 1899, and since then regular maneuvers have been held with these "ghost vessels" by all great navies. They can obey over a hundred commands, including the direction of their course, the use of searchlights, the firing of torpedoes, and so forth. Although it is unlikely that larger vessels will be handled in this way, smaller ones certainly will. They can be used to lay mines or, loaded with explosives, to crash into any desired object. Already we have the fantastic conception of an aircraft carrier with its planes carrying not a single human being. The ship is directed to any desired position and the planes take off while the directing human will is miles away, on land or on another vessel. Aircraft can be handled in similar fashion, torpedoes also. Tanks are more difficult to control by radio because they roll over uneven ground and the jolting tends to put out of order the delicate guiding mechanism.

* "Todesstrahlen und andere neue Kriegswaffen." By Max Seydewitz and Kurt Doberer. London: Malik Verlag. $2.

Because the guiding mechanism is not always reliable and because the target may unexpectedly change, these "ghost ships" and "ghost planes" have their limitations. The mechanism is also expensive and is almost certain to be destroyed. Several powers have decided, therefore, that it is still cheaper and more effective to use human beings. The most sensational use of human agencies in this field is to be found in the suicide squads of the Japanese and Italian navies. The Japanese method is to place a volunteer—there is apparently no dearth of candidates—inside a torpedo, where he can direct it with unfailing accuracy. The volunteer gives his life for the sake of serious damage or destruction of a war vessel with the possible death of hundreds of sailors and marines. The Italians had similar suicide squads on their mosquito fleet and the aircraft with which they threatened the British in the Ethiopian imbroglio.

An exceedingly dangerous death machine is the aerial torpedo. This is also guided from a distance. In 1922 General William Mitchell reported that he had sent three of these from Garden City, Long Island, to Trenton, New Jersey, a distance of 110 kilometers, with absolute accuracy. Since then great improvements have been made. These torpedoes may carry bombs and drop them at various intervals, or they may be bombs themselves and descend, according to direction, at strategic spots.

Still another kind of ray sets off mines and other explosives, on land or in the water. There are blinding rays, so bright that soldiers will be blinded at least temporarily as by an automobile headlight a thousand times intensified. By contrast, invisible searchlights have been developed to pick up aircraft and warships at night. The ordinary searchlight is as much a disability as an aid. In searching the skies for hostile craft, it lights up the entire region and makes a target for the enemy. The new invention uses invisible rays which can be seen only with special glasses. The American fleet used this device with great success in maneuvers off the Jersey coast in 1935.

The difficulty with all these rays is that they require some kind of power plant. A gasoline engine near the front lines is vulnerable and can be destroyed. The easiest way is to lay wires to the front where the machines are to be used. But the front changes frequently, and the wires have to be cut before a sector is abandoned. Such difficulties are overcome when the machines are operated from a fortress as defense measures. The French fortifications are well equipped with various electrical devices, and the power to operate them is readily available there.

Fantastic experiments are being carried on in the field of sound waves. It was discovered in South Africa that an invasion of grasshoppers could be repelled by the use of a siren. The sound waves of the siren made the grasshoppers flee in terror. It has been found, further, that oscillations of enormous frequency have the power to destroy. But actual destruction of living organisms has not yet been carried beyond small-scale laboratory experiments on frogs, micro-organisms, and such.

In the field of air defense some significant developments have been recorded. Until recently the outlook for warding off death from the air was dismal, indeed, but today there exist several seemingly effective means of defense. The most promising is "invisible smoke" or dust, the purpose of which is to choke aircraft engines. A gasoline engine must breathe. If the air it sucks in is clogged with metallic dust, the engine will choke and die, and the airplane will be stopped in its tracks. That is the principle of "invisible smoke." It was discovered that certain materials in dust form, possibly aluminum, remained in the air for a long period of time. These materials can be fired from anti-aircraft guns, forming a curtain of the metallic dust which will cause the breakdown of aircraft engines.

The difficulty is that this smoke will not permit defending aircraft to operate. But its use is considered so promising that counter-measures have already been taken. Germany is beginning to use the steam engine for aircraft, since this type of engine does not "breathe" and so is not susceptible to invisible smoke. Experiments with the steam engine, particularly those of an American inventor, have been very successful. The steam in the engines is cooled and returns 99 per cent of the water used for further steam. This development was thought so important by the Germans that they guarded it as closely as possible. The Poles, however, were interested, and their efforts to discover the facts led to the notorious Sosnowski affair several years ago. This Polish nobleman, operating in German society circles, ferreted out the secret of the steam airplane engine. As a result two prominent German noblewomen lost their heads. The secret, however, was out. The drawback of the steam-driven airplane is that a gasoline-motored machine can out-manuever it. On the other hand, it can spread invisible smoke itself in order to cripple the attacking gasoline craft.

Airplanes can also be stopped by so primitive a defense method as steel nets suspended from balloons. These were used in the World War by the Italians in the defense of Venice; they were a natural device for a people accustomed to snaring birds. The Austrian airmen could hardly contain their laughter over the nets, but when one after the other of their machines was caught in them, the humor faded out of the situation. It is possible to fence off a limited area with steel nets, and the British have repeatedly announced that they intend to use this means of defense.

A more ingenious anti-aircraft plan is what the German writers quoted above call "geo-mimicry," which is essentially the creation of a false landscape. Imagine a highly important industrial area with railroads, rivers, canals, factories, roads, and with open country beyond. From the air this forms a varying pattern of colors and lines. Suppose now that an air picture of this area is painted over the open country, several miles away from its actual location. The attacking aircraft would see the false landscape and drop their bombs in an open field without doing any damage. The result is achieved by laying a double smoke screen over a larger area, the top layer being the false landscape. The British have experimented with this measure with great success.

A more deadly device is the so-called machine-gun lift or elevator. This is a very inexpensive helicopter which rises straight in the air. It contains little more than a machine cannon with a firing platform. It is useless in attack, because its horizontal movements are slow and clumsy, though its vertical moves are exceedingly fast. Because of their small cost, a large fleet of these helicopters can be assembled; they can ascend in a few minutes and meet an oncoming air attack on its own level and with superior guns.

Many other developments have occurred in aircraft construction. The Germans have taken to the Diesel engine largely because it burns oil and does not require high-test gasoline—an important consideration for countries that lack an oil supply. Stratosphere bombers have encountered the difficulties of lack of oxygen and the extreme cold of the upper regions, but experiments continue. The flying submarine—or diving airplane—can both fly and submerge. It will fly out to a hostile fleet, then fold its wings and operate like a submarine. The flying tank is a fully equipped tank which can be carried over the enemy lines. It is attached to a plane and can be dropped at any strategic point. Experiments with "parachute battalions" are also far along, especially in Russia.

The "death centrifuge" was invented by an American, sold to the British, and is now being used by the Japanese. It is nothing more than a modernization of David's sling. A large number of mechanical arms revolve at a terrific rate while steel pellets are fed to them. The fantastic number of 33,000 rounds per minute can be fired by this machine. While not as accurate as a machine-gun, it is a devastating killing machine at close quarters. Moreover, it has the advantage of requiring neither powder nor copper.

Battles on land will also see the one-man machine-gun which the gangsters have used for some time. Armor-piercing rifles are also ready, to be used against tanks which have hitherto withstood the fire of ordinary rifles and machine-guns. In reply tanks with heavier armor have been constructed. Finally, there is the rocket torpedo, designed to rise to the stratosphere and travel enormous distances. Post-office departments have tested them in carrying mail, but so far they lack both distance and accuracy. An extremely interesting development is the propaganda aircraft—an enormous plane which carries a two-way radio set, a small printing plant, loud speakers, and similar devices. The Soviets are at present leading in this field. Such a plane will fly over enemy territory and spread propaganda.

Add poison gas, incendiary bombs, high-explosive bombs, and the killing machines well known from the last war, and the stage is set for slaughter. Since all war departments know these new weapons and are about equally ready with them, it seems certain that the next war will not be a matter of a few hours or days, no matter how sudden and unexpected the attack. Once more it will be a protracted and terribly destructive affair in which the economic power of a nation, its industry and finance, will finally be the determining factor.

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota

BY CHARLES R. WALKER

SOME months ago, before the election, the most diverse political weather vanes were pointing to the early formation of an American labor party which would participate decisively in the campaign of 1940. After the landslide of November 3 the talk died down abruptly. At present many observers believe that the chances for such a party are slight; others that it is impossible to predict, at this time, what will be the political alignment in the next four years of the elements which will be enlisted in any national labor party. There has been a growing confusion of aim among potential leaders and a dissipation of morale all along the line. At the same time the impulse toward political action incompatible with the economic base and aims of the two old parties will grow stronger rather than weaker, especially if the industrial organization of labor goes forward at its present pace.

During this period of indecision and watchful waiting workers, farmers, and progressives everywhere are asking what kind of labor party America will get? Will it shield striking workers against tear gas and bayonets? What reforms are within its grasp and how far can it go? Will it bring the "ultimate cooperative commonwealth"? Finally will it be able to stem reaction, stop war, and prevent fascism? For an answer to some of these questions it seems relevant to look closely at the one example America offers of such a party in action, namely, the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota. Although its activities have been limited to a single state, it is basically comparable in my opinion to any national labor party we shall create in America, and already it has a history long enough to exhibit many of the classic features of similar parties in Europe.

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota has functioned actively for more than fifteen years. It has four times elected a Governor; the principal cities in the state have had Farmer-Labor Mayors; and the party has accumulated an impressive number of Senators and Congressmen in Washington. Today it is no longer a "third party" but the first party of the state. It has lately won every state office save one and has control now of the lower house.

Today, sitting in state offices over in St. Paul, are scores of men who were flogged, tarred and feathered, and denounced as enemies of society in 1918. They were the fearless and self-sacrificing founders of the Farmer-Labor Party. In the same breath it must be said that the occupants of the state office building and the governor's chambers, though they may have been radicals in 1918, now obey certain rules of the political game that have always governed, in Minnesota or anywhere else. This leads us to fundamental questions. Can a labor party achieve its aims by adapting itself to the traditional rules of a party in power? Can it change the rules?

There can be no denying that if farmer-labor principles are ultimately to be written into statutes, the immediate business of the party becomes the winning of elections; it is a corollary that the winning candidates must largely take control of the party's destiny. In 1930, when the Minnesota party "came to power," it was quite clear to the naked eye that there had been a transfer of power from the organizers, speakers, and ideologists for the "cooperative commonwealth," who had led the movement in its earlier days, to the new "tops," the actual office-holders. In any crisis even the "purest" of the rank and file deferred to this practical control. If a ward club of the Farmer-Labor Association¹ charged betrayal of Farmer-Labor principles and threatened to bolt, the men in office held after all an irresistible whip of power. "Your criticisms are a tacit support of reaction. If you don't vote for Candidate Smith, the Republicans will win." For a Farmer-Laborite that was enough. Before the late Governor Olson died, there was a saying in Minnesota that the "pure Farmer-Laborite is a man who tells you in private that Olson should be shot and Shipstead hung, and who goes out and works like the devil to elect them both."

The problem of disciplining reformist candidates for treason to principles is troubling many practical, as well as idealistic, members of the Minnesota party. The most glaring example of both the problem and its practical effect was the case of Thomas Latimer, Farmer-Labor Mayor of Minneapolis. Elected on a campaign pledge "never to use the police against striking workers," his chief of police shot and tear-gassed hundreds of pickets in the 1935 iron workers' strike. As if to prove that this was no accident, the Mayor in person, under police protection, led a band of scabs through the picket line. Individuals protested and the trade unions went wild, but the Hennepin County Farmer-Labor Association took no action except to remonstrate with the Mayor. "If we expel him from the party," the leaders argued, "we shall lose all control over him." To which the tear-gassed strikers retorted, "What control?"

This fissure in the party between the rank and file and the office-holders has already led to an active inner struggle in Minnesota between the administration and the association. In Farmer-Labor circles it is known as the fight between the association and the "all-partyites"—a reference to the "All-Party Committees for Olson" considered by left-wing Farmer-Laborites to be the "cause of it all." The pivotal struggle has been over patronage. Governor Olson appointed as Director of Budget and Personnel the head of his All-Party Committee, a woman and a Republican, thus surrendering to the enemy the most strategic appointive post within the gift of the party. Under protest he finally replaced her by I. C. Strout, a practical Dutchman and strong association man, who discovered that 60 per cent of the state's office personnel were Republicans or Democrats!²

Strout promptly took the position that all appointees should have the indorsement of the association through the candidate's local Farmer-Labor club. The result was a vast influx into the association of "carpetbaggers" who wanted jobs in St. Paul—the association's membership rose in a few months from 3,000 to 30,000. The solution having proved to be no solution at all, the indorsements were dropped. Since 1930 appointee after appointee with no qualifications for office other than vote-getting ability has been given an important policy-making post despite the most strenuous protests from the faithful defenders of Farmer-Labor principles and from competent office-holders who were not open to the charge of office seeking. The struggle throws light on the dual nature of a reformist party, which is pulled in one direction by its constituency of farmers and workers and forced into an opposite one by the exigencies of practical politics.

The latest Farmer-Labor convention, held in January, was marked by a series of stormy fights over charges that a prominent ex-officer had listened to a campaign contributor in the matter of appointments. A knock-down, drag-out fight also took place between the Sustaining Fund Committee and the State Committee, with charges and counter-charges of "dirty politics" flying fast. Yet although the convention turned in a sense into a family quarrel, many of the faithful for that very reason regard it as the healthiest and most heartening in the party's history. Farmer-Labor conventions have always been held before in the spring of campaign years, and the association has hitherto found neither the time nor perhaps the nerve to raise organizational issues or to attempt an inner cleansing. Although the stormy sessions emphasized that patronage and purse-strings are perennial problems of any labor party under capitalism, they also demonstrated a healthy spirit of criticism within the party.

Can patronage and all it implies ever be eliminated? The "practical politicians," of course, say that it cannot and what of it. It is an apparent but not real paradox that many of the Marxist revolutionists in Minnesota agree that the practical politicians understand the basic character of the Farmer-Labor Party far better than their earnest critics within or without the party. The revolutionists concentrate criticism not on the political opportunism of particular Farmer-Laborites but on the inevitably opportunistic nature of any such party. It is their contention that a Farmer-Laborite who believes the party can be fundamentally different belongs in one of the parties which propose to change the rules by revolution and play the whole game differently.

¹ The Farmer-Labor Association is the permanent membership organization of the Farmer-Labor movement. It is composed of ■ dues-paying membership organized into ward, village, or township clubs, trade unions, affiliated and paying dues on a per capita basis, and farm organizations. The Farmer-Labor Party is the legal and technical name used on the ballot.

² When ■ Republican legislature in ■ burst of partisan zeal voted ■ investigation of graft among state office employees, the investigation yielded surprisingly small fruits. Disillusioned Farmer-Laborites suggested that the reason was that the Republican probers found themselves investigating only Republican office-holders.

In most discussions of farmer-labor parties radicals emphasize that they mean a "real" farmer-labor party, not a makeshift like the one in Minnesota, run by politicians who compromise its principles. Yet Minnesota's specimen is actually as "real" as any national labor party we are likely to see. Although it now has a large middle-class following, it was born of a solid alliance between trade unions and the most militant farmers' organization of the day, the Non-Partisan League. The trade unions are affiliated, pay per capita dues, and have delegates on the county committees, which, incidentally, show a much more proletarian character than the top committees. Nor can one question the sincerity or courage of its founders, who were subjected to all the persecutions of war hysteria. Any subsequent loss of control by the base over the top is not, as the aspiring architects of a "real farmer-labor party" believe, an "avoidable mistake." On the contrary it is the inherent fate of a party which must submit to compromise with the system under which it lives.

Does all this imply that the party in Minnesota is "just like the two old parties"? By no means. Its all-important distinction from the two old capitalist parties is that it looks for major support to the workers and farmers and their organizations. Senator Lundeen in his official party history maintains that more important than any legislative achievements of the party is its support of workers and farmers and their right to organize. "It is probable," he remarks, "that more farms have been saved through the efforts of such an organization as the Farmers' Holiday Association than were saved by the mortgage-moratorium law." Governor Olson time and again used the pressure of these economic groups to achieve results with a recalcitrant legislature, and the trade unions and farmer organizations with equal effectiveness brought pressure on him. To put it sharply, a delegation of organized truck drivers or dirt farmers on whom the party depends for votes can force the hand of a Farmer-Labor Governor—up to a point. But contrariwise, on every basic issue the party in power, Farmer-Labor or another, unless it is ready to substitute a new economic system, must see to it that the old one works somehow. Examine any concrete Farmer-Labor reform and the dilemma presents itself. When a mortgage-moratorium law was passed in Minnesota, left-wingers pointed out that it was not a genuine moratorium. They were right. A genuine moratorium on farm mortgages would not only have prevented future loans to farmers but have wrecked the financial structure of savings banks and insurance companies. Such a law if carried out could only bring collapse and chaos—unless the party taking such a step were prepared to go beyond it to a revolutionary change in property relations.

The most dramatic manifestations of the dual nature of a farmer-labor party appear in social crises. In the middle of the general drivers' strike in 1934 the Farmer-Labor Governor raided strike headquarters with national guardsmen and jailed the strike leaders. Three days later he raided the offices of the Citizens' Alliance, the Minneapolis employers' association. Governor Olson, against the protests of the strike leaders, declared martial law, assuring working-class supporters that by so doing he could force a favorable settlement. What happened? In his role of "arbiter" and in order to move "necessities," he allowed 11,500 trucks to move under military permit, and forbade all picketing. The strike ebbed. Only by forcing their Farmer-Labor Governor to rescind permits, and only by picketing against his orders and in the face of the bayonets of his militia, was the strike won. Was there then any advantage for the truck drivers in having a Farmer-Labor government in office? Certainly. Had the Governor—who was also commander-in-chief of the state's troops—been a reactionary, working-class pressure upon him would doubtless have been futile. Instead of tolerating—up to a point—militant picketing in the face of martial law, he would literally have "shot the strike to pieces." The political lesson is a simple one. Whether a farmer-labor administration is an asset or a liability or worse depends on the strength and the untiring political vigilance of its working-class base.

Take the Minneapolis strikes of 1936. Last October there was a city-wide truck strike against the wholesale grocers. Paralleling it came a general strike in the flour mills. Employers demanded of Governor Peterson (Farmer-Labor) that he call the National Guard. Employers demanded of Mayor Latimer (Farmer-Labor) that he use the police against pickets. (As we have seen, he had obliged them once before.) But as fast as the employers walked out of the Governor's and Mayor's offices, delegations of strike leaders walked in. They asked with proletarian directness which side the Mayor and Governor were on. They reminded both that it was an election year. The police under Mayor Latimer did no shooting. Martial law—under Governor Peterson—was never declared. Both strikes were won.

Two months before he died I interviewed the late Farmer-Labor Governor Floyd B. Olson on his part in the 1934 strikes. "The strike leaders of Local 574 assure me that your use of the militia tended to break their strike," I said. "On the other hand the employers of Minneapolis tell me that the National Guard was used against them and won the strike for the truck drivers. You called in the militia. Who was right?"

The Governor hesitated for a moment. Then he smiled. "Both were right," he said.

A labor party can under some circumstances be a valuable engine to advance the interest of the working class. But only if there are left militant trade unions within it whose leaders are prepared to tell the party, not once but on all occasions, and with pickets if necessary, that both sides can't be right.

[In his second article, to appear shortly, Mr. Walker describes at length his interview with Floyd B. Olson during the Governor's last illness.]

Women Workers in Nazi Germany

BY JUDITH GRUNFELD

WHEN Hitler proclaimed Kinder, Kirche, Küche — children, church, kitchen — to be the holy trinity, at once the mission and the salvation, of German women, many unemployed men saw in it a promise of jobs as soon as women workers had been transported to the permanent security of a home, and many women, employed and unemployed, saw in it a promise of wages to the male breadwinner sufficient to insure this permanent and desirable security.

Having thrown the female deputies out of the Reichstag, Hitler had no difficulty in passing laws making women Class B subjects. The law of June 1, 1933, stated frankly the intention to relieve unemployment by eliminating women workers. Since the trade unions had been replaced by company unions under government control, there could be no opposition from that source.

"Women today," wrote Irmgard Reichenau, a Nazi woman journalist, "are handed over defenseless to the men, who hold the entire power of the state in their hands."

What are the results of this crusade? How many women workers did the Führer send home? After four years of Nazi rule, just how secure is the German home; how secure are women and children?

According to statistics of the German Department of Labor, there were in June, 1936, 5,470,000 employed women, or 1,200,000 more than in January, 1933, when Hitler came to power. Not less than 31 per cent of all employed Germans are now women—a higher percentage than obtains in the United States, Great Britain, or France. Moreover, almost all available female workers in Germany—to be exact, 96.6 per cent—were employed in June, 1936, while the corresponding figure for male wage-earners was 92.2 per cent, again according to the data of the Department of Labor. In a word, greater unemployment exists among men than among women.

The vigorous campaign against the employment of women has not led to their increased domesticity and security, but has been effective in squeezing them out of the better-paid positions into the sweated trades (Hausindustrien). Needless to say, this type of labor, with its miserable wages and long hours, is extremely dangerous to the health of women and degrades the family. Discrimination against women labor has made it increasingly cheaper and stimulated the demand for women in all trades. This in turn has forced down the wage level of male employees. As a result men do not earn enough to support a family, and women are compelled to work. So the vicious circle of fascist policy is completed.

What do official pay rolls tell of the Nazi promise that bearers of Nazi children should "enjoy a woman's life"? The official inquiry into wages in fifteen industries made in March, 1936, during Hitler's "prosperity," by the German Board of Statistics shows the amazing discrepancy between male and female wages and the very low level of the latter. Similar inquiries carried out by the Board of Statistics in 1931 and 1932, during the worst depression years, show far higher wage rates. The discrepancy between male and female wages is best shown by the following typical examples of average hourly earnings, including piece work, in different industries:

In the chemical industry the average hourly earnings of semi-skilled and unskilled women are 41.3 per cent lower than those of semi-skilled and unskilled men, the figures being 87.5 and 51.5 pfennigs.

In the metal industry, including electrical engineering and the production of precision and optical instruments, watches, and telephone and radio equipment, where female workers have proved more efficient than men in many processes, the average hourly earnings of female operators are 41 per cent lower than those of men.

In the clothing industry the hourly earnings of skilled and semi-skilled women are 42.6 per cent less than those of skilled and semi-skilled men.

In the textile industry, where more women than men are employed, the wage level is particularly low for both. Skilled men get an average hourly rate of 69.2 pfennigs, skilled women 49.5; unskilled men earn 53.6 pfennigs, unskilled women only 37.7, or 15 cents an hour.

In the paper industry the hourly earnings of skilled women are 42.8 per cent less than those of skilled men.

In bread, pastry, and candy factories skilled women earn 41 per cent less than skilled men.

In the typographical trades the hourly earnings of female "technical employees" are 48.4 per cent lower than those of male "technical employees," the rates being 98.8 and 50.7 pfennigs.

How does the fascist exploitation of women workers affect the occupational trend? The following comparative statistics of the demand for and the supply of labor at the beginning of June, 1936, are enlightening:

VACANCIES PER 100 APPLICANTS OF SAME SEX*

Industry	For Men	For Women
Chemical	3	15
Textile	0.25	2
Clothing	1.2	7.3
In all industries	5.9	17.7

Even the absolute figures of demand were higher for women than for men in the chemical, textile, and clothing industries as well as in the commercial fields, while the supply of male employees was, of course, many times greater. The more women's wages dropped, the easier it was for them to find work.

* The percentages in this table are calculated from the absolute figures published by the Department of Labor on August 5, 1936.

What do women earn weekly, and how high can their standard of living be? First we must take into consideration the various wage deductions imposed by the authorities. The official inquiry into wages rates these at 12.4 per cent in the chemical industry and 14.3 per cent in the metal industry. Unofficial sources put them at 15 to 25 per cent. If we calculate the net wages on the basis of the official figure for deductions, we find that for a 45-hour week in a chemical plant women get the equivalent of $7.90 weekly at the current rate of exchange.

The average net earnings of female operators in the metal industry for a 48.8-hour week are as "high" as $8 for time and piece work. In the paper industry even skilled women get for a 45-hour week a net wage of 20.5 marks, or $8.20; the unskilled earn, in the same time, a net wage of $6.30. In the textile industry skilled women—spinners and weavers—get for a 40-hour week a net wage of about $7; unskilled workers, $5.30.

So much for the "enjoyment of a woman's life" in the Third Reich. What of the happy security of the home that filled the Führer's speeches in the campaign of 1932? It has given way to Dr. Goebbels's slogan, "Guns are more important than butter." The increasing shortage of food and the real wages of workers give the picture. The net average weekly wage of the German worker is $11 to $12, according to official figures. The woman worker earns from $6 to $8. What such wages mean in terms of purchasing power is easy to calculate on the basis of the following table of current prices in Germany and their American equivalents, wired to the New York Times by its correspondent in Berlin in December.

	Price per Pound
	Berlin	New York
Sirloin steak	72 cents	38 cents
Cheap beef cuts	43-54 "	29-34 "
Pork	43-65 "	21-28 "
Veal	65-80 "	18-50 "
Butter	58 "	39 "
Margarine	32-40 "	20-24 "
Lard	36-43 "	16-24 "

"That means," the correspondent adds, "that the majority live on bread, potatoes, cabbage, the cheapest margarine—made mainly of whale oil—and cheap sausages, which often include horse meat. German housewives are often forced to stand in line for hours or run around to various shops in order to get anything at all. Good eggs and cream for coffee are becoming rarities. Butter is rationed to 80 per cent of October consumption and even that, like any other kind of fat, is available only after registration with the dairy shop."

Continually increasing living costs coupled with rigorous wage reductions to below the depression level of 1932 are the real achievement of fascist "prosperity." And there is no hope of improvement. "I cannot promise today, or at any period, higher wages," Field Marshal von Blomberg told representatives of the workers in armament factories on February 23, and he stressed that "the life and work of the Labor Front must be carried on according to military ideas."

The earnings of women in Germany are now cut down to the wage level of the Far East. There is no doubt that the current low wages tend to increase dumping. Hitler's wage policy, therefore, is threatening the standard of living of workers in other countries.

The women of Germany have been granted a further fascist gift—compulsory labor service. The law of June 26, 1935, states the obligation "of all the German youth of both sexes to serve their people by doing useful work but not as wage-earners," that is, without payment. For this purpose and to promote the education of German youth "in the spirit of National Socialism" Hitler has, according to the law, the right to mobilize annually as many boys and girls between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five as he likes and for as long a time as he likes. People engaged in labor service are not allowed to marry unless they obtain the permission of the authorities. Women are subject to another law defining when, how, where, and by whom they may be made sterile in the Third Reich. By decree of July 28, 1936, the Secretary of Labor legalized sterilization by means of irradiation. His list of 150 physicians authorized to perform this service included no women.

The Department of Labor published recently data to show that there are available in Germany a total of 13.2 million male workers while 17.6 million persons were employed on June, 1936. Thus even if all the men workers were employed, Germany would need at least 4.4 million female workers. Actually 5.47 million women are employed. Moreover, if Hitler were actually to eliminate female workers, Germany could neither produce commodities for export nor rearm.

Cultural progress tends to eliminate hard work for women and to facilitate their ascent to higher professions. Fascism reverses this process. Prominent Nazi women have expressed quite clearly in the name of "gifted women" their uneasiness about being made the victims of the dictatorship they fought to establish. Some of them have even dared, in an appeal to Hitler, to point out that German women were better off before the dictatorship, and that "China, Japan, and Turkey are far more advanced today in regard to the position of women than we are, and not to their loss." On page 22 of this historical appeal we read also: "Men have led the world to an abyss, and the danger still continues if one-sided rule by men is set up." In another expression of this bitter after-realization Dr. Leonor Kühn says on page 34 of the same pamphlet that "thinking National Socialist women begin to regret that in their national feeling they raised men to be unrestricted masters of the destiny of women and of the nation." These and many similar statements have not, of course, diminished the compulsory leisure of "gifted" Nazi women. Now they keep silent, but their S.O.S. to the Führer is worthy of note by women in democratic countries, if only to warn them of the tragic fate of women workers in fascist Germany. Deprived of all democratic rights, of all opportunities to promote peace, women are compelled to serve Hitler's militarism, which is already causing workers' families to suffer war-time privations.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Haiti, 1937—II

THE modern Caribbean dictator has discovered a new technique for maintaining himself in power—having an efficient army and seeing to it that only the soldiers possess arms. But thereby he places the fortunes of his country in the hands of the military men. I met two of the three ranking colonels of the Haitian army and was profoundly impressed by them. Colonel André, handsome and able, assured me that politics meant nothing to him and that the army would have nothing to do with politics. But the army is certainly in politics to the extent that it supervises and controls the elections. Some day it may decide that it wants another ruler, or that the ballot boxes shall be filled otherwise than the President directs. There is no earthly reason for Haiti to have a standing army or for that army to be intrusted with policing the country. What the country needs is a mounted constabulary of the type of the famous Canadian "mounties." A force of this type of a thousand men would be sufficient to preserve order and prevent revolution. And the money thus saved could well be used by this pitifully poor country. But here as elsewhere the army cries for and gets more and more men and money, the excuse being that Santo Domingo has more troops and that there is much smuggling over the border. Because Santo Domingo has a few airplanes and three batteries of artillery constant pressure is brought to bear upon the American Fiscal Representative to loosen the purse-strings and let the Haitian army have more unnecessary military toys.

The Fiscal Representative, in the person of Seymour de la Rue, is a great thorn in the flesh of the Haitians—and not wholly without reason. Especially since they have purchased the National City Bank and made it the National Bank of Haiti the people feel that their finances should be entirely in their own hands, and they are eagerly—but vainly—hoping for a new refunding loan to enable them to pay off their debt and so terminate Mr. de la Rue's control. They do not deny that he has helped them a great deal, that he is aware of the economic needs of the country and recognizes the necessity of changing Haiti from a one-crop country to a three- or four-crop country. They do protest against the banana contract which Mr. de la Rue was instrumental in obtaining in the belief that it represented a great step forward for Haiti. They deny that it is advantageous—I mean Haitians outside official circles—and they particularly dislike being tied up with one of the two American banana trusts.

The answer, unfortunately, is that if Haiti did not tie up with one of these trusts it simply could not dispose of a large banana crop in the United States. Formerly banana growers, who were few in number, got as high as a dollar a stem for their bananas from sporadic purchasers able to handle the small crop. Now they get a minimum of 32 cents from the Standard Fruit Company, which advances money to the farmers for clearing and planting the land and for living expenses until they can draw money from their first crop; and this must slowly be repaid out of the 32 cents. The company also provides irrigation and has to do an enormous amount of clerical and bookkeeping work. It is hoped that within three or four years Haiti will be selling 4,000,000 stems of bananas to the outside world. There is one thing that can be said in favor of the contract. It preserves the system of small peasant farms and does not open a way to the company's purchase of great stretches of land as in other Caribbean islands.

If President Vincent had the money, I believe that he would rapidly advance his country. The resident Americans all speak well of him, especially the business men. The public order is today all that could be asked—indeed, it is far superior, because of the admirable character of the Haitian people, to that in the United States. Among 3,000,000 uneducated people there are not thirty serious crimes in an entire year! There are petty larcenies, of course, in multitude, as always in a country in which so large a proportion of the people live on the edge of starvation. But it is a proud boast of the Haitians that a white woman, or a black one, can go alone through the country and can count upon meeting only courtesy and consideration at the hands of the peasants. The people are industrious and hard-working to a degree, patient and long-suffering, content with their little all. They are magnificent material out of which to make a supremely happy country, without the slightest threat of war or international embroilments. If M. Vincent lives up to the opportunity which is his, he will immediately turn Haiti back into the paths of democracy, for if ever a people deserved the confidence of their ruler, the Haitians do.

Finally, a personal word. Never have I been received with greater kindness, friendliness, and good-will, or with such generous hospitality, as was extended to me by President Vincent and other officials of the republic. It was, of course, not personal but a most gratifying recognition of what The Nation did for Haiti years ago—especially of the work of Ernest Gruening, Lewis S. Gannett, Arthur Warner, Herbert Seligman, Freda Kirchwey, and others of The Nation's editors and contributors. Such an experience is so rare in an editor's life in the United States, where no one has time to remember, that I gratefully record it.

[The first part of Mr. Villard's report on Haiti appeared last week.]

BROUN'S PAGE

John L. Lewis & Co.

THERE'S no particular need to argue just now that the C. I. O. has made extraordinary progress under the leadership of John L. Lewis, but I think it may be worth while to go over some old ground. It seems to me that in the light of present events some past decisions of Lewis show up better than they did at the time. There was a disposition to criticize him for what was called "splitting the labor movement." Some who didn't care at all for Green were still rather sharp in their comments about the president of the United Mine Workers.

Their argument ran that Lewis should make his fight from within the A. F. of L. and keep at least an approximation of peace until such time as he could capture leadership. These critics even said that Lewis was working to bring about a split rather than to prevent one. Possibly that was his intention. If so, it proved a wise decision. If peace had been patched up with the leaders of the craft crowd, the victories in steel and motors would have been wholly impossible. It was necessary for Lewis to get all his foes in front of him. It would have been fatal to run the risk of being stabbed from behind, and the craft crowd would have done just that.

I think this accounts for what some took to be mere truculence in the words and manner of Lewis in his dealings with Green. He did lay it on pretty thick, but I believe it was all done for a definite purpose. By the time the General Motors strike began, Green had been definitely pegged as a man with a bitter feud against Lewis and the whole C. I. O. movement. His position was so plain that nobody paid much attention to the strike-breaking statements which he issued during the conflict. They were discounted as the words of a defeated and disappointed man. Even the newspaper editors who were on the prowl for ammunition to use against Lewis couldn't get very far with Green's dud shrapnel.

I also think that Lewis was correct in not going to Tampa or anywhere near it during the A. F. of L. convention, although I did not think so at the time. Obviously the prime necessity was to let the workers in steel and motors know that organization would be carried on by the C. I. O. and that under no possible compromise would any of the agents of Green be allowed to participate. There are men in the steel industry who have long memories, and to them an old-line A. F. of L. organizer is just about as popular as a company spy.

Up to now the vigor which Lewis put into the campaign to reelect Roosevelt has been entirely justified. It seems to me that the criticism of that course which came from some of the radicals was wholly mistaken. In The Nation's own pages Paul Ward once wrote during the campaign that the only difference between Landon and

Roosevelt as far as labor was concerned was the fact that Landon would call out the troops in the first week of a strike and Roosevelt in the second. I did not think much of this particular piece of bravura cynicism at the time and I think less of it now. The victory in Flint could hardly have been won if Landon had been in the White House. Governor Murphy was useful to the C. I. O., and I don't think there is much doubt that the Governor took his tone from the President.

It may be that a break will come between Roosevelt and Lewis. At the very least it ought to be long delayed. Labor needs the cooperation of Mr. Roosevelt, and his legislative program can only be made to function through the support of a large-scale trade-union movement. Indeed, I'm beginning to wonder whether the one sharp exchange between the President and the labor leader may not have been just a bit of play acting.

John L. Lewis has been too busy to waste time in answering some of the absurd things which have been said about him in the newspapers. The picture of a man gone mad with lust for power now seems pretty funny. It is obvious that all the moves were planned carefully in advance and that sufficient slack was left to take up those situations in which compromise would be necessary.

But there is one respect in which I think that the prevalent journalistic practice may actually do harm to Lewis and the cause of the C. I. O. The practice which I have in mind is probably without sinister intent. That's why it is dangerous. The fallacy creeps up and lodges itself in the community mind. I am thinking of the way in which the drive for industrial unionism has been made to seem a one-man show. Naturally the headline writer seizes upon the name of Lewis. It is only five letters, and according to the way we used to count on the Tribune copy desk the extra length of the w is neutralized by the i. So it has been Lewis in the headlines and pretty much Lewis all through the news reports.

That is characteristic enough of American newspaper modes. When a football back runs sixty-five yards and across the goal line, it is customary to say that he scored the touchdown. There is neither room nor disposition to go much into the matter of the interference which made his run possible. Papers are geared to handle only one star at a time. Still it is naive and worse than that for people to get the impression that John L. Lewis personally went out and buttonholed every new recruit for the C. I. O. To be sure the labors which he accomplished on his own were prodigious, but a large part of his labor went into the building of an effective machine. The movement for industrial unionism certainly needs Lewis, and he in turn needs the support of the many thousands who have cooperated with him closely. The proper billing ought to be John L. Lewis and Company.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

AS IT WERE BEYOND THE WORLD

BY MARK VAN DOREN

DURING the fourteen years since Doughty's "Arabia Deserta" first appeared in America it has been possible to learn a few things about its author which would place the book in the long mystery of his life. A memoir by D. G. Hogarth¹ and a critical essay by Barker Fairley² have made it clear, for instance, that "Arabia Deserta" was only an episode in Doughty's literary and spiritual career; that it was indeed something of an accident. It certainly cannot be numbered among those classics which have been tossed off by their authors without a side-glance at fame and with no consciousness of artistry; it took nine years to write, and when the Cambridge University Press proposed a simplification of its style for the first edition of 1888 Doughty replied: "I would prefer that the book be not published than change one word of my English. I value my style much more than my matter."

Yet it was tangential to a career as English poet that Doughty had planned for himself from the beginning. Ancient and weary as the author of "Arabia Deserta" sounds to any reader, he was in his middle thirties when he had the experience of which he wrote in this vast and difficult book; he was only forty-five when it was first published; and he had almost another forty years in which to live obscurely in England composing the twelve volumes of poetry, including an epic in six volumes, by which he believed his name would live. It is well for a reader of the newest edition of "Arabia Deserta"³ to remember all this, for it helps to explain a certain quality of interest which Doughty has in his subject, and hence helps to explain his book.

The Arabs, in other words, were not central to that study of man which an erudite and dedicated poet had set for himself from the days of his youth when he was rejected for the British navy because of a delicate constitution and when he resolved to "soar above the vanities of this world and take a place among the worthies who have lived for its adornment and the real glory of God." If any people was central it was his own—the British race, so unconscious in these diluted times of the pure stream which once had expressed the flowing of its spirit. His deepest desire was to return along this stream to its source; and if the journey took him over the world, tracing the tributaries which had entered from Rome and the East, he went without complaining, insatiable for further knowledge concerning "the Story of the Earth, Her manifold living creatures, the human generations and Her ancient rocks." It was thus, as a wandering scholar, a geologist and a geographer, that he strayed to Arabia in 1876 and heard of some inscriptions at Medáin Sâlih which no European had ever copied. It was the inscriptions that drew him down from Damascus with a pilgrim train bound for Mecca; but it was something else, when the caravan returned and would have taken him to Damascus again, that kept him, a lone and somewhat fragile Englishman, wandering for nineteen months "through the most of that vast mountainous labyrinthine solitude of rainless valleys" and on across sandy immensities where he daily risked his life among fanatical nomad Arabs—"tent-dwellers, inhabiting, from the beginning, as it were beyond the World."

The Arabs were an ancient people. But not only that. They were unchanged from what they had been, there was a taint of eternity in their daily doings, they endured somewhat as rocks and sand endure, without sense of self or knowledge of time. This must have been what kept Doughty among them so long in spite of a certain contempt he had for them and in spite of the terrible nature of their land. He maintained his English identity throughout; he never went native; he did not forget how much he had to learn from people who were unlike anything he could ever be and who yet were in almost the literal sense contemporaries of his own people two millennia ago. He lived among them, and later on he wrote of living among them, in a kind of double time—now, this moment, and forever; both as if his presence there mattered and as if it mattered no more than a grain of sand upon the desert. Perhaps Doughty lost his footing between the two extremes of consciousness and fell beyond recovery. An English relation remembers that when he came home in 1879 "he spoke seldom . . . and with some hesitation, as if his native language did not come quite easily to him." He himself would have said that his native language, then as always, was not the language of Victorian England but the sweet, strong tongue of Chaucer and Spenser—which it was his duty to restore as it was his duty to remind Englishmen of their human heritage. But the cousin may have been right. The difficulty of reading Doughty is the difficulty of listening to a man who inhabits two worlds at once, one of them as old as granite and the other as new as a puff of passing wind that bears odors of apples if it be an English wind or of camels and butter if it be Arabian.

Whatever the genesis of "Arabia Deserta," and whatever its relation to the epic in six volumes, "The Dawn in Britain" (1906), whose composition it so long delayed, it remains an indescribable book in the same way that Arabia or any other country in its wholeness remains indescribable. "Doughty's completeness," says Colonel Lawrence in the famous Introduction of 1920 now printed again, "is devastating." But there is more than Arabia in the book. There is Doughty in Arabia—the entirety of his experience, step by step and pain by pain, rendered with an impersonal, an indeed awful accuracy. Its twelve hundred pages move as slowly as Doughty moved, and through as thick an atmosphere of alien monotony. There is none of the lightness and picturesqueness of a travel book; nor shall we flatter ourselves that we know much about the author when we are through. For it is not about himself that he has been talking; or, as I have hinted, about the Arabia that anyone can see from a camel's back. It is rather about that incredible peninsula where the past and present live on together, and where one may learn things not taught in books, not even in this one. The newborn camel by its dam, the reek of butter and coffee and sweat, the pleasant coolness of sudden evening, the whispering of the wives, the oaths and prayers of the Bedouins, the unendurable heat of mid-day, the stretching of volcanic ridges beyond the limits of any weary eye, the fouled spring, the wind over the sand—these and ten thousand other things had for Doughty a unique importance which they can have for the reader too if he takes them as they are given to him, slowly, patiently, and one by one.

¹ "The Life of Charles M. Doughty." Doubleday, Doran and Company. 1929.

² "Charles M. Doughty." Oxford University Press. 1927.

³ "Travels in Arabia Deserta." By Charles M. Doughty. With Introduction by T. E. Lawrence. Random House. Two Volumes. $15.

Girl at the Play

BY MURIEL RUKEYSER

Long after you beat down the powerful hand
And leave the scene, prison's still there to break.
Brutalized by escape, you travel out to sit
In empty theaters, your stunned breast, hardened neck
Waiting for warmth to venture back.

Gilded above the stage, staring archaic shapes
Hang, like those men you learn submission from Whose majesty sits yellow on the night,
Young indolent girls, long-handed, one's vague mouth
And cruel nose and jaw and throat.

Waiting's paralysis strikes, king-cobra hooded head's
Infected fangs petrify body and face,
Emblems fade everyway, dissolving even
The bitter infantile boys who call for sleep's
Winy breasts whose nipples are long grapes.

Seats fill. The curtain's up where strong lights act,
Cut theater to its theme; the quick fit's past.
Here's answer in masses moving; by light elect,
They turn the stage before into the street behind,
And nothing's so forgotten as your blind
Female paralysis that takes the mind,
And nothing's so forgotten as your dead
Fever, now that it's past and the swift play's ahead.

BOOKS

Three of a Kind

ANOTHER SUCH VICTORY. By Clifton Cuthbert. Hillman Curl. $2.50.

THIS IS YOUR DAY. By Edward Newhouse. Lee Furman. $2.50.

BETWEEN THE HAMMER AND THE ANVIL. By Edwin Seaver. Julian Messner. $2.50.

AN EARLIER novel by Clifton Cuthbert, "Thunder Without Rain," contained a few passages that were genuinely tender and pathetic. The theme of the novel, incest, was handled courageously and with an attempt to treat so-called abnormality in a spirit of sympathetic understanding. But the book was ruined by an annoyingly precious style. Characters, motivations, background were all entangled and lost in a web of vague if mellifluous metaphors, and for a dénouement the author was content to resort to impossible melodrama. "Another Such Victory" is startlingly different from its predecessor. It is a straightforward account of a strike in a small New England textile town in 1934. The author contrasts the lives of the owning and working classes and unfolds the meanings of the strike for members of each class. His novel is sincere and earnest, decidedly better reading than, say, Steinbeck's "In Dubious Battle" which was merely a revolutionary Rover Boy story. However, Cuthbert's perceptions are obvious and familiar and his characters are superficially drawn, especially the leisure-class young man who thinks that he is falling in love with a striker, and the Communist Party members, who are presented as somewhat irresolute and bewildered. Apparently Cuthbert, in his anxiety to forestall the criticisms usually leveled against stereotyped proletarian novels, has turned the pattern upside down, and substituted defeat for victory.

I think that Edward Newhouse's first novel, "You Can't Sleep Here," was overrated by most critics. It was the story of a newspaperman in a New York Hooverville, and nearly all the characters talked Hemingway. The book was glib and slapdash, careless in its style, facile rather than understanding in its characterizations. It had a kind of surface urban brightness, and little else. "This Is Your Day" is a decidedly more ambitious effort. It moves on from Hooverville to a young party worker trying to organize in a farm area. As a counter-plot there is the story of a young careerist high-school teacher who is feebly trying to pay ideological conscience money to the revolution with counterfeit coins. He becomes involved in an affair with one of his students and is required to marry her against his will. This part of the novel is handled competently, but it does not begin to squeeze the potentialities out of such a situation. Newhouse strives for precision and accuracy of detail. He seems to have read Proust since writing his first novel, and Proust is welded to Hemingway as an influence. To his facile conversation, he attempts to add analysis, but he shows no capacity to animate his characters on paper. The same mannerisms that marred the first book are noticeable here, but not to the same degree. Dialogue that is intended to be clever and "snappy" is often in bad taste. Newhouse's treatment of Communists, however, is decidedly more satisfactory than that of either Cuthbert or Seaver. The best that can be said of the book is that it is readable; indeed, I believe that Newhouse would make a much better columnist than novelist.

Edwin Seaver's first novel, "The Company," followed Nathan Asch's "The Office," and both books anticipated many of the tendencies now clearly revealed in the work of younger left-wing novelists. "The Company" was a neat and consistent, if minor, novel. It registered one note, pathos, and this note was excellently sustained. However, Seaver's latest effort, "Between the Hammer and the Anvil," indicates that his promise exceeded his fulfilment. Using the same form—a series of short sketches—he strives to enlarge his theme, his meanings, and his canvas, and also he seeks to recruit members to the Communist Party. He presents a wide variety of characters, most of them intellectuals and white-collar workers and victims of the depression. The book is intellectually pretentious. It combines artiness of style and tabloid wisecracks in a literal miscegenation. What Seaver lacks essentially is a sense of craftsmanship. Again and again, when he seems to be getting into a sketch, he intrudes stylized phrases, patches of dialogue that are inappropriate, auctorial platitudes, or obvious and overstated implications. He pads his book with florid metaphors; yet despite its length and intended canvas it is meager in its details and superficial in its motivation. In the concluding sketch a writer preparing to join the party experiences a revolutionary vision. The writing slips into such bathos as the following: "Did the weather too partake of the class struggle? Heyward's [a character who is a party member] irony went deeper than jest. If one saw one's life, all life, from a central vantage point . . ." At one place in the story some youths in an automobile look flirtatiously at a girl passing in a taxicab and she smiles back. We get this: "The taxi cab lunged ahead precipitately, leaving in its wake the fragrant stench of girlsmile and ethylgas." I quote these two passages because they reveal the level of insight and writing in the novel as a whole. "Between the Hammer and the Anvil" is commonplace, a mélange of derivations, and a severe disappointment. Seaver, after aligning himself with the Communist movement, has retrogressed as a craftsman and stuffed his mind with platitudes.

JAMES T. FARRELL

Bankrupt Realism

PERSONAL REALISM. By James Bissett Pratt. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THERE are numerous indications that the various schools of philosophic realism which have flourished in America for the last thirty years are, each in its own way, facing bankruptcy. And this condition is not to be traced only to the inability of these philosophies to furnish us, in terms of their own assumptions, a consistent picture of the world. One should not lose faith in the ability of the human mind to make almost any view seem plausible and coherent so long as social conditions make it pertinent. On the other hand, one should not forget that when a philosophic system ceases to be pertinent to the perplexities and anxieties of an age, all its technical excellences are not enough to save it.

The book under review has suggested these obvious considerations. Granting Mr. Pratt's fundamental assumptions and the decidedly mystic bent of his mind, competent critics would no doubt think highly of his views. His book is the product of a seasoned and well-equipped mind. The basic difficulty does not lie in its internal structure but in its assumptions. For it is these that enable Mr. Pratt to draw from his realism a spiritualistic metaphysic which seems quite irrelevant to our contemporary world. And those who have thought of realism as a bracing wind which thirty years ago blew away the fogs of idealism must deem the uses to which Mr. Pratt puts it a betrayal and a "liquidation." For here is realism used to establish an utterly vaporous and transcendental conception of the self and a still more vaporous "spiritual pantheism," made possible by accepting mystical experience as possessing "genuinely cosmic significance" while insisting on the exclusive validity of an empirical method which is seldom really adhered to.

Technically considered, the fundamental difficulty with the whole system—from the standpoint of contemporary naturalism and not of the naturalism of the nineteenth century—lies not in its failure to assert the existence of an external world and the ability of minds to know it but in its failure to see that before a dualism such as is here presented can be entertained, one has to dispose seriously of the efforts which are being made to show how mind springs from and is of nature. In America, Dewey and Mead are the recognized leaders of these efforts. And it is their naturalism, and not that of the nineteenth century, that must be reckoned with. Mr. Pratt, while devoting pages upon pages to an effort to bury the ghosts of nineteenth-century materialism, disposes of Dewey and Mead in a few lines and a footnote respectively.

The result of Mr. Pratt's failure to take up the challenge of these men is that he never examines in any serious sense the basis of the dualist position from which he starts. This means that he never surrenders the assumptions which realism at the turn of the century was forged to challenge. But since dualism cannot help making of either world or mind or both a mystery, it is no wonder that Mr. Pratt arrives at the religiously satisfying but unscientific conclusions indicated above.

Note, however, that the objections to Mr. Pratt's position are not only of a theoretical but also of a practical order. For if matter and spirit, nature and self are held to be radically different substances, it becomes impossible not only to explain how values arise but to show how these values, from whatever source obtained, can be made effective instrumentalities for changing the material grounds of society as need arises. The makeshift and antiquated theory of interactionism, used by Mr. Pratt to explain the relation between mind and matter, certainly begs the question. The radical issue here is the meaning and status we must ascribe to mind. A philosophy which places mind high up on a mystic shelf is a philosophy which has no light to throw on contemporary problems. Such a philosophy may find consolation in the thought that it envisages the "eternal problems of the human spirit," whatever these be. But eternal visions and high consolations will not save it from the bankruptcy which will come to it because of its irrelevance.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Problem of the Artist

ART AND SOCIETY. By Herbert Read. The Macmillan Company. $4.

ACCORDING to the front-flap information of this book, Herbert Read's writings on art are "in England the most successful books of that kind published within recent years." No doubt there will be an appreciative audience in America too.

The author, editor of the Burlington Magazine, formerly professor of fine arts in the University of Edinburgh and assistant keeper of the Victoria and Albert Museum, tries in a patient, scholarly way to educate his readers toward modern conceptions of art. For people of a conservative background, with the desire to keep up to date, this book provides a cautious guide through difficult territory. It offers the thrill of attacking present conditions. It speaks of "the degradation of art during the last two centuries" as being "in direct correspondence with the expansion of capitalism." "The world has probably never exhibited such a lack of cultural integrity as now exists in the capitalist form of modern society." About the wealthy patrons he admits exceptions, but as a general rule he considers "such individuals in all matters of sensibility and taste both vulgar and stupid."

On the other hand, he emphasizes that "the typical art of a period is the art of the elite." He hurries to assure us that the classless state as conceived by Marx, Engels, and Lenin by no means involves the abolition of elites. Later on he warns: "Admirable sentiment which, elected into a dogma and given the official support of a totalitarian state, is the true and only necessary explanation of the retarded development of art in Soviet Russia." Thus existing tendencies are criticized with a dignified impartiality backed by quotations from Plato, Hegel, Whitehead, Marx, Freud, Lévy-Bruhl, André Breton, Nikolai Bukharin, and Karl Radek. However, his final conclusions rescue the reader into an idealistic optimism culminating in the statement: "That general release from fear and repression which is promised by the technique of modern psychology no less than by the growing determination to win for humanity the benefits of modern methods of production . . . will recreate the conditions of a great art."

To reach these conclusions Mr. Read mobilizes history, magic, religion, philosophy, and psychology. The chapters on prehistoric art and on the origin of art show the usual pathetic attempt to be "scientific" by leaning on the research of anthropologists and archaeologists, most of whom still seem to cling to a mysterious privilege of carefully preserved innocence in matters of aesthetics and creativeness. Dealing with religion he tries to prove that "religion is not an essential to art; nor art to religion." The problem of the unconscious, based on Freudian conceptions, seems to be his strongest tool to build up the idea of the necessity of freedom of individual expression in art.

In the introduction the author confesses that the purpose of this book was to protest against philistinism à la H. G. Wells and the general art shyness of the Anglo-Saxons, which he considers their worst intellectual disgrace. But in this country, as in other parts of the world, there are many people to whom the problem of art and society means infinitely more. Our brains are tortured by the question whether art can survive, and what can be done about it. Everything seems ready for a great renaissance except this tragic relation of humiliated art to blind society. We are dreaming of a future humanity which will know its debt to the creative miracle of art, and yet we are trembling at the mere thought of a possible catastrophe if, owing to blindness in power, this grandiose chance should be missed. How can artists organize without losing their creative freedom? How can we fight the rackets of the art market? How can the artist become a legitimate member of society, and how can he be educated to be worthy of such a position? Desperate artists in great numbers have dropped their aesthetic quarrels and organized to attack such questions courageously. To American society the problem of art and culture becomes more and more a question of destiny. To artists the social problem has become a matter of life and death. Meanwhile, we have to be grateful for contributions like Mr. Read's book, which admits that "art, like murder, will out."

LEO KATZ

The First Puritans

PARADISE. By Esther Forbes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

"PARADISE" occupies the anomalous position of a historical novel which commands the respect of the historian more readily than it fires the enthusiasm of the literary critic. Considered as literature, it is a respectable job—no more. Neither its style, nor its architecture, nor its analysis of character, nor its view of life is peculiarly its own; it makes, in other words, no Contribution. Yet from the historian's point of view it is, I imagine, a valuable piece of work. For years Stuart Sherman battled in ponderous prose to disabuse the American mind of the belief that "puritan" was a synonym for "gloomy," that the collective life of the New England colonies prior to the Revolution was wholly devoted to asceticism, witch burning, and general sanctimoniousness. Miss Forbes's novel will probably do more to rejuvenate the Founding Fathers for the public than did all Mr. Sherman's long-winded essays.

The book takes its name from the great house of the first citizen of Canaan (founded 1630) in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Jude Parre, the Founder, could write "gentleman" after his signature; and he was, to be sure, no run-of-the-mill Puritan. From a dissolute youth as a vagabond scholar he came to the New World with a rich wife and a belief in individual liberty that was more conscious and more conscientious than was usual in that rather tight-minded society. Yet there was room in the colony both for the tolerance of Mr. Parre and for the hell-and-damnation preaching of the Fearings, Peter and Forethought; and the exponents of these two schools of life could drink ale, malmsey, and rum, smoke a pipe, and enjoy the pleasures of the table together. Miss Forbes makes it clear that the sensory joys of the world were not forbidden the Puritans, however devout. The customs are those of the Restoration period. The settlers of the Massachusetts Bay Colony did not, naturally, bring with them to America the manners of the court, but, inescapably, they brought the customs and dress of the raw and gusty society from which they stemmed, and to which they, even in retreat or rebellion, still belonged. That a pioneer economy demanded a religious dictatorship, that out of the religious dictatorship eventually grew a political democracy, based, ideologically, on the belief in the rights of man, we know. What is ironical is the fact that, before this democracy could even be foreshadowed, the Jude Parres had to be put in their places, for the individualism they stood for was not of the future but of the past, the individualism permitted within the framework of a benevolent feudalism, not the mandatory individualism characteristic of a middle-class economic democracy.

Miss Forbes has written a popular novel, or, as she calls it, a historical romance, and therefore is concerned with emotions rather than ideas; it is love, not social change, on which her attention is focused. Nevertheless, her material has been so conscientiously studied, so fully and accurately recast into fictional terms, that these political conceptions are inherent in her story, as they are in history itself. Those who wish can dig them out of the conflicts of the novel. Those who do not can at least whole-heartedly participate in the narrative, secure in the assurance that they are not, momentarily, living in what a historian would consider a fool's "Paradise."

MARY MC CARTHY

Shorter Notices

THE LAST ROMANTIC. By William Orton. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN TRYING to describe the impact of pre-war England on a young man's mind Mr. Orton has set himself an interesting problem. Moreover, he has chosen a hero who will not swim with the current. His Michael is an artist—without an art; a dreamer and an individualist; he is impractical, sensitive, intelligent. But most of the time he is groping in the dark. He discovers Nietzsche, Walt Whitman, Pater, Ibsen; a good musical education in his boyhood, wherein Bach and Beethoven and Schumann are his gods, breaks into a superficial brilliance and comes to nothing. He knows no disciplines. He is desperately concerned with the problem of religion. He loves accidentally, capriciously, unsatisfyingly. All this as a picture of the chaotic state of education at the tail-end of the Victorian era is well enough. But the novelist who tries to describe chaos must, by a paradox, be himself very clear and bright and well ordered. Mr. Orton is vague and without edge. His hero is surrounded by ghosts—ghosts of ideas, ghosts of men and women; his parents are ghosts, his friends only a little less so. Nothing emerges sharply. Michael's boyhood, his schooling, his father's shop, his casual attempts to find a proper school, a useful trade, are all veiled and unclear. Even his death in battle is a little vague. The result is unsatisfying.

THE GROWN-UPS. By Catharine Whitcomb. Random House. $2.50.

Miss Whitcomb, with a much less ambitious scheme, has solved her problem more cleverly. Children of divorced parents, she says, are likely to be mauled about by servants, to overhear dreadful grown-up quarrels they do not quite understand; they have no real home, their status at school is dubious; their insecurity makes them unhappy in various ways, but always unhappy. Stated thus baldly, this is the sort of over-emphasis that makes statisticians tear their hair. But Miss Whitcomb is not interested in statistics. She merely presents a couple of children—a little, vague, unprotesting boy and a girl who grows up in spite of her father's various marriages. In the earlier chapters of her book she is clear, explicit, and touching. These are credible children and they say something particularly about such children in general. Later on Miss Whitcomb becomes a little lush; there are too many dazzlingly beautiful women in her novel. But in spite of them she has preached a rather impressive sermon.

PIE IN THE SKY. By Arthur Calder-Marshall. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Mr. Calder-Marshall is neither historian nor preacher. He merely presents a group of people. A hearty, keen-witted father, a dull, moralistic son, a lively, ineffectual son—and a woman. None of these persons is expertly realized, yet the total effect of the four, along with the incidental characters in the novel, is interesting, credible, and persuasive. These people have various occupations and as many preoccupations; they are bitter, defeated, courageous, humorous. They portray England today rather more successfully than Mr. Orton was able to portray England before the war. Mr. Calder-Marshall does not concern himself very much with what his men and women think—in spite of a number of earnest conversations about the revolution; but he writes rather well of what they do. Which is perhaps the safest way of writing a novel, after all.

CAROLINE SMITH

NON-COMBATANT Of Spain Need

- Condensed milk
- Coffee
- Sardines
- Dried beans
- Chick beans
- Granulated sugar
- Flour
- Chicken broth
(for hospitals)
- Chocolate
- Cigarettes

The cargo for The Nation's Food Ship for Spain is rapidly piling up. Money is coming in fast. The first two envelopes we opened in this morning's mail held a thousand and one dollars. A thousand dollars in one envelope, a dollar in the other. For both our thanks. And for both, you can be sure, the thanks of the Spanish non-combatants. Each check was a generous share from the giver.

Out of each dollar you send, a small portion of each of these foods can go to a single woman, child, or old man.

But we must hurry. Spain needs food more this week than last. The food must be shipped quickly. If you wish to send a part of the food ship, please mail this coupon at once.

I enclose $.....

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Make checks payable to The Nation's Food Ship Fund,
HELEN WOODWARD, Chairman, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

ANDRÉ MALRAUX SPEAKS!

at the

SEND-OFF DINNER

for

American Artists and Writers Ambulance Corps

GUESTS OF HONOR:

André Malraux
Theodore Dreiser
Muriel Draper
Vito Marcantonio
Max Weber
Art Young
Louis Adamic

HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA

TUESDAY, MARCH 16TH, 8:30 P. M.

Dinner $2.50. For reservations call BARclay 7-3810

AUSPICES:

American Artists and Writers Committee—Medical Bureau
American Friends of Spanish Democracy
20 Vesey Street
New York

SPONSORS:

Sherwood Anderson	Fannie Hurst
Arnold Blanch	George S. Kaufman
Margaret Bourke-White	Rockwell Kent
Malcolm Cowley	Sinclair Lewis
Adolph Dehn	Lewis Mumford
Theodore Dreiser	Dorothy Parker
Edna Ferber	Herman Shumlin
Dorothy Canfield Fisher	Sylvia Sidney
Lewis Gannett	Upton Sinclair
Ernest Hemingway	Max Weber

IN SIGHT OF MOUNTAINS. By C. A. Millspaugh.
Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.75.

Mr. Millspaugh's first volume follows rather closely a pattern of development that has become familiar in recent poetry. It consists in (a) an apprenticeship in technique to Hopkins, Eliot, and the other reigning masters; (b) an attempt to fit contemporary experience to the demands of a wiry intellect, an acute if tortuous sensibility, and an expectation of human decency; (c) an expression of agony at the partial frustration of these demands; and (d) a reorientation of the self, with a discarding of baggage in preparation for the journey to the Magnetic Mountain. If Mr. Millspaugh's are not among the more original variations upon this common pattern, they are at any rate among the more skilful. He has not yet found the verse type, or set of verse types, most suitable to his talents and insights—probably because these are themselves still fluid—but he uses neatly a great variety of forms, including sprung rhythm, Eliotesque free Alexandrines, Poundian pseudo-Provençal, neo-Grecian strophes, ballad stanzas, and even the sonnet. What impresses most, perhaps, is his feeling for word values, both musical and semantic. This enables him to write lines that sing, and to obtain frequently a direct hit with an epigrammatic phrase or a homely image. There is observation, both inner and outer, in the poems, but this is mostly casual; as with other poets under thirty, the words guide the course of the poem rather than serve effortlessly a central intuition. When he has mastered his craft to the point where it is no longer his primary concern, some very fine work may be expected from him.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

THE Nation WITH Reader's Digest FOR ONLY $6

Two of America's most outstanding periodicals for $1 more than the price of The Nation alone!

The Reader's Digest affords a delightful but inexpensive means of keeping well informed. Each issue reprints over 30 articles so skillfully condensed they preserve the essence of the original without loss of thought, spirit, or style. In its monthly harvest of 112 pages you find the very articles you would mark for reading if it were possible for you to check through all the current periodicals.

As a reader of The Nation you already appreciate its importance in your reading scheme. More than ever before, during the next twelve, tempestuous months you will need The Nation for its truthful account of the significant news and for its fearless, authoritative interpretation.

Subscriptions are for one year. They may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. You need send no money for 30 days. But to assure your receiving this bargain rate we urge you to fill in and mail the coupon at once.

THE NATION,
20 Vesey Street,
New York City.

3-13-37

Name _____

Address _____

Send me one year of
The Reader's Digest
and The Nation for $6. ☐ I enclose my check. OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

When writing to

DRAMA

Gentleman Crook

"THE AMAZING DR. CLITTERHOUSE" (Hudson Theater) is an unusually entertaining bit of theatrical piffle, and it will have, I think, better luck than either of the two other English mysteries seen here this year. There is nothing in it to equal the few moments of horror for which "Love from a Stranger" existed, and it lacks the touch of the macabre which made "Night Must Fall" extraordinary, but it does have one virtue which both of those plays lacked. It moves steadily forward under increasing tension, and without seeming ever to force things it allows no moment for question or reflection.

Calmly considered, the premise may seem a little bit thick. After the fall of the curtain one may wonder whether it is, after all, very probable that a highly successful doctor should be led into a career of crime because he is anxious to study the physiological reactions of the burglar while burgling. But even this difficulty is skilfully met, and without ever being specific the play manages to suggest that you may, if you like, suspect the doctor's own explanation and regard it as no more than a subtle rationalization. Indeed, the ambiguous conclusion is one of the most ingenious things in the play and it all seems quite as credible as it needs to be, partly I suspect because the degree of credibility remains the same throughout. In any play we quickly adjust ourselves to the standard the author himself sets. We are as gullible as he expects us by premise to be, and the great mistake is to introduce anything harder to believe than the things we have initially agreed to accept. That mistake the author of "The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse" never makes. We are never shocked into protest by any improbability greater than we accepted to begin with, and he leads us steadily to a climax and a solution perfectly acceptable because perfectly of a piece with everything which has gone before.

also mention The Nation

Like most English thrillers, this one scorns the crude violence of its American counterparts. Even its criminal characters are too well bred to favor the "Sez you" type of repartee, without which our native crook plays would be impossible, and Dr. Clitterhouse himself is a credit to the Public School he indubitably attended. Incidentally, he is well played in the best English manner of understatement by Sir Cedric Hardwicke, and all the other roles are well filled—especially that undertaken by Clarence Derwent as the double-crossing (excuse me, treacherous) receiver whose quiet death at the hands of the doctor seems to the audience not only highly desirable in itself but a fitting climax to the hero's career.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"The Sun and I" (Adelphi Theater), one of the most knowing scripts to emerge from Federal Theater workshops so far, has been favored with a production appropriately urbane and eye-filling. Costumes, settings, and incidental music contribute unstintingly to the task of converting Egypt into theater, but the play itself is inclined to dawdle between frivolity and preachment. In general the authors have recast the story of Joseph and his brethren in a vein of bantering if sympathetic cynicism, appending a Marxian rubric to the Biblical text and streamlining the narrative accordingly. The vision of the bowing sheaves and stars, for example, is accounted for on the basis of a will-to-power, while the stages in Joseph's rise to absolute authority in Egypt are seen as fated contingencies in a career destined from the outset to a fulfilment in benevolent despotism. In the end Joseph's dictatorial methods, for all their good intent, work his undoing, and he speeds the final curtain with the prophecy of a state in which workers will achieve their salvation by their own hand. David Enton as Joseph helps to give direction to the somewhat unclear and discursive conception, and there are careful performances by Frederic Tozere as Pharaoh, Suzanne Caubaye as Vashnee, and Gustave Gordon as Potiphar.

B. B.

FILMS

Alfred Hitchcock

AFTER a month of drought there has come a flood of interesting films—so many, in fact, that a column cannot do justice to them. Or perhaps it can. For justice is among other things a search for the excellent; and in the course of its arduous climb it has every right to deal both rapidly and roughly with the less excellent. I shall begin at the bottom with "The Man Who Could Work Miracles" (Korda), in which the delightful opportunities for trick photography offered by H. G. Wells's tale are defeated by an unimaginative direction and by obvious preachments; also

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by
C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A.,
Member White House Conference,
Committee on Maternal Care,
Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

including
charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M. D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

3-WAY GUIDE: TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect upon Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Sex Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via the Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries in Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sex Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—*Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

*The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View • Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.
The Internal Sex Organs • The External Sex Organs • Female Sex Organs, Front View • Entrance to

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 873-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with
HENRY HULL MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40. Eves. 8:40. Seats $1.10

STORM OVER PATSY

by Bruno Frank, adapted by James Bridie

with
SARA ALLGOOD ROGER LIVESEY
CLAUDIA MORGAN IAN McLEAN
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30. Eves. 8:30

MARCHING SONG

THEATRE
UNION
production

By John Howard Lawson

BAYES THEATRE, 44th St. W. of Bway., BR 9-3648
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. Sat. Prices: 45c, 60c, 75c, $1, $1.50—No Tax
For Benefit Theatre Party Rates Call BR 9-2375

"A powerful and exciting social drama of inescapable interest." —
Watts, Herald Trib.

"Brilliantly etched with savage humor." —
Atkinson, Times.

Luncheon Discussion

Auspices: The Society for Ethical Culture

HARLEM: A SYMBOL OF RACE CONFLICT

Speakers will include:

Otto Klineberg, E. Franklin Frazier, Walter White

Saturday, March 20 — Hotel Astor — 12:30

Tickets: $1.50 (including Round Tables following)

Reservations: INSTITUTE ON HUMAN RELATIONS
2 West 64th Street—SU 5-2000

A frank and open discussion which concerns every honest supporter of PEACE and FREEDOM!

"SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY"

presents

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Author and Editor

"WHERE DO THE LIBERALS STAND?"

LOUIS FISCHER
Moscow Correspondent

"THE SOVIET UNION
IN SPAIN"

JAMES WATERMAN WISE
Editor of "Opinion"

"THE THREAT TO DEMOCRACY"

MALCOLM COWLEY, Chairman
Literary Editor "New Republic"

MECCA TEMPLE, 133 West 55th Street
FRIDAY, MARCH 19TH, 8 p. m.

Tickets 25c-40c-75c—At All Workers Bookshops
Advance Tickets "Soviet Russia Today," 824 B'way, AL. 4-2378

$5,000.00 IN PRIZES

is offered by the

NEW HISTORY SOCIETY

for the best papers of not more than 2,000 words on the subject:

"HOW CAN THE PEOPLE OF THE WORLD ACHIEVE UNIVERSAL DISARMAMENT?"

Everybody is entitled to compete

There is no registration fee or obligation of any kind.
For rules and further information enclose a 3c stamp to:

THE NEW HISTORY SOCIETY

132 East 65th Street

New York, N. Y.

Contest closes May 1st, 1937

ADD YOUR VOICE TO THE WORLD'S CRY FOR PEACE!

by the ridiculously British faces of three young men who ride horses in the clouds and pass remarks about those little fools on earth. I preferred the little fools, particularly Roland Young, whose heroic struggle against impossible odds ought to be recorded among the stars. Ronald Colman staggers under a similar handicap in "Lost Horizon" (Columbia), where a brilliant beginning and a great deal of wonderful photography throughout do not conceal the fact that the message of the movie is shamefully soft and false. The blame for this is probably to be divided between James Hilton and Robert Riskin; I should hate to place it on the director, Frank Capra, who after all gave us "It Happened One Night" and "Mr. Deeds." He has been mechanically superb in "Lost Horizon," but the moral seems to be that mind counts for something even in movies. I think so well of movies, indeed, that I am willing to say it counts for everything, as it does in any other art. A little more of it, for instance, would have dissolved the absurd nobility out of "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer), in which amusing film William Powell, Robert Montgomery, and Joan Crawford make so many sacrifices for one another toward the end that they begin to look bewildered long before Mr. Powell motors politely off to prison. "The Wedding of Palo," an Eskimo film by Knud Rasmussen (Fifty-fifth Street Theater), falls but a trifle short of "Nanook of the North" and "Man of Aran," and "Prisoners" (Amkino) is considerably above the Russian average. But I must hasten on to Alfred Hitchcock, who in "The Woman Alone" (Gaumont-British) seems to me to prove once again that he is the best film director now flourishing.

The maker of "The Thirty-nine Steps" and "The Man Who Knew Too Much" keeps, as always, perfectly within his bounds. His story (from Conrad's "Secret Agent") is a melodrama; his scene is a theater—this time a small London cinema; the streets through which his people occasionally pass are beautiful in their meanness and their truth; he does not spare us several painful deaths; he is merciless with his suspense. But what is more important than all that, Mr. Hitchcock keeps perfectly within the bounds of the movie art. He knows exactly what a movie should be and do; so exactly, in fact, that a live wire seems to run backward from any of his films to all the best films one can remember, connecting them with it in a conspiracy to shock us into a special state of consciousness with respect to the art. There is something old-fashioned about his pictures, as there is about the best things of any kind; and not the only sign of this in "The Woman Alone" is the circumstance that its dialogue is unnecessary without being precisely superfluous. He has told his story with the camera. And how he has told it! The beginning is possibly no more brilliant than the beginning of "Lost Horizon"; but it is only the beginning of something that moves with an actually increasing smoothness and speed to the very end. An analysis of the film would reveal not merely that there were many good details but that there was nothing but detail, and all of it good. Sylvia Sidney in the ticket booth, the boy in the bus, Oscar Homolka at the aquarium and in the turnstile, the episode of the knife and fork—these are only a few among the hundreds. The whole thing is irreducibly concrete, as if a master had decided to show us how much of a virtuoso he could be. And yet the final effect is not a virtuoso effect. It is merely the most interesting story that any film has told this year—the most interesting because Mr. Hitchcock has told it with the simplest, the deepest, and the most accurate imagination at work anywhere.

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

The Truth About Palestine

Dear Sirs: Practically all of the facts cited by Albert Viton in his articles The Fate of Zionism and A Solution for Palestine, published in The Nation on December 19 and 26, are inaccurate and misleading. In the interest of truth it is necessary to refute at least some of his misstatements. All facts stated herein are taken from official sources.

1. Displaced Arabs. Mr. Viton states: "If Jewish settlement continues on its past scale, there can be no doubt that it will spell the ruin of an increasing number of Arab peasants." He goes on to say that 2,000 Arab cultivators have been displaced in the plains of Esdraelon and Acre and a few hundred more around Jaffa.

The truth is that the Arab rural population, which in 1922 was 65.6 per cent of the total Arab population, rose to 67.3 per cent in 1931 (last census). During the same period the settled non-Jewish population increased from 565,000 to 795,000, and to 900,000 in 1936. The Arab population, rural as well as urban, has increased in the greatest numbers in those areas which are centers of Jewish development.

A special commission was appointed by the Palestine government in 1931 to ascertain the number of "displaced Arabs"—that is, those who had to move from their land as a result of its sale or transfer to Jews—for whose resettlement the government of Palestine appropriated the sum of £250,000. Here was an unprecedented situation—a government actually saying: "We have money to spend for settlement. Please put in your application and we shall do our best." And what happened? Mr. Andrews, development officer of the government of Palestine in charge of the resettlement scheme, testified before the Palestine Royal Commission now sitting in Palestine that "the government had to scout around to get people to put in their applications." Mr. Andrews stated that "since 1931 there had been received from landless Arabs [who claimed to have been displaced either before or after 1931] 3,271 applications for resettlement. Of these only 664 fell within the definition, that is, had had to move from their land as a result of its sale or transfer to Jews; and of the 664 families, 317 declined on various grounds to take up holdings offered and 347 families had been provided for upon government estates." Mr. Andrews further stated that among those who had submitted their claims for resettlement were families who had left their land long before it was sold or transferred to Jews; families who had had to leave the land because of sale to non-Jews; unsuccessful cultivators with livestock and money who had voluntarily abandoned their land; and unsuccessful traders who at no time had been cultivators of land. It should be added that of the 664 families whose claims were recognized, only 460 were actual cultivators, the others being "tribesmen" and not cultivators.

But even these facts do not tell the whole story. The Land Transfer Ordinance provides that any person wishing to sell his land must first obtain the consent of the government. In the case of agricultural land leased by tenants, such consent is to be given only if the Registrar of Lands is satisfied that "any tenant in occupation will retain sufficient land in the district or elsewhere for the maintenance of himself and his family." While the law places upon the selling landowner the burden of compensating the tenant, the Jews, who were not obligated to do so, have paid in addition to the purchase price handsome sums to the Arab tenants who were made to move. And in addition these tenants were being settled, as shown before, at government expense.

The utter absurdity of the charge that Jews have displaced Arabs in Palestine is even more apparent when one learns that while the non-Jewish population, rural and urban, has increased by about 70 per cent since the World War, the so-called displaced Arabs constitute only 1/3 of 1 per cent of the total Arab population!

2. Jewish Agricultural Settlement. The Jews at present own approximately 1,300,000 dunams of land, which is only 5 per cent of the total area of Palestine. Mr. Viton declares that there is little chance for the settlement of an additional large number of Jews on the land because, first, it is impossible to settle Jews without displacing Arabs, and, secondly, cultivable land for additional settlement is not available.

What is "cultivable land"? Mr. Viton apparently accepts the definition of the Palestine government that cultivable land is land "which is actually under cultivation or which may be cultivated by the application of resources which are at the disposal of the average Palestinian cultivator." By this definition the cultivability of land is not determined by its inherent qualities or by the application of scientific methods, but is governed by the "resources" of the "average Palestinian cultivator," meaning the average Arab cultivator. By reducing this proposition to its dryly logical conclusion, it would follow that since the average cultivator has no resources, there is no cultivable land available.

If this definition were applied, such large agricultural centers as Petach Tikvah, Rishon-le-Zion, Hederah, Ain Harold, Nahalal, and scores of other settlements, extending over tens of thousands of dunams and providing sustenance to scores of thousands of Jews—and many Arabs—could not have been established, all having been founded on "uncultivable" land. Since 1930 over fifty new agricultural settlements have been established—without displacement, as shown—on "uncultivable land."

No attempt has yet been made to ascertain what portion of the land now held to be "uncultivable"—more than one-half of the total area of Palestine—could be rendered cultivable by the application of the man-power, capital, skill, scientific methods, and, above all, will which the Jews are eager to bring to this land. It is not possible now to determine the number of Jewish families which can ultimately be settled on the land, for that land is cultivable which eventually will be cultivated. The Huleh area in the north of Palestine is a good example. In 1930 Sir John Hope Simpson called it "a plague spot." For the most part it was covered by malarial swamps providing a meager existence for a few impoverished inhabitants. It was not cultivated, and according to the government's definition it certainly was not cultivable, for the "average Palestinian cultivator" did not have the means, let alone the vision, desire, and energy, to reclaim it. Now, only a few years later, the whole Huleh area, extending over about 55,000 dunams, is being developed by Jews under a concession from the Palestine government by the terms of which 15,000 dunams—reclaimed and fit for immediate use—will be reserved for the settlement of Arabs, who are not asked to contribute one red cent toward the cost of reclamation and amelioration. Thousands of families, Jewish and Arab, will thus be settled on formerly "uncultivable" land.

3. Industry. Mr. Viton states that "the present rate of industrial development cannot be maintained in the future. In fact, it would appear that most of the industries have already reached the peak of development." He adds that "industry cannot develop much more except for industries depending on locally grown fruit."

Despite the lack of help by the government, the absence of raw material, the lack of trained labor, insufficient credit, undeveloped markets, and many other difficulties, Palestine's industry has made, in Mr. Viton's own words, "tremendous progress in a short time." Industrial production, which in 1921-22 was valued at £500,000, reached £8,500,000 in 1935. The number of employees in industry rose during the same period from 4,750 to 32,830.

Sales of electric power by the Palestine Electric Corporation increased from 2,527,126 kilowatt hours in 1927 to 34,385,515 kilowatt hours in 1934, and to 50,362,193 kilowatt hours in 1935. But Mr. Viton, late in 1936, gave electric consumption figures only for 1934 and asserted that "this rate of development . . . cannot be maintained in the future." However, electric consumption in 1935 was 45 per cent higher than in 1934, and figures for the first ten months of 1936 (latest available) show an increase in electric consumption of 31 per cent over the same period in 1935.

While the world index of industrial production fell from 100 in 1929 to 76 in 1934, that of Jewish industry in Palestine rose from 100 in 1929 to 320 in 1935. The development of industry in Palestine represents the creation of an entirely new source of wealth which, but for Jewish resourcefulness, capital, and love for the country, would never have come into existence.

Mr. Viton's description of the status of the Arabs, labor conditions and wages, employment situation, standard and cost of living, capital available for investment, density of population, and so on are also incorrect and misleading.

MAURICE BOUKSTEIN, Director,

New York Bureau, American Economic Committee for Palestine
New York, February 1

The Important Thing

Dear Sirs: Few things just now make me angrier than the reiterated suggestion that Germany should have some colonies in order that she may get raw materials from them. The most important thing in a so-called colony is the people; and people ought not to be disposed of on the basis of somebody's desire for the vegetable products of their country.

Specifically, a non-Aryan population ought not to be put under a government whose avowed principle is that non-Aryans are not entitled to equal rights. Grant, if you like, that other governments hypocritically act on this principle without avowing it; even so, the black man is better off under a power which at least recognizes that agitation for the black man's rights is legitimate public discussion. Furthermore, those who are willing to pay for raw materials can get them in the market; when a power says that it must have colonies as a source of raw materials, that implies that it wants a chance to get them without paying—in other words, by plunder.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Ballard Vale, Mass., March 4

Condemned to Death

Dear Sirs: I have just received from the Spanish government a cablegram which is self-explanatory:

The President of Oviedo University, Dr. Leopoldo Alas, has been sentenced to death by the rebel junta. We entertain well-founded fears that the sentence is going to be carried out. This eminent intellectual has been inactive in politics since before the fascist rebellion. In his charges against Dr. Alas the prosecutor has stated: "The most rigorous repression must begin with those who by virtue of their intellectual capacity and culture are responsible for the poisoning of the Spanish conscience and for all the blood that has been shed."

The charges against Dr. Alas are grounded solely on trivial facts which occurred long before the rebellion and are wholly disconnected with the uprising. The crimes charged to him are the following: his having been Under Secretary of Justice and member of the House of Representatives during the first republican government, from 1931 to 1933; his having taken part in public gatherings of the Left Republican Party; his having lectured in favor of the establishment of a public and non-sectarian educational system; his having taken part, as a spectator, in an open meeting in which the pardon of Thälmann was requested; and even his having once stated in a press interview that all professional journalists should be expected to possess a degree of culture superior to that of the average man.

During the trial several of his university colleagues testified favorably to his conduct as professor and as president of the university. The whole trial is a juridical monstrosity and a typical example of the persecution of intellectuals, professors, and Catholic loyalists by the rebels. The University of Paris and other universities in France and Belgium have wired the Burgos junta asking the commutation of the death sentence.

If you find it advisable, I should deeply appreciate your doing everything possible to intercede in favor of Dr. Alas.

FERNANDO DE LOS RIOS,
Former President of Madrid University
Washington, February 15

CONTRIBUTORS

H. C. ENGELBRECHT, coauthor with Frank Hanighen of "Merchants of Death," a book on the munitions manufacturers, contributed two articles on how to control the arms industry to The Nation last winter. He is editor of World Events.

CHARLES R. WALKER, journalist and editor, is the author of "Steel, the Diary of a Furnace Worker." His new book "American City," a study of class conflict in Minneapolis, has just been published by Farrar and Rinehart.

JUDITH GRUNFELD was until 1933 a member of the German Trade Union Research staff in Berlin. She is the author of "Rationalization and Employment of Women in Germany," "Social Principles in German National Economy," and other books.

KARL N. LLEWELLYN, professor of law at the Columbia Law School and member of the New York Commission of Uniform State Laws, is considered the leader of the realist school of American jurisprudence. He is the author of a remarkable book on legal theory, "The Bramble Bush."

MURIEL RUKEYSER is the author of "Theory of Flight," a volume of poems which was included in The Nation's list of the sixty outstanding books of 1936. She has just completed for spring publication a prose account of the first week of the war in Catalonia, "Savage Coast."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
The Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 20, 1937

NUMBER 12

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

309

EDITORIALS

NO BROWN-SHIRT ARMIES!

312

THE LAST PURITAN

312

JAPANESE BEARING GIFTS

313

GENERAL JOHNSON AND LABOR

by Paul W. Ward

314

FORGING MAN'S FATE IN SPAIN

by André Malraux

315

HITLER MOBILIZES "MOTHER GOOSE"

by Ralph Thurston

317

THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY IN MINNESOTA

II. GOVERNOR OLSON'S LAST INTERVIEW

by Charles R. Walker

318

MANUEL QUEZON—PHILIPPINE DICTATOR

by James S. Allen

320

SANTO DOMINGO, 1937

by Oswald Garrison Villard

323

UNCENSORED COLUMN: CHILD LABOR

by Heywood Broun

325

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

ST. THOMAS AND THE MOVIES

by Joseph Wood Krutch

326

ANIMAL MYSTERY ON DISPLAY by David Greenhood

327

MINNEAPOLIS PICKET WARS by James Rorty

327

MR. WELLS PICKS A BONE by Ben Belitt

329

WHITMAN RECONSIDERED by Eda Lou Walton

330

IMPROVING THE GOSPELS by R. N.

NEW NOVELS by Caroline Smith

332

DRAMA: SWEET AND LIGHT by Joseph Wood Krutch

333

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

334

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

THE CHOICE OF CLARENCE DYKSTRA FOR THE University of Wisconsin presidency, to succeed Glenn Frank, seems to us wholly admirable. Mr. Dykstra is already a national figure. He has been through the academic wars as member of the faculty at several Midwestern state universities, and he should be no stranger to the atmosphere of such a campus as Wisconsin. He is a liberal, moreover, who will like (as Mr. Frank never liked) the political climate of a progressive state. His administrative experience is scarcely second to that of anyone in the country: under his management Cincinnati has had the reputation of the best-governed city in America, and his brilliant performance in handling the recent flood emergency is still remembered. Most important of all, however, Mr. Dykstra will not come to his post, as Mr. Frank came, heralded by all the bright pretensions of a Great Leader and a Public Force. He is merely what every good university president should be: a competent scholar, a good administrator, a genial and tactful person.

★

TWO LANDMARKS OF JUDICIAL HISTORY: thus we must describe Mr. Roosevelt's radio speech on the Supreme Court last week and Assistant Attorney-General Robert H. Jackson's statement at the Senate committee hearings. Both of them, of course, were "partisan" just as their opponents have been "partisan"; each side seeks to push its position while arguing in terms of the national interest as a whole. But nothing abler and clearer than the Roosevelt and Jackson statements has emerged from the entire debate, and nothing that will better stand the test of time. We ask every progressive who still feels a serious doubt about the need for passing the President's proposal to study the two speeches and compare them with the best that has been urged on the other side.

★

FRIENDS OF THE SPANISH DEMOCRATIC forces were dismayed last week by reports that some 80,000 or 90,000 Italian soldiers had been thrown into the invasion of Spain. The reports are clearly true. But that does not mean that Spain will be another Abyssinia. The latest dispatches in the New York Times from Herbert L. Matthews, who is doing brilliant work as Madrid correspondent, declare that the Italians are on the run.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

One reason for this is the increasing effectiveness of loyalist propaganda. Earlier attempts by the government to tell the Moors and the insurgent Spaniards the truth about the Franco regime had only a fragmentary success. Now, however, the Italian anti-fascists in the International Column have learned how to reach the Italians who have been sent by Il Duce in a cause which is not their own. A second factor, reinforcing this propaganda, is the greater strength of the loyalist air force, which has been doing splendid work on the Guadalajara front. Thus bombs and literature are working together to destroy Italian morale.

★

THE CHRYSLER CORPORATION HAS FAILED to obtain from the United Automobile Workers the relatively easy terms on which the General Motors strike was settled. The union is making a much stronger bid to be designated as sole bargaining agency. The reasons are clear. The General Motors strike can be counted as a victory, and the union's majority in the Chrysler factories is not questioned. Governor Murphy has called a citizens' conference, with the palpable hope of getting rid of the sitdown. He has also declared, referring to Judge Campbell's injunction ordering Lewis, Martin, and others to vacate the plants, that "there should be no disobedience of court orders." It does not seem likely, however, in view of his own all too recent precedent, that he will allow the Chrysler sitdown to be ended by violence. We believe earnestly that the American public is becoming increasingly aware of the fact that the sitdown is more than a matter of simple trespass. It is significant that Judge Campbell's opinion is far less militant than was Judge Gadola's in the General Motors case. The sitdown has not yet been recognized as legal. But law is a process of growth, and all the forces of the time are conspiring to give the sitdown legality.

★

THE COPELAND FOOD AND DRUG BILL, JUST passed by the Senate, brings cosmetics within the purview of the Food and Drug Administration but does little more to advance protection of the consumer. The Senate had the good grace to temper the iniquitous Bailey amendment a little, but it is still necessary under the law to prove that a quack is not only a crook but a deliberate crook as well. It remained for Senator Borah to make the bill even worse as it passed the Senate than it was when it came out of Copeland's committee. Borah obtained an amendment giving defendants in seizure cases the right to trial on their home grounds. As a result the Idaho apple grower, brought to book for shipping fruit thickly incrustated with poisonous spray residues, may be tried by a jury of his fellow apple growers in Idaho rather than by a jury of consumers in New York who don't like poison. The battle scene now shifts to the House and its Interstate Commerce Committee. The most hopeful news of the week for consumers is that Representative Cole of Maryland has quit fence-straddling and become a champion of the consumer in the committee's proceedings.

SECRETARY HULL'S REVERSAL OF HIS STAND on granting passports to medical and relief missions going to Spain has been attributed in part, by the Herald Tribune's Washington bureau, to last week's editorial in The Nation, Is the State Department Favoring General Franco? We are of course happy to have had a share in bringing American policy back into line with its humane traditions. Mr. Hull's earlier insistence that relief and medical aid could be handled through the International Red Cross is interesting in the light of the fact that thus far the Red Cross has spent only $62,082 in Spain, much of it for evacuating Americans and other foreigners from the war zones. So much for what the Red Cross could or would do in fulfilling the intentions of those who care about Spanish democracy. Two lines of effort remain for Americans. One is to continue their support of medical aid and food relief. The response to The Nation's efforts to raise money for a food ship has been gratifying, and food is now on the docks awaiting shipment. But it is not enough to relieve hunger and suffering. The prestige of a powerful democracy like ours is enormous. Mr. Roosevelt, backed by a massed American opinion, could by open appeal start an irresistible movement of protest against the rape of Spain by fascist powers.

★

WE OWE AN EXPLANATION TO OUR READERS on the way we interpreted in last week's issue the sinking of the Mar Cantabrico. Reports from rebel sources have in the past been so notoriously false that we checked this one as usual. We found that when the ship set out it had been agreed that on its arrival in Spain a cipher message was to be sent to America; and that this message actually arrived about a week before the report of the sinking. On this we based our report. What happened, of course, was that the ship was riddled with spies from the start, who on the passage to Spain killed the captain, took control of the vessel, and arranged with other spies in Spain to send the message. If the full story is ever revealed, it will read like the most fantastic fiction.

★

THERE WAS SOMETHING TRULY ALARMING in the spectacle of John P. Frey hotfooting it to Pittsburgh to advise with the company union of the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Corporation, at the union's request, on ways and means of combating the C. I. O. It suddenly turned pathetic when the company union refused to join Mr. Frey's outfit, saying that a craft-union set-up would cause confusion in the industry. All along the line the A. F. of L., in its avowed campaign to sabotage the C. I. O., is doomed to be defeated by its lack of energy and its antiquated point of view. It will continually find itself in the position of having started something which the C. I. O. is much better equipped to finish. The announcement by the Maryland State Federation that local unions affiliated with the C. I. O. were not eligible for membership was one of the events that led the C. I. O. to announce that it would henceforth certify state and city affiliates as the need arises. Another was the suicidal action of the Cleveland Federation of Labor in expelling the C. I. O. unions in an industrial region where the C. I. O. has enormous potential strength. There is now talk of a national convention at which the executive council will finally expel the Lewis unions. The actual result of the A. F. of L. policy will be to limit its own influence and membership to an ever-diminishing section of labor which is genuinely adapted to craft unionism.

★

MARCH 18 MARKS THE CENTENARY OF THE birth of Grover Cleveland. We hope the Democrats are not so preoccupied with their internal strife over the Supreme Court as to forget to celebrate someone on whom they can all unite. For Cleveland was a curious blend of the courageous reformer and the diehard conservative. In civil-service administration he called a halt to the shameless spoliation that marked the decades of Republican rule after the Civil War. "I seem always to be saying no," he remarked, and it took stamina to say no to the thousands of hungry office-seekers. But this stamina could also become a stiffness of mind that kept him from understanding and adapting himself to the forces of social change. The only way he knew to deal with the Pullman strike in 1894 was to call out the federal troops. The only way he knew to deal with the financial crisis in his second term was to insist on maintaining the gold standard unimpaired at any social cost. Thus when he left the Presidency, he had endeared himself to the "sound-money" men but he had also furnished the common man with an excellent education as to the nature of a "reform President." We trust that Mr. Roosevelt will not be another stage in the same education.

★

CALIFORNIA'S AGRICULTURAL WORKERS, most of them migratory, have been the stepchildren alike of the agricultural system and of the "respectable" labor movement. Organization has been sporadic and limited, with the result that vigilante terror, police oppression, and horrible living conditions have kept 200,000 workers in a continuous state of poverty and insecurity—the annual wage ranges from $250 to $350 per family. Now a succession of circumstances, including the wave of labor organization sweeping the country and, more immediately, the hearings of the President's Committee on Farm Tenancy held in San Francisco, have forced the State Federation of Labor to act. Late in February a hundred delegates from various agricultural and cannery unions in the state met at a conference. The federation officials in charge tried to put through a form of organization which would be the creature of the state federation's executive council. The attempt failed because of the alertness of the workers' representatives. As a result a committee was appointed to draw up a democratic constitution to be presented to the federation's executive council on March 21. Will the council now abandon its former tactics and help build a strong union? As long as 200,000 agricultural workers remain unorganized, their status undermines the living standards and security of all labor.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS HANG SUSPENDED, like other colonial lands, between the devil of imperialism and the deep blue sea of "independence"—at the risk of economic strangulation. They cannot hope to win genuine political independence, because they are too important to America as a military and naval base. They hardly want economic independence, because over a period of years, under pressure from America, their economy has become so enmeshed in the pattern of American trade that severance of relations now would upset their own stability. Inevitably, in such a situation, there arises a politician ready and willing to exploit it. Cuba has had its Machado. The Philippines have their Quezon. With the aid of our own General MacArthur, President Quezon has built up a formidable dictatorship, subservient to capital both native and American, which is analyzed on another page by James S. Allen. President Quezon is at present in this country arranging for a conference—promised at the time the independence act was passed—to discuss and if possible modify certain clauses in the act which are extremely unfavorable to the Islands. In later articles Mr. Allen will discuss the economic problems involved in the conference.

★

THE SEATTLE ELECTIONS ON MARCH 9 WERE a victory for organized labor. Three labor-indorsed candidates gained seats in the city council, giving labor five out of nine votes in the new council. One of them was Hugh DeLacy, member of the University of Washington's teachers' union, who was dismissed for entering the political race. The returns add to the prestige of the Washington Commonwealth Federation and of Mayor John F. Dore, who led the campaign for the labor candidates and urged the need of living wages and complete union organization. This proves what progressives can accomplish in local politics.

★

OUR CONTEMPORARY, THE NEW YORKER, HAS succumbed to the Supreme Court controversy. Hitherto aloof from the political struggle, it has now, to our regret, stepped down to join the free-for-all among us old and hardened gladiators. We feel uneasy and disillusioned. Here is the crumbling of the last and best of our ivory towers. In the past, when we were troubled by a nightmare of Trotsky on a sitdown strike in the Supreme Court, or Mrs. Roosevelt leading a battalion of du Ponts to the defense of Madrid, we would wake and reach for the New Yorker. There, in the odyssey of Hyman Kaplan, the drawings of Thurber and Hokinson, we would find calm and refreshment till the dawn came. But no longer can we go for solace to the New Yorker, for fear of opening its pages and finding just another argument on the judiciary. Nor will it stop there. Once the first step is taken the descent is easy. Pretty soon the editors will be discussing neutrality, then the C. I. O., then social security, and before long the New Yorker will be found taking a stand on rural electrification. We might just as well subscribe to the Congressional Record.

No Brown-Shirt Armies!

IT WAS no accident that news of the formation of a uniformed army of Nazi Americans came immediately after the attack of the Hitler press upon the American Jews. There is a connection between the two. Hitler's program in every country has been to stir up anti-Semitic feeling at every opportunity, and meanwhile to use a private army of storm troops as a nucleus around which terrorist activities can be organized. Fritz Kuhn, the leader of the American storm troops, has had himself photographed with his aides in their shiny new uniforms, and an order has gone out that every member of the organization must outfit himself in the same uniform, equipped in every detail down to a Sam Browne belt and a swastika emblem. Although he has chosen as uniform something other than the German brown shirt, the fact remains that this is a brown-shirt army, with the same purposes as the German Brown Shirts, subservient to the same Führer, aiming at the same totalitarian state.

There is of course the danger of overestimating the strength of the organization. It claims 200,000 members, whereas one-half of that number would probably be a better approximation. It is, moreover, torn by internal strife, as is pointed out by the excellent new American-German weekly, the Deutsches Volksecho, which is rallying all Germans in America who feel that there is a difference between the Hitler regime and the best traditions of German culture. There have been internal party purges in the new Nazi organization, and charges and countercharges of treason and misappropriation of funds. We agree also with the fine editorial in the New York Herald Tribune, which points out how thoroughly ridiculous the whole mumbo-jumbo of uniforms and swastikas must seem to a rational mind.

But this is exactly the rub. The building of terrorist private armies takes its sustenance from every irrational growth in a society, and seeks always to add to the sum of the irrational. We do not foresee any immediate danger in this country. But everything we have learned from the recent history of Europe shows that unless these cancerous growths within a society are excised at the very start they can eventually destroy the organism. Today these American Nazis, in a spirit of brotherly love, are decorating Jewish places of worship with warning swastikas. Tomorrow, as in London's Whitechapel a few months ago, they will be marching in formation through the East Side, seeking to stir up a riot. The day after tomorrow there will be bloody clashes and race hatred.

The thing we are in danger of forgetting is that such a sequence is an integral part of the logic of the Nazi movement through the world. The Hitler regime in Germany maintains a brave front, but a silent process of disintegration is eating away at it internally. Its only chance for pursuing its mad career successfully is to neutralize and paralyze those democratic countries that stand in its path. Hence the Nazi movements in France, England, America, aimed to split each country by labeling every democratic force either radical or Jewish.

We feel that the common man in America has too canny a sense of social reality to be deluded thus. But we cannot afford to take any risks. Congress must not let this session end without taking measures to ban uniformed organizations of any sort aiming to foment social hatred. America is capable of taking care of itself without the unsolicited aid of private armies.

The Last Puritan

PAUL ELMER MORE died on March 9 at the age of seventy-two. For the five years between 1909 and 1914 he was editor of The Nation (then a weekly supplement to the New York Evening Post). It is not certain that he would have accepted any tribute from The Nation of today. But we cannot let the occasion pass without some comment upon one of our predecessors, and one of the most distinguished critics and scholars America has produced.

When More left his peaceful academic career to enter the lists of journalism he might, like others who have made the same transition, have plunged with excitement into the world of social reality. Finding himself increasingly out of sympathy with the age in which he lived, however, he retired deeper and deeper into a private universe, where he pondered the reconciliation of Plato with Jesus. But the "Shelburne Essays," begun in 1904 and continued until they filled eleven volumes, contributed much to the education of a whole generation of critics. Though he became, with Professor Babbitt, the acknowledged leader of the briefly active New Humanist movement, it is probable that his most enduring influence has been exerted through those who rejected his conclusions and had ceased to remember how much they profited from his learned if somewhat chilly analyses of literature. Only Stuart Sherman was a professed disciple, but there was hardly a cultured critic who did not owe him something.

In the days when More was editor, someone said that the function of The Nation was to combat the influence of Rousseau. That remark was only half a pleasantry, for the fundamental premise of his attitude was the belief that human nature was bad rather than good, that self-imposed restraint was the beginning of all virtue, that "God, not Satan, is the spirit which denies." To him the human was the antithesis of the natural, and for that reason liberalism in politics and romanticism in literature seemed parts of the same great evil—respect for the natural impulses. He liked to think of himself as a catholic Christian, but he was really a puritan, as his desire to reconcile Christianity with Plato rather than with Aristotle is itself sufficient evidence. Possibly, indeed, he was the last puritan in that he has left no one who can defend the puritan temperament with anything like his intellectual force.

It is probable that More would have considered no method of analysis more completely inadmissible than that of the "new psychology." But it is difficult not to feel that he used the full resources of both his learning and his intellect to justify and rationalize an attitude which he had inherited from a puritan civilization, that he was busy all his life finding reasons for those self-denials which he had himself always made. Either all indulgence of the natural man was evil, or the modern man was enjoying a fuller life than he had ever permitted himself; and More could not bear to believe that he had surrendered anything he might legitimately have had. Almost every modern writer was an affront because almost every modern writer hinted somewhere at the possibility of some sort of freedom or joy unknown in his austere world. In his later years he wrote book after book to prove—principally to himself perhaps—that God was on his side.

Yet for all that we regret his passing. More was aware that the world listened less eagerly than it once had. His writings, however, will have an element of enduring value as long as our swift processes of national growth need to be tempered by appeal to tradition. He will be remembered more than he was recently read.

Japanese Bearing Gifts

FOREIGN MINISTER SATO'S recent announcement that Japan had no territorial ambitions in China and would hereafter pursue a policy of economic "cooperation" is not to be taken as evidence of the new liberalism which observers have insisted was emerging in Japan. Mr. Sato's subsequent statement disavowing the "crisis" which the militarists have used for the last six years as an excuse for their ever-increasing arms budgets has brought down upon him the wrath of his military colleagues. Their quickness in pouncing on the new Foreign Minister shows that he cannot be taken as representative of the government's policy.

A communication which we have just received from a Far Eastern authority now in Japan shows that the Hayashi Cabinet, in composition, backing, and policy, is more closely associated with the military clique than was any Cabinet which preceded it. For the first time since the establishment of the parliamentary system in Japan, the Cabinet has no representatives from either of the two dominant political parties.

While this Cabinet is closer to the military groups than previous Cabinets have been, it is largely tempered by the economic interests. Now that China's resistance to Japanese aggression has become an accepted fact, there is evidence that even the more reactionary business interests, which have hitherto supported the military in its foreign policy, are urging a more conciliatory attitude. The Cabinet itself contains a notable representative of this group in Toyotara Yuki, the new Minister of Finance. Yuki was formerly connected with the group of moderates led by Takahashi, the old Finance Minister who was assassinated in the February coup of 1936, and is probably more representative of the business interests than was Baba, the Finance Minister in the Hirota government. Yuki has come out publicly on several occasions for dealing with the Chinese question on an economic rather than a military basis. In this he is apparently supported by the upper stratum in the army—including the so-called "Big Three," who prevented Ugaki from assuming office. Though highly nationalistic in their sentiments, the higher officers tend to oppose the more extreme ambitions of the younger officers and have prevented them from dictating to Hayashi.

While the moderation of Japanese policy may be attributed primarily to Chinese resistance, it has also been affected by the government's increasing financial difficulties. The growing military expenditures of recent years have resulted in a definite inflationary movement, although this is not admitted officially. The Bank of Japan's index of wholesale commodity prices stood at the highest point on record in January, except for a brief period after the 1923 earthquake. It had advanced no less than 22 per cent in twelve months, and nearly 10 per cent in thirty days. The cost of living increased 4 per cent in 1936 and then stood 26 per cent above the 1931 level. Meanwhile, wage rates have been stationary or have fallen; wage earnings, owing to longer hours, rose 4 per cent between 1933 and 1936.

Recent Japanese governments not only have borrowed heavily but have greatly increased taxes, particularly on articles of everyday consumption. This has given the parties of the left a stronger argument than they have possessed at any time since the invasion of Manchuria in 1931. The proletarian and reform parties have also sought to arouse the larger parties to the need of a common front in defense of the existing parliamentary institutions. Members of the extreme military cliques have made no secret of their plans to "reform" the parliamentary system. While the left parties seem thoroughly awake to the danger, the brave opposition put up by a few of the members of the regular parties in January seems to have evaporated completely. The reason for this is not wholly clear at this distance, apart from the fact that the moderates lost face enormously when the army blocked the formation of a party Cabinet under Ugaki. It is also probable that these parties consider the present Cabinet with the conservative Yuki as Finance Minister more satisfactory to big-business interests than an outright military government such as they fear would be formed if Hayashi were overthrown.

There is still a possibility, however, that the moderate element will decide to offer resistance before it is too late. Little attention has been given in the press in this country to a meeting held on February 1 at which thirteen Diet members, representing both the Seiyukai and the Minseito, determined to resist Hayashi if he threatened to destroy the party system. If a fight is made, it will not necessarily be a hopeless one. Observers are agreed that while the fascists are more aggressive than at any previous time, their popularity with the masses is waning. The powerful financial interests, particularly the houses of Mitsui and Mitsubishi, are on the whole opposed to both the domestic and the foreign policies of the military clique. The workers are better organized than a few years ago. But if the fight is to be a winning one, the Japanese democrats will have to show that they are made of sterner stuff than their German and pre-civil war Spanish analogues.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

General Johnson and Labor

Washington, March 14

WHILE the idols of the right almost never betray or even surprise their followers, the gods of the other side almost always do. That's because liberals, progressives, and radicals are saps when it comes to picking their heroes. Think of Ramsay MacDonald, Snowden, Eden, Blum, the earlier Mussolini, and all the Social Democratic forerunners of Hitler, or, confining the thought to American bounds, think of Woodrow Wilson, Newton D. Baker, both Roosevelts, primus et secundus, Al Smith, and Borah, the Moo-Cow, who never finished anything he ever started and always joins the enemy before the bugles sound "Cease firing." Think, too, of Rush Holt and all the other blisterheads who have been acclaimed as champions of the underprivileged merely because they had said a few unkind words about the power trust.

I bring the matter up at this time because of signs that General Hugh S. Johnson rapidly is returning to favor among the leftish solely because of his thunderings against the foes of Roosevelt's court program. Even John L. Lewis, who should know better, has been making goo-goo eyes at Johnson. It is easy to show that the schizofrenzied General has feet of clay. It is easy to show he is clay to well above the hips, and I suspect that a complete autopsy would reveal more than a little mud in his hypophysis. Just a few days ago fresh proof was added to the record. The La Follette committee produced proof that Johnson knocked down a $40,000 fee plus $5,564 expense money for serving as labor counsel to the R. C. A. Manufacturing Company during the strike at Camden last summer. He was employed because, according to Johnson's letter to the committee, R. C. A. needed someone "familiar with labor legislation and practices." It also desired, it seems, someone with entry to Lewis's office and possessing influence as well with the NLRB, or at least professing such influence. And how did R. C. A. conduct itself after it had acquired Johnson's valuable services as labor counsel? According to the records of both the NLRB and the La Follette committee, it proceeded to use every union-busting dodge in the book, including some 300 thugs from a strike-breaking agency maintained by Tim Manning, who still is dodging subpoenas from the La Follette committee. A total of $831,000 was spent by R. C. A. in fighting the United Electrical and Radio Workers' Union, a C. I. O. affiliate.

Then came the peace which Johnson takes pride in having engineered. Strikers were to be rehired without discrimination. An NLRB election was to be held and the company was to recognize the Radio Workers' Union as spokesman for all its employees if the union polled a majority of votes. The election was held, but the company union conducted a boycott campaign in which the workers were warned by radio and leaflets that if they voted, another strike and more bloodshed would follow. The Radio Workers' Union won the election by an overwhelming vote, but as a result of the boycott campaign, little more than a third of the R. C. A. workers went to the polls. Johnson thereupon set out for Washington to try to persuade the NLRB that the union had lost the election. He was not content with making such an argument in the open before the board. He tried to work behind the scenes and to that end barraged John P. Carmody, then a board member, with his personal pleadings, with the quite typical result that he later accused the board of double-crossing him and claimed that Carmody had promised to construe the situation in the way Johnson saw it. Carmody, fresh from the Railway Mediation Board, could point to the fact that he had held contrarily in an RMB case and that a federal court had just upheld the RMB's finding that persons eligible to vote who do not exercise their franchise must accept and abide by the choice of those who do vote.

NLRB members recall—although the fact does not appear in the record—that when Johnson stepped up before the board in public hearings last October to argue that the Radio Workers' Union had failed to obtain a majority in the R. C. A. election because only a minority of employees had voted, he bespoke for himself the role of amicus curiae. It was only when Chairman Madden put a blunt question to him that he said he was appearing in behalf of the company. Johnson not only took cognizance of the boycott campaign in his testimony before the NLRB; he defended it at least to the point of arguing that it had no bearing upon how the board should rule. And when the board ruled that the Radio Workers' Union had won the election, Johnson promptly announced he would advise R. C. A. to refuse to comply with the decision, even though it was based on a very clear Supreme Court decision in a similar case.

His advice has been followed. R. C. A. has defied the board and refused to accept the election verdict. Furthermore, some 1,200 to 1,500 of the strikers still are without jobs, according to testimony before the La Follette committee; and a Manning captain and six guards have been added to the permanent R. C. A. establishment to protect the anti-union ground won by the company under the counseling of Johnson, who has invoked the name of John Lewis as a shield against the committee's disclosures. Those disclosures caused Carey, president of the Radio Workers, to remark that it was "worth $45,000 to labor to know where Johnson stands."

The week produced further proof, though in the form of a minor incident, that Lewis towers over his lieutenants and colleagues on the C. I. O. like a giant redwood among crocuses. It occurred when Labor's Non-Partisan League, a C. I. O. offshoot, staged a night meeting to cap a day spent by league delegates in listening to speeches and talking to Congressmen in behalf of Roosevelt's court program. Two hours before the meeting was to convene, cooks and waiters at the Willard Hotel, the meeting place, staged a sitdown strike and threw a picket line around the hospice. Without a moment's hesitation Lewis refused to go through the picket line, rejected suggestions that he address the meeting by radio or telephone, and proposed that the meeting be canceled. He was instinctively right. His reaction showed that a true feeling of labor solidarity stirs within him and that he has lost whatever strike-breaking inheritance he had as a former member of the A. F. of L. Old Guard. His conduct contrasted sharply with that of George L. Berry, Charles P. Howard, and Sidney Hillman. They took the position that the strike was an A. F. of L. frame-up designed to embarrass the league, and refused in hysterical rage to heed advice that, even if the strike were a frame-up, the smart thing to do was to accept and honor it at its face value. The farthest Hillman would go was to send a committee to test the strikers' good faith by urging them to withdraw their pickets until the league meeting had ended. Berry made matters worse with a nauseating speech in which he invoked the sanctity of contracts in support of his insistence on proceeding with the meeting. The contract which Berry held sacred was the league's contract with the hotel, which serves as league headquarters. Members of the league staff knew days in advance that the strike was coming, and so did the local newspapers, which carried items to that effect. It was, I think, a bona fide strike.

The whole performance was one to fill with misgivings those of us who hope that Lewis will not turn out to be the only C. I. O. leader on whom the new labor movement can count.

Forging Man's Fate in Spain

BY ANDRE MALRAUX

[The article that follows is a revision of the speech which M. Malraux delivered at the dinner arranged by THE NATION in honor of him and Louis Fischer.]

SPEAKING before people whose very calling is the defense and maintenance of culture, I want my talk to be limited to the function of trying to make you understand why so many Spanish writers and artists are fighting on the side of the loyal Spanish government, why so many foreign artists are today behind the Madrid barricades, why the only one of the great writers of Spain who joined the Fascists, Unamuno, died at Salamanca discarded by them, hopeless, and alone.

On December 27 one of the planes of my squadron was brought down in the Teruel region—behind our lines. It had fallen very high, at about 2,000 meters above sea level, and snow covered the mountains. In this region there are very few villages; it was only after several hours that the peasants arrived and began constructing stretchers for the wounded and a coffin for the dead.

When all was ready, the descent began. There were no roads, only mule paths. The old peasant women, who in this region almost all have sons in the militia, had decided to accompany the wounded. But it was not only the peasant women. The entire populace followed behind us, coming single file down the narrow mountain path. At each one of the villages through which we passed the people were waiting; and each village, when the wounded had passed by, was emptied of its inhabitants. When we reached the first large settlement in the valley, there too the people stood waiting before the low walls of the Spanish town. They gazed in silence at the first wounded—those wounded in the legs; they were used to such things. But when those who had been wounded in the face were carried past—men with flat bandages where their noses should have been, their leather tunics still covered with coagulated blood—then the women and children began to cry. I raised my eyes; the file of peasants extended now from the heights of the mountain to its base—and it was the grandest image of fraternity I have ever encountered: those abandoned villages, that entire people following men wounded for their sake, men whom they had never seen before, descending like a procession out of ancient times, while their sobs, mounting in the great silence of the gorge, made a sound like the roar of an underground river.

The Fascist aviators who were wounded the same day were given military escort. And I could not help thinking that these men of ours, lying on stretchers made by the hands of peasants, had been willing to risk their lives in the specific hope that no military escort but the strong fraternity of the people themselves would henceforth accompany those who fight for their ideas.

On the way back, as we passed near the lines where the Moorish machine-gunners, in the depths of the night, were playing an accompaniment to the sound of our ambulance, I reflected that something was happening here that was of far greater significance than our wounded men, something without precedent since the first war of the French Revolution: the world civil war had begun.

What is the positive element in the various forms of fascism? I think it is the exaltation of differences that are essential, irreducible, and constant, such as race or nation. In National Socialism there are two words, national and socialism, but we happen to know that the best way to achieve socialism is not to shoot the Socialists, and that the significant word here is "national." The fascist ideologies, by their very nature, are static and particular. As for democracy and communism, they disagree in respect to the dictatorship of the proletariat, but not in respect to their values, since the dictatorship of the proletariat is, in Marxist eyes, the concrete means for obtaining real democracy—all political democracy being a delusion so long as it does not rest on economic democracy. But what unites us all is that by the general movement now carrying works of art and learning toward a greater and greater number of men, we aim to preserve or to recreate, not static and particular values, but humanist values—humanist because they are universal and because, myth for myth, we do not want the German or the Nordic, the Italian or the Roman, but simply man.

In Madrid on the first day of January toys which had been sent from every country in the world were distributed to the children. The distribution took place at the center of the great bull ring; the toys were heaped up in little piles, each like a tangled mass of insects. For an hour the children passed in silence among these little piles of toys; and it seemed as if the generosity of all the world was also accumulated there. Then came the sound of the first bomb. A squadron of Junkers was bombarding the city. The bombs fell six hundred meters away; the attack was very short, and the bull ring is very large. By the time the children reached the gates, the Junkers had departed, and the children turned back to get the last toys.

When all was over, there remained in the immense empty space one little heap, untouched. I approached to examine it; it was a pile of toy airplanes. It lay there in the deserted bull ring, where any child could have helped himself. The little boys had preferred anything, even dolls, and had kept away from that pile of toy airplanes, not with fear, but with a sort of mysterious horror.

That scene has stayed in my memory. We and the Fascists are forever separated by that little heap of abandoned playthings.

I well know that war is violence. I know too that a government bomb might by accident miss its military objective, and fall into a city and wound civilians. What I wish to draw your attention to in the most emphatic way is this: We destroyed the airdrome of Seville but we did not bombard Seville. We destroyed the airdrome of Salamanca, but we did not bombard Salamanca. I destroyed the airdrome of Avila at Olmedo, but I did not bombard Avila. For many months now the Fascists have been bombarding the streets of Madrid.

I have always been struck by the absolute inability of the fascist arts to portray anything but the struggle of man against man. Where in fascist countries is the equivalent of the Soviet films or of the novels dealing with the creation of a new world? A communist civilization, which turns over the instruments of production to the collectivity, can pass from civil life to military life, but a fascist civilization, which maintains the structure of capitalism, cannot do so. Between the collective farmer and a soldier of the Red Army there is no essential difference; both for the artist and for themselves they belong to the same living order. Each of them can pass from one function to the other. But between a German storm trooper and a German peasant there is a difference in nature. The peasant lives on the inside of capitalism; the soldier on the outside. A communion that is real, disinterested, and authentically fascist exists only in the military order. And the result is that fascist civilization, at its extreme point, leads to the total militarizing of the nation—just as fascist art, when it comes to exist, will lead to the aestheticizing of war.

Now, the enemy of a soldier is another soldier, is part of mankind—another man; whereas for the democrats and the Communists the adversary of mankind is not other men but nature. In the struggle against nature, in the exaltation arising from the conquest of things by men, lies one of the strongest traditions of the Occident, extending from "Robinson Crusoe" to the Soviet films. Determined to fight, since fighting is the only safeguard of the meaning we want to give our lives, we nevertheless refuse to make fighting a fundamental value. We desire a philosophy, a political structure, and a hope that lead toward peace and not toward war. In the most serene peace there are still enough combats, tragedies, and exaltations for centuries of art.

I was sitting in a cafe in Valencia with one of our comrades who had been blinded in the first month of this war. From month to month he had hoped to recover his sight, and each time his hopes had been in vain. Suddenly he said to me, "How is it that I see turning lights?" And a moment later, "They are stopping." There was so much conviction in his voice that I turned around. Behind me, in the street, the horses of a merry-go-round were revolving with their lights. The blind man had in truth begun to see once more.

I think that each of us is a little like my comrade who, from the depths of his darkness, saw lights returning. There is much suffering in the world, but there is one kind of suffering which it is a privilege to endure, the suffering of those who suffer because they want to make a world worthy of man—the suffering of those who know that defending the realm of the mind means imparting culture to an ever-growing number—of those who know that the realm of the mind is not for the privileged, that possessing culture is not a question of privilege, and who know that the life of culture throughout the centuries, if it depends first on those who create it, depends less on those who inherit it than on those who desire it.

It is for the men who are defending this concept, consciously or unconsciously, that I have come to ask your help. I ask it in the name of the dignity which culture has conferred upon you. Let each man choose his own way of alleviating this suffering; relieve it he must. That is our responsibility to man's destiny—and perhaps to our own hearts.

Hitler Mobilizes "Mother Goose"

BY RALPH THURSTON

A UNIQUE contribution to children's literature recently left the press of the Third Reich. It is the world's first anti-Semitic A B C, or Aryan "Mother Goose"—a picture book containing Hitler homilies in kindergarten rhyme.

Twenty-one brightly colored picture pages show brute-faced Jews cheating, seducing, poisoning, and betraying handsome Nordics. Each facing page carries a simple text in baby-talk verse. These are written with model simplicity so that children may understand them, and printed in letters a half-inch high. The Jew-baiter, Julius Streicher publishes this Nazi kiddies' book. Subtitled "A Picture-Book for Great and Small," and released just in time for the Christmas market, it quickly attained a tremendous sale; the first edition of 50,000 was sold in a month.

The book has the format of standard American editions of "Mother Goose," with semi-cardboard pages to withstand the repeated thumbing of eager child readers. Its price has been specially set at 1.80 marks (about fifty cents) in order to insure mass circulation.

The red, blue, and yellow cover bears two pictures: one of a cornered fox, his teeth bared in a savage snarl; and one of a Jew with bestial, huge-beaked face, his right hand raised to take an oath. Below them, printed in a child's large, clear kindergarten script, is the book's title: "Trust Not the Fox by Field or Pond, Nor Any Jew Upon His Bond!" The main nursery rhymes inside the volume are entitled The Wandering Jew, Jewish Names, Once a Jew Always a Jew, The Sabbath, The Jewish Butcher, The Jewish Lawyer, The Jewish Doctor, The Jewish Shop, The Jew's Serving-Maid, The Father of the Jews Is the Devil.

The idea is simply, graphically conveyed that the Jew is a new sort of monster, combining all the classic qualities of the old witch, the boggy man, the big bad wolf, and the wicked ogre. In every illustration the Jew is pictured with parrot-beaked nose, puffy pig eyes, unshaven jowls, and thick lascivious lips. His face, never clean, is consistently screwed up into a savage snarl or an even more ominous leer. The "German," on the other hand, assumes the role of dragon-killer and fairy prince of the older brand of German fairy tale. The book's Germans are all golden blondes, and their heroically determined faces have blazing blue eyes and lean square chins.

Perhaps the most striking lesson in the Aryan A B C is the unique seduction scene for children. The gaily colored illustration here shows a fat-faced, fat-bodied Jewish villain accosting on the street a blonde German girl of humble clothes but noble profile. One of his hands, heavy both with puffy flesh and gleaming rings, is descending on her shoulder. The other dangles a string of pearls before her averted—and clear blue—eyes. Two little Nordic children passing by stare in wonder and horror, but a little Jewish boy on the other side of the street smirks lewdly. Nordic Mother Goose admonishes her little readers in the accompanying jingle:

The Jew, he thinks he's pretty sly
If he a German girl can buy.
But see this picture of the Jew:
For her the Yid will never do!
For German girls, O mercy me!
How miserable a sort is he!

Other pictures and rhymes teach that the Jew is a nasty fellow in just about everything he does—from not washing his hands at all to washing them literally in the blood of trusting Nordics. At the Jewish butcher shop—brightly pictured as a fearful shambles of dirt, cigar-smoke, ancient blood stains, and prowling animals—

One steak is lying on the floor,
The next a cat is pawing o'er.
The butcher-Jew finds that okay
—The dirtier, the more they'll weigh.
Such filthy things. Phew! Pee-oo!
A Jew, and Jew alone, can do!

The heavy plodding of "Mother Goose," weighed down beneath her new brown Nazi uniform, is perhaps best exemplified in the pictorial lesson Once a Jew, Always a Jew. Here Isidor has got himself baptized "a good Catholic" and solemnly promises to eat only fish on Friday. Mother Goose depicts the astonishment of Isidor's good priest who visits his new convert on that day, only to find him greedily devouring a fine fat goose. "Oy," says Ikey, "you dunt understand, Vater. Bevore I begun to eat, I carefully baptized this goose 'fish.'"

The Führer's fairy tales take a leaf from another branch of classic children's literature—How the Camel Got His Hump, etc.—in its "simplified history" section. Here the origin, physique, and character of the Jewish race are explained as follows: "The Jews always refused to work like all other decent peoples created by God. The Pharaoh of Egypt, angered at this, made them carry the stone for his pyramids as punishment. The Jews have therefore been round-shouldered and flat-footed, with staring eyes and sour expressions, ever since. But the father of the Jews is Satan. And he saved them from captivity, carrying them to Germany on his back." Here a striking picture shows the devil gamboling over sea and desert with tiny Jews clinging to his back and tail.

What may well prove the most immediately "educational" part of this curious children's book, however, are the antics of little German boys and girls who also appear in its illustrations. They point the finger of scorn at each

Jewish culprit and dance up and down with joy at his discomfiture. In the "Picture-Book's" lively representation of "school life today in Germany" all the Nordic children are shown gathered at the gate to call names, stick out tongues, and thumb noses at little Jewish children going down the street to their own Jewish school. "Away with the Jewish brood," reads the text.

Another highly practical page of the picture primer shows a little German girl, blonde as a buttercup, shopping with her mother. She is staring wide-eyed into a toy-shop window. "No," says Mamma, "that is a Jewish store. We must buy only in German stores, where we will not be cheated."

An equally deep impression may be expected from the stirring picture devoted to the Jewish Beau. A flashing-eyed father, in the best East Lynne tradition, stamps in cold rage upon the parlor floor. One hand is raised as if to strike his daughter; the other points to the door. His blonde beard wags and his baby-blue eyes almost pop from his head as he bellows in righteous fury: "You've been seen with that Jew Solly Rosenbloom . . . and only on account of his money . . . you have destroyed the good name of our family!"

But on the last page the child reader can see himself in the "Picture-Book" once more. He sits at a roadside, grinning broadly, merrily engaged in playing a march tune on an accordion. The road has a big signpost reading, "One-Way Street to Palestine." And down it are marching all the Jewish characters he has come to know so well in the book's other twenty pages: the dirty butcher, the skinflint lawyer, the murderous doctor, the pearls-proffering debaucher of German womanhood, and so on. Another tow-headed child at his side laughs heartily as the "modern Exodus" shuffles past.

The author of the novel nursery rhymes is not Streicher but a young Third Reich school teacher named Elvira Bauer. Friendly Third Reich critics point out that "her activity as kindergarten instructress has given her a rare insight into the souls of children."

Together with Streicher's notorious Stürmer, the new kiddies' book may prove the most powerful item of anti-Nazi propaganda now being published in Germany.

The Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota

BY CHARLES R. WALKER

II. Governor Olson's Last Interview

THE best defense of the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota from the point of view of the real interest of the workers and farmers emerges, I believe, from a study of the indictments of its enemies. The main counts registered against the party in Minnesota by political opponents are (1) corruption and graft, (2) extravagant use of public funds, (3) that it stands for the overthrow of the American form of government, (4) that it turns class against class by fostering radical labor unions and farmer organizations.

On point one, with all the will in the world the perennial investigating commissions of Republicans have been able to produce very little evidence of actual malfeasance in public office. That there is graft in the party machine is unquestioned. But in comparison with the record of other parties the history of the Farmer-Laborites is a model of public virtue.

The heaviest opposition artillery has been trained against Farmer-Labor extravagance. For a five-million-dollar relief bill and other increased relief appropriations, as well as the prevention of salary cuts, the Farmer-Laborites cheerfully accept responsibility. And on the whole, although plenty of inefficiency and bureaucracy can be, and has been, uncovered by political opponents, the fact that the state budget has been lower under the Farmer-Labor administration than under preceding Republican ones is a convincing, if not final, refutation of the "main charge."

The accusation of conspiring to overthrow the American form of government is in an entirely different category. If we dismiss for the moment such campaign charges as that the Farmer-Labor Commissioner of Education has "Sovietism" taught in the public schools, which no one in Minnesota takes seriously, how much is there in the charge that the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota is an imminent threat to our present form of government? Unfortunately for the earnest believers in a "cooperative commonwealth," not much. Gullible reactionaries find "no difference" between Olson and Stalin, but practical business men have been able to get along with the "Soviet" state of Minnesota.

As to the fourth charge of fostering trade unions and farmer organizations, the Farmer-Labor Party, as we have seen, chalks this up as its major achievement. If "class hatred" is engendered as a result, the Farmer-Laborites simply blame the reactionaries.

What is the cooperative commonwealth toward which the Farmer-Labor Party strives as an "ultimate objective"? It isn't communism as the Marxist defines it. It is what Lindbergh, Sr., and many other Northwest agrarians would have considered a reasonable American economic Utopia—achievable through democratic parliamentary process and not by "red revolution." It envisions government ownership and operation of the basic and monopolist industries—steel, oil, textiles, grain elevators, mills, railroads—and of the big banks. The small business man is guaranteed his property and the right to a "reasonable" profit. The farmer enjoys the right to private property and land and receives a reasonable return for his labor, as does labor everywhere. Cooperative enterprises are expanded. An economy of plenty replaces an economy of scarcity, and "production for use" replaces production for profit. Roughly, half the voters for the Farmer-Labor ticket believe in the practicability of the cooperative commonwealth. Another half do not lift their eyes from practical politics and the "immediate reforms"—pensions, unemployment insurance, repeal of a sales tax, and so on—which they hope these politics will bring about. Many thousands vote Farmer-Labor with no decisive convictions on the cooperative commonwealth, but in the belief that Farmer-Laborites "are on the side of the common people." A minority, including members of the Communist Party, looks on the Farmer-Labor Party as a present defense against fascism and as a transitional stage to bona fide communism.

Before attempting a balance sheet of the party's achievements, I wish to give place to the testimony of the man who more than anyone else built the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota as a force in practical politics, and who, if he had lived, would unquestionably have played a leading role in the development of any national party—the late Governor Olson. A few weeks before he died, while he was confined to his bed in the Mayo clinic, I discussed with Governor Olson the nature of the party, its practical operation, and its ultimate goal. With the amazing moral and physical courage which was characteristic of him, he spoke of his own illness and his determination to lick death, as well as his political opponents, if he could. "So you heard my speech at the Farmer-Labor convention," he said. "A lot of people thought I had bellowed my last bellow and had me already in the dust. I spoke for an hour and a half," he concluded grinning, "just to show these birds I could do it." He then turned to the social and economic divisions in Minnesota in the midst of which the Farmer-Labor Party was called upon to play its role.

"We have everything here. Labor is well organized; the farmers are pretty well organized, not as well as they should be; the employers are very well organized. You see, on the employers' side, in spite of the fact that flour is moving to Buffalo, the mill interests are still pretty potent. The financial interests and control are still here in Minnesota, as much as in the days of the founders of the milling dynasty. Although lumber is almost gone, the same is true of the lumber interests. Then there's U. S. Steel with mines in Mesaba."

I asked him specifically about the practical working of the party, and he launched into an attack against "the ritualists and leftists," among whom he included certain Communists and Socialists—not all—as well as some fanatical Laborites in the East who, he said, wanted to elect a Farmer-Labor President this year. "Before they even have one Labor alderman in New York!" He talked long against the premature launching of a Farmer-Labor campaign for the Presidency. "We don't want a third party like the La Follette business in '24; after the election nothing left. I say, go ahead on state tickets but no Presidential campaign."

Speaking of Labor's Non-Partisan Committee headed by John L. Lewis, "It's a very sound idea—utilize the people who can help you on your program and principles. Now take Minnesota, you see they refuse to do that here, or rather we haven't done it enough. That's been one of our troubles. Instead, in every damn district they'd put up a Farmer-Labor candidate no matter what the political conditions, so that even if his opponent was a liberal and would have gone along with us on a lot of things in the legislature, he was driven over into the camp of reaction. Do you see what I'm getting at? With a Farmer-Labor candidate against him, a radical, he'd feel obliged to take up a regular Liberty League position against us. Result: our man loses, the liberal is elected, and he votes conservative in the legislature. That's why we've only had control of one house once."

This was a reference to the famous "bloc with the liberals" denounced perennially in Minnesota by "pure" Farmer-Laborites. Olson, far from deprecating it, argued that the maneuver was shamelessly neglected to the party's detriment. In this connection he mentioned that he was to speak at a dinner of a faction of the Democratic Party and that there would probably be political fruits for the coming election. This prognosis was justified later by the withdrawal of the Democratic state ticket in return for Farmer-Labor support of Roosevelt.

In connection with the basic philosophy of the Farmer-Labor Party, the Governor discussed his "production for use" theory both as a goal and as a means of getting there. "I was in New York at the time of the debate between Norman Thomas and Upton Sinclair on the subject 'Resolved, that a production-for-use economy is impossible under capitalism.' I bawled Thomas out for that. First place, it wasn't fair for Thomas to debate with Sinclair on anything. It was like Joe Louis fighting a featherweight. Second, Thomas was wrong and Sinclair was right. I said the wording of the debate should have been reversed: 'Resolved, that capitalism could no longer exist if it had a production-for-use economy.' It would be like a cancer in the stomach of capitalism. Practically it would work like this: There are fifteen million unemployed in this country. Production-for-use factories, like those we started here in a small way under the FERA, would absorb these workers, and the sale of their products would gradually put out of business firms owned by private capital. In turn the workers released by the private firms would be absorbed by new production-for-use units . . . until the major part of industry came to be government-owned, producing for use and not profit. I tell you, capitalism could not stand a production-for-use economy. It would be killed off, and we'd get what we want. The trouble with these leftists and ritualists—they want to ride on a white horse with a pennant flying hell bent for the barricades. My method is a different one. 'Boring from within,' which I learned from the old Wobblies."

Summing up the principal concrete achievements of the party in Minnesota, he said, "We haven't accomplished much in legislation. Something, of course—relief appropriations, mortgage moratoriums, and the like.

More important, the party has been an educational force in inculcating certain principles—collective bargaining, for example; a lot of farmers as well as employers have to be educated on that. Then the principle of the government, as against private charity, caring for the unemployed and appropriating public money for relief. There are other principles the party has popularized—I am naming only a few. One of the most important is that the National Guard must not be used to smash strikes.

The primary business of a Farmer-Labor Party is to win elections; this explains both its nature and its limitations in theory and practice. In this the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota, or any Farmer-Labor Party which may be created on a national scale in the United States, does not differ basically from the labor or reformist parties of Europe. Accordingly, it can hardly be expected to establish either communism or the cooperative commonwealth, both of which presuppose a basic changing of the "rules of the game." Significantly, however, it has a dual nature, and its base in the rank-and-file movements of farmers and workers not only encourages and strengthens these organizations but makes the party subject to their pressure.

It is natural that the prospective architects of an American labor party should stress its future power and possible conquests. Under certain circumstances, as we have seen, such a party can be a powerful political arm of the American labor movement. But it is important that its limitations be weighed as seriously as its assets, and that there be no confusion about its class nature.

[This is the conclusion of Mr. Walker's article on the Farmer-Labor Party. Part I was printed last week.]

Manuel Quezon—Philippine Dictator

BY JAMES S. ALLEN

Manila, P. I.

IT IS said here by those who dare that when Americans pass Corregidor, the jutting mountain which guards the entrance to Manila Bay, they leave their democracy behind them. Yet the idea is widespread in America that the United States, in extending independence to its most valuable possession and thus creating the "youngest republic in the world," was actuated by the most magnanimous and benevolent motives. The Americans, let it be remembered, are the real architects of the Philippine Commonwealth; the ruling Filipinos are merely the engineers on the spot.

Leaving aside for the moment the dubious independence granted in the Tydings-McDuffie Act, and considering only the actual results thus far achieved in the Philippines, one asks whether it is not a new military dictatorship instead of a democratic republic which is emerging in the Pacific.

Among the people democracy is still an ideal to be fought for, but at Malacañan, the former palace of Spanish and American Governors-General, now the residence of the President, it is only an ornament on the structure of government. President Manuel L. Quezon has been steadily concentrating more and more power in his own hands. A very adroitly drawn constitution started him well on his course by placing the purse-strings of the nation in his hands, to the surprise of assemblymen who attempted some revisions of his budget during the last session. The President can also claim constitutional authority to appoint not only members of the Supreme Court but all judges of the inferior courts. In the absence of a jury system, Quezon has been able to establish a judicial oligarchy directly under his control. He has taken to himself tremendous powers of appointment and dismissal reaching to the lowest officials of the government apparatus, even to elected officials.

With every usurpation of power by the President there has come a further abrogation of the rights of the unicameral National Assembly and of the people. Every bill that gets through to the National Assembly via three committees on reading is either originated or first approved by the President. An assemblyman who indulges in any direct criticism is likely to find himself next morning on the carpet before the Big Boss in the palace. If some small opposition group threatens to obstruct the official steam roller, Quezon steps out of his role as President into that of coalition leader and personally cracks the whip over an Assembly which has, for the nonce, been turned into a party caucus.

Only one political party is tolerated. This is the coalition of the two wings of the old Nationalista, which split in 1933 on the question of accepting the Hawes-Cutting "independence" bill. Other parliamentary parties and groups were absorbed in the coalition, which is dominated by Quezon. There are good grounds for believing that a one-party system under a "strong man" was one of the guaranties demanded by Washington in return for a greater measure of self-government in the Islands.

The legislative record of the National Assembly, therefore, is merely the record of Malacañan. Most of the important bills passed by the Assembly benefit entrenched capital. The mining, lumber, and power interests are fully protected in their privilege of pilfering the natural resources of the country. A much-heralded "socialist" tax measure increased corporation taxes from 3 to 6 per cent, in the face of an astounding rate of profit; it led Lord Rothermere, in the course of a recent visit, to refer to the Islands as the only remaining haven of business men. The tax proved a boon to American interests, the largest here, which are relieved of paying taxes to the United States at the corporate rate of 13½ per cent. The so-called nationalization measures, presumably intended to protect Filipino business against foreign competition, in reality provide further protection of American interests against Japanese competition.

On the other hand, Malacañan has displayed extreme indifference to the needs of the people. After considerable agitation and a huge demonstration in Manila staged by the leaders of the higher-wages movement, a minimum wage of $15 monthly was conceded to government employees, but the minimum wage for workers in private industry was sidetracked. No steps were taken for the relief of the unemployed, who number, according to official estimates, 1,300,000 in a total population of about 14,000,000. The existing pension system for government employees, including teachers, was replaced by a new insurance plan which wipes out the benefits that had accrued over many years, decreases the number of eligibles, and reduces pensions. Quezon's promise to purchase the vast estates of the friars and resell them on easy terms to the tenants has gone by the board entirely. A bill was passed some time ago authorizing the purchase of the sites upon which the tenants' homes are built, to prevent evictions and the burning of houses by the friar administrators; but it has remained a dead letter.

The only direct relief measure passed was an appropriation of $750,000 to aid the victims of the typhoons and floods which had spread destruction and destitution through a number of provinces, but most of this fund was spent in repairing inadequate dikes. To offset this unusual liberality, about $650,000 was set aside for such essential social services as maintaining the Belo boys, Quezon's staff of hangers-on at Malacañan, improving the palaces of Don Manuel, and buying and keeping up a presidential yacht. About $8,000,000 was set aside for military purposes, but a bill providing for universal public education, made mandatory by the constitution, was killed because the government could not find the funds.

The most important labor measure, hailed as nothing less than a "New Deal for the forgotten man," establishes a system of compulsory labor arbitration for disputes between tenants and landlords as well as for those between labor and capital. An attempt is made to mix some sweet with the bitter by empowering the arbitration court to establish minimum wages in certain industries after due study, but as a whole the bill is intended to make strikes illegal and to hamstring labor.

Other oppressive legislation includes a new sedition bill along the lines of the law enforced during the early stages of American occupation; the nationalization of the police under the central government, which deprives the municipalities of any supervision over the local forces; the formation of a G-man department with political functions; new radio and press-gag laws.

As the recent regular session of the Assembly was drawing to a close, Quezon attempted to force through a bill postponing indefinitely the municipal and provincial elections scheduled for June, 1937, and granting him the power to appoint new officials. The reasons advanced were the need for economy and the desire to avoid increased radical agitation. The assemblymen recognized the threat to their own existence and resisted strenuously, but Quezon thrust the measure down their throats. In the compromise finally reached, the elections were postponed for one year and Quezon was granted the right to appoint officials in the interim. To put the assemblymen in a more receptive mood for this change their terms had been previously extended another year.

While he has been tearing down the structure of democratic government, Quezon has also been erecting the framework of dictatorial power. The Strong Man intends to rest heavily upon the new national army. The National Defense bill, drawn up by American military authorities, was the first measure shoved through the inaugural session of the Assembly. It is as clever a piece of diplomatic imperialism as has ever been forced upon a colony. It provides for military training from the age of ten and for the establishment of a conscript army, owing allegiance to the President of the United States, which with the trained reserves will number at least a half-million men by 1946. Under the direction of former United States Chief of Staff Douglas MacArthur, the new army is being cast in the mold of the United States Army from every principle of its organization and training down to the last details of routine and even of uniform. The American people would never have agreed to the establishment of a colonial army, but Washington is forming one in the most likely theater of war and has placed the whole burden of it upon the Filipinos.

From the standpoint of Washington, the new army is also to serve an important internal function: it looks so much better to have Filipinos shot down by Filipinos than by American troops. Quezon needs military support to maintain his grip and he is being supplied with an adequate instrument to be used against the people. Here, too, the President has been granted unusual powers. As chairman of the Council of National Defense, he appoints its members and directs its work. The President is empowered to decree partial mobilization even before calling a session of the Assembly to approve the act, and then it may be too late. Quezon is forming the closest personal connections with the army command, and fascist ideas are prevalent in top military circles, as, for example, the proposal of Chief of Staff Santos, enthusiastically indorsed (or initiated?) by Field Marshal MacArthur, for the creation of compulsory labor camps in connection with the army.

Quezon has already used the army to assure the election of his own candidates to fill vacant seats in the Assembly. Fully a month after the special elections martial law still existed in a province where Malacañan's candidate was "elected" by the military. Quezon was decisively defeated in this very province in the Presidential elections of 1935. In the principal town, the center of present troubles, Quezon received 107 votes as against 2,066 votes for Bishop Gregorio Aglipay of the Philippine Independent Church, the candidate of the Coalition of the Oppressed Masses.

A few years ago, when Quezon was hard-pressed by his political opponents, he sought and received the support of the Catholic church by renouncing freemasonry and returning to the faith of his fathers. On that occasion he received from Archbishop Michael J. O'Doherty of Manila the blessings of the church for his political undertakings, a bullet-proof car, and other gifts. To understand the full significance of the alliance between Quezon and the church it is necessary to remember that the revolution was directed mainly against the hierarchy of the Spanish friars. Yet the Islands remain a priest-ridden country in which the Catholic church and the monastic orders are the bulwark of landed property and reaction. The exploitation of the peasants on the friar haciendas is reminiscent of José Rizal's descriptions of the Spanish oppression. The church also owns extensive city properties, controls three banks, and has heavy investments in commercial and industrial undertakings.

The clerics are the chief ideologists of reaction. Since the administration of Governor-General Murphy, a Catholic, the church's encroachments upon civil liberties have become menacing. The Catholic Action is concentrating its activities among the student youth, and its publications read like the manifestos of Goebbels or Franco. The church incites and leads every attack upon liberals and radicals and acts as an extra-legal censor in the schools, over the press, and over the activities of labor leaders. Professors at the state university are terrorized by its strictures, and rarely does criticism of the church find its way into print. Although the constitution is supposed to guarantee freedom of conscience and separation of church and state, a loophole in the law permits religious instruction in the public schools.

Quezon can count upon the full support of the American monopoly interests in the Islands and on an important section of the Filipino bourgeoisie. Don Manuel is reputed to be one of the wealthiest men in the Philippines, and in his closest entourage are to be found the financial and landed aristocracy of the country. The President has even gone to the extent of granting capital a direct function in government by establishing the National Economic Council for the announced purpose of planning and undertaking the development of those industries which are deemed necessary for national defense. Like the National Defense Council it is responsible only to Quezon. Thus far it has shown no signs of industrial planning, but has acted as a super-cabinet. As an organization of big capitalists created to participate in government the council is a potential fascist instrument. It contains, besides a few government officials, one of the leading American mining magnates and representatives of the wealthiest section of the Filipino bourgeoisie, which depends upon the American free market and is interested in maintaining the closest economic and political ties with the United States. For this the sugar interests are ready to sacrifice the development of an independent native industry.

Meanwhile President Quezon, in the fashion of demagogues, makes stirring pleas for the "welfare of the masses." In a recent Assembly caucus he even described himself as one of the foremost authorities on socialism in the Philippines and referred to his pension-cutting plan as "the beginning of a program of socialism." In reality, the Administration is virtually in a continuous state of war against the people. The former constabulary, American trained and now incorporated into the new army, is used as a police force throughout the Islands and is thoroughly hated by the masses. One of the first jobs which Quezon undertook as President was his drive against "bandits," who were really peasant guerrilla fighters seeking to right individual injustices. Among them were a number of labor leaders forced to seek refuge in the mountains to escape government persecution. Over a thousand constabulary soldiers were concentrated for months in the territory where two small bands were hiding but were unable to capture them until the peasant population was driven out.

The "leading authority on socialism" has a venomous hatred of Socialists, and red hunts are frequent and brutal. During a press conference at Malacañan, Quezon announced that he would grant amnesty to the Communists, Tanguilans, Sakdals, and others with "similar unintelligible names" only in order to "hit them harder" if they should continue their activities. "I am against communism," he said, "and I will throw anyone in jail who advocates communism." When a newspaperman inquired whether a professor in the university (state owned) could explain the meaning of communism to his classes without being thrown into jail, the President explained thoughtfully that in his opinion it would be permitted if the professor treated the subject academically. "After all," he declared with a liberal gesture of dismissal, "it would be going too far to prohibit academic treatment of the subject, for then there would be no freedom of speech here." Advocating communism in any form is a crime under the sedition law. And the Quezonists tend to interpret as communism any criticism of the Administration.

The Communist Party is illegal and nineteen of its leaders are in exile in the mountain provinces. The Socialist Party is threatened with suppression; its organ, Socialism Today, has been barred from the mails. The Sakdalista and other opposition groups are permitted to enjoy a semi-legal existence. The press is pretty thoroughly under the control of Quezon or his supporters, and the radio stations suffer a strict censorship. The anti-clerical, strongly nationalistic Independent Church of Aglipay, which counts several million supporters, is at best tolerated by the administration; its priests have been occasionally persecuted by local authorities. Quezon privately has expressed strong sympathy for the fascist rebels of Spain.

Quezon is too shrewd a politician to neglect the "build-up" angles of Strong Man dictatorship. For instance, it is often stated by Filipinos and Americans that the whole set-up of the commonwealth was worked out with Quezon in mind and that he in turn cooperates perfectly. On the other hand it is felt here by prominent oppositionists that should the United States withdraw its support from Quezon at the present time, the Strong Man could retain power for only a brief period.

[In later issues Mr. Allen will discuss other aspects of the Philippine problem.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Santo Domingo, 1937

Trujillo City, February 12

THE story of Santo Domingo is soon told. Generalissimo Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina is its dictator. In some respects he resembles Hitler. He is more successful, economically speaking, and he naturally has not aroused the antagonism of the whole world; once he fell foul of Mussolini because he locked up the Italian consul. Otherwise his international relations have been peaceful. Like Hitler he has done away with his political enemies and made his political party the only party. Many of those who opposed him are dead by his will or in exile. Others may be in prison, but the dictator has recently announced that all political prisoners have been released; to believe that, one would have to find out his exact definition of what constitutes a political prisoner. Some of those who opposed Trujillo have recanted or have honestly been won over by his achievements. Nobody knows exactly what is going on behind the scenes, or who is in jail, for the press is as completely censored as that of Russia or Germany. To ascertain whether the dictator is today beloved by the people is impossible. He has had ups and downs in popular favor. Watching him at the Mardi Gras carnival, where he sat on a sort of reviewing stand, I was struck by the fact that the crowds paid practically no attention to him. But I was told that he is such a familiar sight that their indifference was not surprising; it was also explained that he did not wish to detract from the honors paid to the Carnival Queen.

But modesty is not Trujillo's long suit. In the city now called Trujillo there is a small replica of the Washington Monument. It is on a beautiful waterfront boulevard which the dictator built and named after George Washington, but it is in honor of Trujillo and nobody else. He pretends that Congress spontaneously changed the name of this historic city after he had declined the honor, but as nothing happens here without his consent he could hardly have remonstrated very vigorously. Press and public fawn upon him disgustingly, for nobody cares to be in his black books. A volume in English by Lawrence de Besault, circulated free by the government, contains a description of the President and his wonderful achievements which is the most nauseating, bootlicking performance I have ever read. That his chest is covered with decorations is hardly surprising to one who has read this gem in Mr. de Besault's book: "Through the initiative of President Trujillo there was created, to honor outstanding services to the republic or humanity, the Juan Pablo Duarte order of merit, of which, by virtue of the law establishing it, President Trujillo was named supreme head, and was given the Great Cross which decorates his breast." There are many big yellow signs in English and Spanish telling the reader that this is Trujillo City, renamed by a grateful nation in gratitude for the works of the dictator.

Vain or otherwise, there is no denying that Trujillo is a remarkable man. Of medium height and brown complexion, he has a fine figure and is very attractive when he laughs. He looks efficient and able and must be so, for he has accomplished remarkable things with relatively small means; foreigners who know the situation declare that he has done more for Santo Domingo than all of his predecessors for fifty years back. Trained as an officer by the United States marines, he speaks of that corps as his "Alma Mater," and any of its officers who turn up here are sure of a hearty reception. In eleven years he rose to be the head of the army, which he made into a very efficient body. Today the Dominican forces consist of a well-disciplined unit of 3,061 men—in American uniforms—a blue-uniformed police force of 700, and some 400 men in what is called the navy. As long as Trujillo holds that army in the hollow of his hand, there will be no uprising and no open opposition of any kind. In fact, there seems no reason why he should not rule as long as he lives—he is only forty-five years old. Never before has there been anyone in the Presidency here with so much determination, so much ability to visualize and carry out plans for modernizing the state. His regime is a material success; it has for the present given hope and encouragement to a people who felt that they were condemned for all time to be ruthlessly exploited by their rulers. One feels that his own spirit of virility and vitality has penetrated the whole nation.

Less than three weeks after Trujillo took office the terrible cyclone of September 3, 1930, destroyed the city of Santo Domingo. It was a wonderful opportunity for him. With the aid of the American Red Cross, he personally took over the work of reconstruction and rebuilt from the wreckage of the old a new and handsome city, clean and well policed. Enough ruins from the Columbus days still remain to make the place extremely interesting as the scene of the beginning of European culture in the Americas. The new streets steadily being opened are well planned and well paved. There are modern buses and good water, and Trujillo is spending $2,500,000 in improving the docks and dredging the channel into the Ozama River so that the largest steamers may land their freight and passengers at the very edge of the business district. Trujillo beat Hitler to a four-year public-works plan by starting his on January 1, 1934, and what is more, he is paying for all his improvements as he goes; he has yet to add to the country's funded public debt, which stands at $16,292,000 and need not be paid off until 1970. His government claims that it has balanced the budget every year during the depression—the truth of this depends, of course, on the bookkeeping methods used. He still has a floating debt, inherited from his predecessor, which is now stated to be less than $2,000,000. When I asked Trujillo why it was not being paid off faster, he said that he preferred to create important public works, and he added with a smile that only two countries in the world were now paying all their debts—Finland and Santo Domingo. All payments on the funded debt are scrupulously met, and the American receiver of Dominican customs, that veteran overseas official of our government, William E. Pulliam, testifies that nobody could possibly cooperate more fully and satisfactorily than does Trujillo.

The list of the dictator's achievements is long. He has established compulsory education for all children between the ages of five and twelve years, and there are today 118,562 pupils in the 1,198 educational institutions of all types—the marines deserve the credit for establishing most of the rural schools. He has built 1,442 kilometers of modern roads and 2,460 kilometers of telegraph and telephone lines. Even better, he has distributed 253,000 acres of the public domain among 54,494 heads of families who were in great need. Having a passion for bridges, he has built fourteen, two of concrete and twelve of steel, with a total length of 5,363 feet—so you are carefully told. His 1937 budget totals only $10,552,404. Out of this he will spend $1,443,000 on new public works and the upkeep of those existing. Education gets only $1,032,595. Running true to a dictator's form, he allots $1,885,125 to the army; as is the case with our own its expense creeps up every year although there is not the slightest danger of any international conflict.

The dictator's most astounding achievement is the establishment of a pretty honest public service. Graft is severely punished, and Trujillo boasts that every dollar the government spends goes to the purpose for which it was intended. It is true that his own fortune grows by leaps and bounds and that all his relatives live in fine houses. He is beyond question a millionaire. "Why not," people ask, "when he does so much for his country?" He gives generously—he sent $20,000 to the American flood sufferers—and the people are both grateful and impressed. They feel that for the first time they are getting their money's worth in public outlays, and they take great pride in the physical evidences of the dictator's achievements.

There is still much to be done before the country has really good schools and adequate hospitals and other needed social facilities. There is still poverty in plenty even if people are not starving to death. The country has suffered like all others from the world depression, and the principal crops must be increased. As in other South and Central American countries, the public revenue is raised not by direct taxes but solely by import and export duties. Hence trade with the outside world is essential to progress. Sugar, cacao, coffee, molasses, gold, and tobacco are the chief exports in the order named. A half-million tons of sugar left the country in 1935, the largest amount ever exported in a twelve-month period. Naturally Trujillo exerts his influence to encourage agriculture and wisely opposes great plantations in favor of small holdings. Gold is the only mineral mined, but there are deposits of iron, copper, tin, platinum, antimony, opals, and chalcedony which will some day add greatly to the national wealth. Nature, by a bit of indefensible favoritism, has given about all the minerals on the island to Santo Domingo, slighting Haiti. With but half the population and three times the territory of Haiti, Santo Domingo has vast undeveloped stretches of land and a supply of water for irrigation. There seems to be plenty of room for the large colony of Jews which it is sought to place here.

This is the garden in which the brown-skinned Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina is efficiently at work. There are those who believe that he has not read more than a dozen serious books in all his life. Except when he visited Haiti he has never been off Dominican soil in his forty-five years. Side by side with his capacity for good deeds, he has all the brutality of the dictator, and of course he uses the familiar nationalist jargon. He demands virility, national self-consciousness, dedication to the nation's good, and complete subordination to himself as the leader. He is proud that all audiences have to stand twice for the national hymn at every meeting. He is for the Catholic church as the national church. He promises woman suffrage at some distant time, but why he should bother to promise it when he runs the elections is not clear. For foreign consumption he says without a smile: "Our constitution guarantees a democratic and representative government, and I conserve this as a sacred duty." Press and Congress are prostituted. Not a word can be said without his consent. Still there is no denying that here is a real personality. A colored man is the first full-fledged modern dictator in the Caribbean.

Santo Domingo is undoubtedly "going somewhere." But where? No man can tell. It is today progressing materially at the expense of freedom. Its head is "wiping his feet on prostrate liberty" precisely as Mussolini once boasted he was doing. As with other dictatorships, his is founded on bloodshed, suppression, the imposition of a single will. It is too early to tell what the outcome will be. The army can destroy him whenever it chooses, but today it is commanded by one of his brothers. For the present the economic situation is sound; it is not at all certain how long it will stay so, or how long the people will be content to be deprived of all participation in their government, of all possibility of self-expression. The more education the dictator gives the more dissatisfaction is certain to grow up. Perhaps the crowds in Rio Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires who clamored for democracia whenever they cheered President Roosevelt are fresh proof of the age-old truth that people in the long run are not content with good roads and public works and bread and circuses bestowed upon them from above.

BROUN'S PAGE

Uncensored Column: Child Labor

